PEOPLE v. STEELIK. (Cr. 2348.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 12, 1921. Rehearing Denied Dec. 12, 1921.)

1. Criminal law 🔑13—Criminal syndicalism statute is not invalid as uncertain.

The Criminal Syndicalism Act is not invalid as uncertain because it includes accomplices, and defines carefully numerous acts constituting aiding and abetting, or because it punishes aiders and abettors where the crime advocated is not committed.

2. Criminal law 🔑1186(4)—Unfair trial is miscarriage of justice within Constitution, though defendant be guilty.

That the record may show that a defendant is guilty does not conclusively establish that there has been no miscarriage of justice within Const. art. 6, § 4½, for there has been miscarriage of justice if defendant has not had a fair trial.

3. Criminal law 🔑1167(6) — Accused not harmed by failure to separate charge into separate counts.

If the indictment is sufficiently definite and certain in charging several different offenses, no injury resulted to the accused by failure to separate the charge into separate counts, he being rather the gainer, as but one penalty could be imposed.

4. Criminal law 🔑1186(4)—Defendant held not harmed by indictment charging more than one offense on proof of one.

Though an indictment charged more than one offense under the Criminal Syndicalism Act, defining several offenses, and but one of the offenses charged was proved or offered to be proved, the surplusage was not cause for reversal under Const. art. 6, § 4½, forbidding reversal save for miscarriage of justice.

5. Criminal law 🔑1167(6)—Uncertainty in indictment held beneficial to defendant under rule as to former jeopardy.

That an indictment was not sufficiently certain to prevent subsequent jeopardy for a separate offense was more apt to be beneficial than prejudicial where the evidence and verdict on the trial were directed to but one of the offenses, to which it was sufficiently certain.

6. Constitutional law 🔑42—One convicted of an offense under the statute cannot complain that it is uncertain in its definition of other offenses.

Defendant, convicted under St. 1919, p. 281, of advocating criminal syndicalism, is not entitled to have determined the question as to whether other subdivisions of the act sufficiently defined other offenses.

7. Insurrection and sedition 🔑2—Criminal syndicalism statute not invalid because not defining the offenses which one may be convicted of advocating.

St. 1919, p. 281, punishing as criminal syndicalism the advocating, teaching, or aiding and abetting the commission of crime, sabotage meaning the willful and malicious physical damage or injury to physical property, or unlawful acts of force and violence, was not invalid because it did not define the particular offenses which one might aid or abet.

8. Constitutional law 🔑90—Criminal syndicalism statute does not violate right of free speech.

St. 1919, p. 281, defining criminal syndicalism as advocating, teaching, or aiding the commission of crime, sabotage, etc., does not violate the right of free speech.

9. Constitutional law 🔑42—Defendant, convicted of syndicalism in belonging to organization formed to commit crime, could not complain that other portions of statute forbade free speech.

Defendant, convicted under that portion of the Criminal Syndicalism Act against organizing or joining organizations formed for the purpose of committing crimes denounced, could not complain that the parts of the statute directed against the advocacy of doctrines urging criminal acts towards persons and property violated the right of free speech.

10. Insurrection and sedition 🔑2—Criminal syndicalism statute not invalid because denouncing acts which might have been punished as treason.

The definitions of treason in the federal and state constitutions are merely to limit the number of offenses punishable as such, and the act denouncing criminal syndicalism (St. 1919, p. 281), was not invalid because including offenses which might have been punished as constructive treason.

11. Constitutional law 🔑202 — Syndicalism statute not given ex post facto effect by admitting evidence of crimes by members of organization before joined by defendant.

In prosecution of a member of the I. W. W. under St. 1919, p. 281, for belonging to an organization formed to commit crimes denounced, the statute was not given the effect of an ex post facto law by admitting evidence of crimes by members of the I. W. W., prior to the time defendant joined.

12. Insurrection and sedition 🔑2—Evidence of crimes by members of the I. W. W. before defendant joined held admissible in prosecution against him.

In prosecution of a member of the I. W. W. under St. 1919, p. 281, for criminal syndicalism in belonging to an organization formed for committing crimes denounced, evidence of crimes committed by members of that organization before defendant joined it, was admissible as characterizing the organization after the passage of the act during the time defendant belonged.

13. Criminal law 🔑427(2)—Testimony of members of I. W. W. to offenses by members before defendant joined held not within rule as to declarations of coconspirators.

In a prosecution of a member of the I. W. W. under St. 1919, p. 281, for criminal syndicalism in being a member of the I. W. W., an organization formed to commit crimes denounced, evidence of members of such organization of offenses committed by members prior to the time defendant joined it was direct testimony to the facts, and not declarations of coconspirators within the rule that it should not be permitted until the conspiracy was established by other evidence than such declarations.

14. Criminal law ⚷1037(1)—Appellate court cannot consider misconduct of counsel not objected to.

An appellate court will not consider misconduct of counsel in argument unless objection is made at the time on contention that the conduct was so prejudicial as to have precluded any possible curative action had the court's attention been directed thereto.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

N. Steelik was convicted of criminal syndicalism, and appeals. On hearing in bank after judgment in the District Court of Appeal, Second District, affirming the judgment below. Judgment of superior court affirmed.

J. H. Ryckman, and S. P. Pandit, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Thomas Lee Woolwine, Dist. Atty., Asa Keyes, Deputy Dist. Atty., and Raymond I. Turney, all of Los Angeles, for the People.

WILBUR, J. The defendant was charged with the crime of criminal syndicalism under a statute enacted in 1919 (Stats. 1919, p. 281). The indictment in the main follows the language of the statute, and the defendant claims that the indictment is not sufficiently specific, and that the statute is void for uncertainty, while the respondent relies upon the rule that an indictment in the language of the statute sufficiently charges a statutory offense. As the main contentions of the appellant are based upon the form of the indictment and the uncertainty of the statute, we will set out the charging part of the indictment. The indictment is as follows:

"The said * * * N. Steelik * * * are accused by the grand jury of the county of Los Angeles, state of California, by this indictment, of a felony, to wit, criminal syndicalism, committed at and in the county of Los Angeles, state of California, and before the finding of this indictment, as follows, to wit:

"That on or about the 29th day of September, 1919, and before the finding of this indictment, at the county and state aforesaid, the said defendants did then and there willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously, by spoken and written words and personal conduct, advocate, teach, aid, and abet criminal syndicalism, and the duty, necessity and propriety of committing crime, sabotage, violence, and unlawful methods of terrorism as a means of accomplishing a change in industrial ownership and control and effecting political changes, and did then and there willfully, unlawfully, feloniously, and deliberately, by spoken and written words, justify and attempt to justify criminal syndicalism and the commission of and attempt to commit crime, sabotage, violence, and unlawful methods of terrorism, with intent to approve, advocate, and further the doctrine of criminal syndicalism as a means of accomplishing a change in industrial ownership and control and effecting political changes; and did then and there willfully, unlawfully and feloniously publish, issue, circulate and publicly display certain books, papers, pamphlets, documents, posters, and written and printed matter in other forms containing and carrying written and printed advocacy of teaching and aid and abetment of and advising criminal syndicalism, to wit: Advocating terrorism and advising the commission of crime, sabotage, and other willful and malicious damage and injury to property and unlawful acts of force and violence and unlawful methods of terrorism as a means of accomplishing a change in industrial ownership and control, and effecting political changes; and did then and there willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously organize and assist in organizing, and they are, and each of them is, and each of them knowingly became, a member of an organization, society, group, and assemblage of persons known and designated as the 'Industrial Workers of the World' and sometimes known and referred to as the 'I. W. W.,' and sometimes known and referred to as the 'One Big Union,' and which said organization, society, group, and assemblage of persons was then and there organized and assembled to advocate, teach, aid, and abet criminal syndicalism as a means of accomplishing a change in industrial ownership and control and effecting political changes.

"All of which is contrary to the form, force, and effect of the statute in such cases made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the people of the state of California."

The statute which we will hereinafter refer to as the criminal syndicalism act in section 1 defines criminal syndicalism and sabotage as follows:

"Section 1. The term 'criminal syndicalism' as used in this act is hereby defined as any doctrine or precept advocating, teaching, or aiding and abetting the commission of crime, sabotage (which word is hereby defined as meaning willful and malicious physical damage or injury to physical property), or unlawful acts of force and violence or unlawful methods of terrorism as a means of accomplishing a change in industrial ownership or control, or effecting any political change."

Subdivisions 1, 2, and 3 of section 2 punish one who advocates or encourages or justifies criminal syndicalism. Subdivision 4 punishes one who assists in organization of a society to teach, aid, or abet criminal syndicalism; and subdivision 5 prohibits the commission of crime in furtherance of criminal syndicalism. Section 2, inserting therein the definition of "criminal syndicalism" and "sabotage" contained in section 1 in lieu of the words "criminal syndicalism" and "sabotage" contained in section 2, reads as follows:

"1. By spoken or written words or personal conduct advocates, teaches or aids and abets any doctrine or precept advocating, teaching or aiding and abetting the commission of crime, willful and malicious physical damage or injury to physical property, or unlawful acts of force and violence or unlawful methods of terrorism as a means of accomplishing a change in industrial ownership or control, or effecting any political change, or the duty, necessity or propriety of committing crime, willful and malicious physical damage or injury to physical property, violence or any unlawful method of terrorism as a means of accomplishing a change in industrial ownership or control, or effecting any political change; or

"2. Willfully and deliberately by spoken or written words justifies or attempts to justify any doctrine or precept advocating, teaching or aiding and abetting the commission of crime, willful and malicious physical damage or injury to physical property, or unlawful acts of force and violence or unlawful methods of terrorism as a means of accomplishing a change in industrial ownership or control, or effecting any political change, or the commission or attempt to commit crime, willful and malicious physical damage or injury to physical property, violence or unlawful methods of terrorism with intent to approve, advocate or further the doctrine or precept advocating, teaching or aiding and abetting the commission of crime, willful and malicious physical damage or injury to physical property, or unlawful acts of force and violence or unlawful methods of terrorism as a means of accomplishing a change in industrial ownership or control, or effecting any political change; or

"3. Prints, publishes, edits, issues or circulates or publicly displays any book, paper, pamphlet, document, poster or written or printed matter in any other form, containing or carrying written or printed advocacy, teaching, or aid and abetment of, or advising, any doctrine or precept advocating, teaching or aiding and abetting the commission of crime, willful and malicious physical damage or injury to physical property, or unlawful acts of force and violence or unlawful methods of terrorism as a means of accomplishing a change in industrial ownership or control, or effecting any political change; or

"4. Organizes or assists in organizing, or is or knowingly becomes a member of, any organization, society, group or assemblage of persons organized or assembled to advocate, teach or aid and abet any doctrine or precept advocating, teaching or aiding and abetting the commission of crime, willful and malicious physical damage or injury to physical property, or unlawful acts of force and violence or unlawful methods of terrorism as a means of accomplishing a change in industrial ownership or control, or effecting any political change; or

"5. Willfully by personal act or conduct, practices or commits any act advised, advocated, taught or aided and abetted by the doctrine or precept advocating, teaching or aiding and abetting the commission of crime, willful and malicious physical damage or injury to physical property, or unlawful acts of force and violence or unlawful methods of terrorism as a means of accomplishing a change in industrial ownership or control, or effecting any political change, with intent to accomplish a change in industrial ownership or control, or effecting any political change;

"Is guilty of a felony and punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not less than one nor more than fourteen years."

Thus it will be observed, the criminal syndicalism act prohibits the advocacy of crime, the organization of conspiracies to commit crime, and the commission of crime, having for its object the bringing about of political or industrial changes.

In considering the sufficiency of the statute and of the indictment, it should be noted that the language is unusually broad and comprehensive, as well as tautological, partly because the statute expressly includes accomplices and those who engage in conspiracies to commit the crime denounced.

[1] In defining crime it is not usual for the Legislature to include in the definition those who are accomplices. In this state accomplices are liable as principals, and may be charged as such. Section 31 of the Penal Code provides as follows:

"Sec. 31. Who Are Principals. All persons concerned in the commission of a crime, whether it be a felony or misdemeanor, and whether they directly commit the act constituting the offense, or aid and abet in its commission, or, not being present, have advised and encouraged its commission, and all persons counseling, advising, or encouraging children under the age of fourteen years, lunatics or idiots, to commit any crime, or who, by fraud, contrivance or force, occasion the drunkenness of another for the purpose of causing him to commit any crime, or who, by threats, menaces, command, or coercion compel another to commit any crime, are principals in any crime so committed."

Thus, every act in defining a crime under our system of law includes those who aid and abet its commission, and such accomplices may be punished as principals for the perpetration of the crime which they aid and abet. The fact that in the criminal syndicalism act the statute ex industria includes accomplices and defines with meticulous care numerous acts constituting such aiding and abetting of the principal crime does not render the act uncertain, nor is the fact that the act punishes aiders and abettors of the crime where the crime advocated is not committed a reason for holding the law uncertain. On the contrary, such definition is for the purpose of making the law more certain and explicit.

In the case of Spies v. People, 122 Ill. 1, 12 N. E. 865, 17 N. E. 898, 3 Am. St. Rep. 320, we have an instance where those who were responsible for anarchistic propaganda were found guilty and executed for the resultant murder of policemen by a bomb at the Haymarket meeting in Chicago. Our Criminal Syndicalism Act, however, differs from the implied legislation contained in the definition of every crime, in that it punishes aiders and abettors of the crime denounced for their efforts to bring about such crime, even before the criminal act they seek to bring about has actually been accomplished.

Section 5 provides punishment for those who commit the crime, and section 4 for those who organize or join organizations formed for the purpose of committing such crimes. The members of such an organization would, at common law, be punishable for conspiracy to commit crime.

It seems clear that not more than three crimes are described in the statute: First, the commission of a crime for the purpose of effecting the desired change; second, advocating the commission of such a crime, although it might not have occurred, and where the advocates would not therefore be accomplices in the crime; this would include those who print or write documents in furtherance of such crime; and, third, forming a criminal conspiracy for the purpose of committing such a crime.

The aiding and abetting of a contemplated crime, where it is an individual act, is not ordinarily punishable until the crime has been committed. But, if two or more join in the purpose, they become liable as conspirators under our statute (section 182, Penal Code), punishable without any overt act, if the offense agreed to be committed is a felony upon the person of another or to commit arson or burglary. In all other cases it is essential that some overt act in furtherance of the conspiracy occur (section 184, Penal Code).

Under our system a person charged with a crime as principal may be convicted of aiding and abetting in that crime (section 31, Penal Code). So that an indictment charging a person with committing the crime of criminal syndicalism, and also with aiding and abetting the same, would be duplicative, if at all, only because aiding and abetting criminal syndicalism is punishable as such under this act where the criminal act advocated is not consummated. The only purpose of charging the defendant with aiding and abetting and advocating crime, as well as the crime itself, is to charge that advocacy as a crime, distinct from the commission of the crime so advocated. It would seem clear that an indictment so framed as to permit a conviction for the crime advocated and for the advocacy of the crime, if not committed, would charge two separate offenses, and that the law framed so as to cover both would also define two offenses. That subdivisions 1, 2, and 3 of section 2 do define a separate crime is well illustrated by the fact that the justification of crime denounced in section 2, subd. 2, supra, would apply to crimes to be committed and those already committed. Both are covered by section 1, as teaching or advocating crime, and both are punishable because of their tendency to cause new crimes of a similar nature.

The conspiracy denounced in subdivision 4, § 2, is also a separate and distinct crime, which may result in the commission of the crime advocated, in which event the conspirators can be charged as principals in the crime. If no such crime is committed, the conspiracy to commit the crime is a separate offense from the crime, and from aiding and abetting the crime, where the latter is by an individual, and not by a combination or organization. If, as a result of a conspiracy, crime is committed, section 2, subd. 5, alone need be invoked.

In the case at bar no evidence was introduced of the consummation of any crime by the defendant or his associates for the purpose of effecting political or industrial changes. The evidence relied upon in this case for conviction was to the effect that the Industrial Workers of the World, hereinafter referred to as the I. W. W., was an organization which came within the provisions of section 4, and that the defendant was a member thereof. The defendant testified that he was a member of the I. W. W., having joined before the passage of the Criminal Syndicalism Act, and that he remained such member thereafter, and that he participated in the meetings of the organization. There was evidence to the effect that he was an authorized organizer thereof, and acted in such capacity, and personally advocated revolution and preached some of the doctrines denounced as criminal in the act. There was thus evidence before the jury that the defendant had violated section 2, subdivision 4, of the statute; that is, he knowingly belonged to a conspiracy to commit crimes in furtherance of industrial and political control.

[2] There is overwhelming evidence in the case at bar to justify a conclusion by the jury that the I. W. W. is an organization as clearly denounced by the statute as unlawful as though it was mentioned by name. It therefore clearly appears from the evidence that the defendant has committed a crime denounced by the statute, and is thus justly liable to suffer the penalty imposed by the statute, and there has been no miscarriage of justice in imposing upon him the penalty prescribed by law for the offense committed by him. Section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution provides that no judgment shall be set aside in any cause for any error in pleading or procedure "unless, after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

Of course, the mere fact that the record shows the defendant to be guilty of a crime does not conclusively determine that there has been no miscarriage of justice in imposing upon him the penalty prescribed by law therefor, for, if the defendant has not had a fair trial, there has been a miscarriage of justice.

The indictment must contain a statement of the acts constituting the offense in ordinary and concise language, and in such manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended (Penal Code, § 950) and "it must be direct and certain, as it regards: * * * The particular circumstances of the offense charged, when they are necessary to constitute a complete offense" (Penal Code, § 952), and the indictment is sufficient in that regard if "the act or omission charged as the offense is clearly and distinctly set forth in ordinary and concise language, without repetition, and in such a manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended" (Penal Code, § 959, subd. 6).

> "The indictment * * * may charge two or more different offenses connected together in their commission, or different statements of the same offense, or two or more different offenses of the same class of crimes or offenses, under separate counts. * * *" Penal Code, § 954.

[3] Assuming that the indictment is sufficiently definite and certain in charging several different offenses, no injury resulted to the defendant by reason of a failure to separate the charge into separate counts. Indeed, he is the gainer thereby, as only one penalty can be imposed.

[4] It is claimed that the indictment in this case is so broad and comprehensive in its allegations, so indefinite and uncertain in its specifications, that the defendant was not properly advised of the nature of the charge against him, and was thus convicted without that due process of law guaranteed to him by the federal and state Constitutions. It is true that the language of the indictment is very comprehensive, and would justify the proof of a multitude of acts which would be comprehended within the terms of the statute and the indictment thereunder. On the other hand, it is specifically alleged in the indictment that the defendant was a member of the I. W. W., knowing its alleged purposes. As to that charge, he was therefore fully advised, and the evidence clearly shows his guilt. The evidence introduced against the defendant was all germane to that charge. The evidence as to the character of the organization and his membership was admissible to support the charge, and the testimony as to his statements and activities were admissible to show his knowledge of and sympathy with the purposes of the organization. No evidence is called to our attention which was not pertinent to this specific charge.

We are thus confronted with the question as to whether or not we should reverse this case because the indictment was comprehensive enough to charge in too general terms, acts and offenses, not in fact proved, where it clearly and specifically charged the offense proved on the trial, and no other offense or acts were proved or offered to be proved. The general rule is that surplusage may be rejected if sufficient remains in the indictment to charge the offense proved, and that uncertain and duplicitous averments may be treated as surplusage, and rejected. 22 Cyc. 367-369. Under this rule, the indictment was sufficient to support the judgment.

If we are correct in holding that the only just criticism of the indictment is that it included other offenses than the specific one of knowingly remaining a member of the I. W. W., and that the evidence was in fact confined to that issue, then we are directed by the Constitution not to reverse the judgment against the defendant for any error as to any matter of pleading, "unless, after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice." It is clear that mere surplusage in the indictment would not result in any miscarriage of justice as to a crime specifically charged and upon which upon proper evidence the defendant was found guilty.

[5] The defendant also complains of the trial for the reason that he is entitled to have the allegations against him reduced to such form that, in the event of either an acquittal or conviction, he cannot be again tried for the same offense, and that the indictment is not sufficiently certain to protect him in that regard. The rule invoked by the defendant is one for the testing of the sufficiency of an indictment (People v. Mahony, 145 Cal. 104, 106, 78 Pac. 354), and is entitled to consideration under the rule which limits the power of this court on appeal (article 6, § 4½). We think it clear, however, that the evidence and verdict are directed to the membership of the defendant in the I. W. W., and that this prosecution would bar another on that issue. It is therefore unnecessary to consider whether it would bar a prosecution for some other act included therein. If so, he is to that extent benefited by the unnecessary averments of the indictment, and is not prejudiced in this case thereby.

[6] We are not required in the case at bar to determine whether or not the general language of subdivisions 1, 2, and 3 is sufficient, when used in a statute, to define an offense, or in an indictment, to charge an offense, for the reason that the defendant is specifically charged with belonging to the I. W. W., and thus an offense is charged under subdivision 4, § 2, of the act.

dertake to define the various acts, the advocacy of which is punishable under the statute. Such acts are already denounced as wrongful under existing laws. They are: (1) The "commission of crime;" (2) "willful and malicious physical damage to physical property;" (3) "unlawful acts of force and violence;" (4) "unlawful methods of terrorism." We must look to the general law of the state to determine what are "unlawful acts of force and violence," and what are "unlawful methods of terrorism," and to ascertain what acts are crime. The "malicious physical damage to physical property" is evidently synonymous with malicious mischief and arson, and other unlawful acts resulting in the damage to or destruction of physical property. These wrongful acts, most of them already punishable by the criminal law, are denounced by the statute and made felonious when done or advocated as a means of political or industrial change. The criminal syndicalism act might be summarized as an act to punish the advocacy of crime or wrong, engaging in conspiracies to commit crime or unlawful acts, or the commission of crime or unlawful acts, as a means of changing industrial or political control. It is proper to seek desired changes in political and industrial control; but, when criminal or unlawful means are used to effect political control, the means is punishable under the act defining and prohibiting criminal syndicalism, as well as under the act defining the crime. The latter act is no more uncertain than the one denouncing criminal conspiracy as a conspiracy to commit any act "injurious to the public health," "or to public morals," or the "perversion and obstruction of justice," "or due administration of the laws." Section 182 Penal Code.

This same question was considered by the Supreme Court of the state of Washington in State v. Hennessy, 195 Pac. 211, 215, and in State v. Fox, 71 Wash. 185, 127 Pac. 1111. An act defining criminal syndicalism was sustained in the former case, and an act defining criminal anarchy in the latter case. Both acts were couched in much the same language as our Criminal Syndicalism Act. Without further discussion we accept the conclusions of the Supreme Court of Washington in State v. Hennessy, supra; and, although the statute there under consideration is somewhat different in terms from ours, the principle there announced is fully applicable here.

We have twice had before us the question of the validity of this act. In re McDermott, 180 Cal. 783, 183 Pac. 437, where an application for a writ of habeas corpus was denied, and in Whitney v. Superior Court, 182 Cal. 114, 187 Pac. 12. In the case of In re McDermott, supra, the application for a writ of habeas corpus, after defendant had been held to answer, was based upon the grounds that the defendant had been held to answer without probable cause, and that the law was unconstitutional. It appears from an examination of the petition therein that the points specified by the petitioner in that case as the basis for the claim of the unconstitutionality of the statute were—

> "the ambiguity of the statute, in that a person of common intelligence cannot understand just what not to do in order not to violate any of its five subdivisions of section 2, in this, to wit: That it cannot be ascertained by reading said law whether it is a crime and a violation of said act for any person to read in public any book, paper, pamphlet, document, poster, or written or printed matter in any other form—to use the language of the act—containing or carrying written or printed advocacy, teaching, or aid and abetment of, or advising 'criminal syndicalism' as set out in subsection 3 of said act, if in said reading the person publicly displays said book, pamphlet, or other written or printed matter, no matter how innocent of violating said law said person might be; that the act was ambiguous, in that it cannot be ascertained therefrom just what is meant by 'unlawful methods of terrorism,' as contained in section 1 of said act and elsewhere as a person of common intelligence would reasonably conclude after reading said act that there is such a thing as 'lawful methods of terrorism'; that the complaint under which the petitioner was held was also defective and void, in that it did not state a public offense because it is not sufficiently direct and certain," etc.

The petition was filed July 25, 1919, and was denied July 31, 1919, without argument, because the court was thoroughly satisfied that the law was immune from the attack against it. The evidence upon which the petitioner was held to answer in that case, as in this, showed that the defendant was a member of the I. W. W., and had knowledge of its character. The decision in the McDermott Case upholds the constitutionality of the criminal syndicalism act in so far as it defines the crime mentioned in subdivision 4, § 2. We have considered the arguments made here attacking the constitutionality of the law, and see no reason to change the conclusion reached in the McDermott Case, supra.

In the case of Whitney v. Superior Court et al., supra, an application was made for writ of prohibition to prevent the superior court of Alameda county from proceeding with the trial of the petitioner upon an information charging the petitioner with violating the Criminal Syndicalism Act. This court, in denying the petition, said:

> "We see no merit in the claim that the act under which petitioner is being prosecuted is invalid as being in violation of provisions of our federal and state Constitutions."

The point of attack in that case as to the constitutionality of the law was that it violated section 24 of article 4 of the Constitution prohibiting a legislative act embracing more than one subject.

Notwithstanding these decisions in general terms approved the constitutionality of the statute, the defendant argues with great learning that the statute under consideration violates the right of free speech guaranteed in the federal and state Constitutions, and for that reason is unconstitutional and void.

[8, 9] The right of free speech was guaranteed to prevent legislation which would, by censorship, injunction, or other method, prevent the free publication by any citizen of anything that he deemed it was necessary to say or publish. See notes, 15 Ann. Cas. 3, 4; 6 R. C. L. § 239 et seq. The right of free speech does not include the right to advocate the destruction or overthrow the government or the criminal destruction of property. The Criminal Syndicalism Act does not violate the right of free speech. State v. Hennessy, supra; People v. Most, 171 N. Y. 423, 64 N. E. 175, 58 L. R. A. 509. It is expressly provided in our Constitution that the publisher is liable for an abuse of this power and for any unlawful publication. This statute does not prevent the publication; it punishes the publisher, and declares punishable the character of publication denounced by the act as illegal. The Legislature has power to punish propaganda which has for its purpose the destruction of government or the rights of property which the government was formed to preserve. People v. Most, supra. It is clear that the statute does not violate the right of free speech as defined by law. The defendant, however, is not in a position to raise the point, for he is not charged with or convicted of a violation of the criminal syndicalism act involving anything that he said or published, as hereinbefore indicated.

[10] Appellant contends that the offense with which he is charged comes under the common-law definition of constructive treason, and that therefore he cannot be punished because of the definition of treason contained in the federal and state Constitutions. These definitions are merely for the purposes of limiting the number of offenses which can be punishable as treason under the common law, and in no wise limit the power of the Legislature to provide for the punishment of acts inimical to the public welfare which theretofore might have been punished as constructive treason. State v. Hennessy, supra; Ex parte Bollman, 8 U. S. (4 Cranch) 75, 2 L. Ed. 554.

On the whole, therefore, we hold that the record justifies the conviction of the defendant of the offense of criminal syndicalism, in that he knowingly belonged to an organization which in its nature was a criminal conspiracy to change industrial control and government by unlawful and criminal methods.

[11] It remains to consider the various objections to the evidence presented by the defendant. The principal one is to the testimony of two members of the I. W. W. as to various criminal acts committed by members of that organization before the defendant joined the organization, and before the passage of the Criminal Syndicalism Act. It is urged that the defendant is not bound by the conduct of his associates before he joined with them, and that to convict him in this proceeding with a violation of a statute subsequently passed would make the law, in effect, an ex post facto law.

[12] In this case, the only question the defendant can be heard upon is whether or not the evidence of the conduct of members of the I. W. W. before the passage of the act is admissible as tending to establish the character of the organization after the passage of the act and during the time the defendant belonged thereto. It seems too clear for discussion that, where the issue involves the character of an organization, it is proper to determine the character of the organization from the conduct of its members and officers, including the propaganda which it publishes. It is no doubt true, that the presumption of innocence would overcome the legal presumption that, when the nature of a thing is once shown, it is presumed that it continues thereafter as long as such thing usually continues. Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 32. But where such proof is fortified by actual proof that, subsequent to the passage of the act, the organization continued to publish the same sort of propaganda, it is proper to consider the evidence of the conduct of the organization both before and after the passage of the statute in order to determine whether or not it is such an organization as is denounced by the statute. As the defendant knowingly continued his membership in the organization after such conduct had been denounced by the statute as criminal, he is liable, not for what the organization did before he joined it, or for its character before the statute was passed, but because after the statute was passed he violated the terms thereof by knowingly remaining a member thereof.

[13] It is contended that the evidence of these members of the I. W. W. was inadmissible, for the further reason that it consisted of declarations of coconspirators, and was not admissible until the conspiracy was established by other evidence than such declarations. In making this contention the appellant wholly misconceives the applicability of the rule with reference to the declarations of coconspirators. The evidence adduced in court by the coconspirators as witnesses are not declarations of conspirators, but direct testimony to the facts to which they testify. Aside from the discredit which attaches to them as accomplices, their evidence is entirely competent to establish the facts to which they testify. The rule for which counsel contends is applicable only when it is sought to introduce extrajudicial declarations and statements of coconspirators.

the part of the district attorney in his argument to the jury. It was partly because of the character of the argument, portions of which were set out in the opinion of the District Court of Appeal of the Second District, Second Division, that we ordered a transfer to this court. The misconduct alleged consisted of vigorous and scathing denunciation of the defendant, and particularly of his counsel. During this denunciation the defendant made no objection. He neglected to call the attention of the court to the character of the argument and statements or the prejudicial effect anticipated therefrom. The court, however, instructed the jury that it must disregard the remarks of the counsel, and not consider them as evidence, and would only be justified in convicting upon the evidence upon the trial of the case. It is well settled that an appellate court will not consider a claim as to the misconduct of counsel in argument unless objection is made at the time. People v. Fleming, 166 Cal. 357, 371, 377, 136 Pac. 291, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 881.

Appellant claims that the remarks of the district attorney were of such a prejudicial character as to have precluded any possible curative action by the trial judge, and for that reason asks us to reverse the judgment. Assuming that the remarks of the district attorney were as prejudicial as counsel claim them to be, we must also assume that, if seasonable objection had been made to that course of argument or conduct, the district attorney would have refrained from other and further improprieties in his argument, failing in which the judge would have promptly and emphatically prohibited further violation of the proprieties by the district attorney. This being true, we have no means of ascertaining whether or not the more flagrant violations complained of and the most prejudicial remarks of the district attorney would have ever occurred if, at the beginning, the defendant, instead of sitting silently by, had made seasonable objection thereto. In any event, we cannot properly disregard the rule requiring that objection be made to prejudicial misconduct of the district attorney, as a basis for a complaint in this court.

Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. TAYLOR. (Cr. 2358.)

Rehearing Denied Dec. 12, 1921.)

1. Insurrection and sedition 🔑2—Acts alleged to constitute criminal syndicalism should be specified in indictment.

A count under Criminal Syndicalism Act, § 2, subd. 5, charging defendant with committing acts in furtherance of political and industrial change, should specify such acts.

2. Criminal law 🔑1186(4)—Failure of indictment to specify acts of criminal syndicalism held harmless.

Though an indictment under Criminal Syndicalism Act, § 2, subd. 4, for organizing or belonging to an organization advocating commission of crime to effect political change, was defective in not specifying the organization, such error did not constitute miscarriage of justice within Const. art. 6, § 4½, where defendant on voir dire of the jury asked the district attorney to state what organization was referred to, and was told the "Communist Labor party," and trial was had on that issue.

3. Insurrection and sedition 🔑2—Publications found at headquarters of society to which defendant belonged held properly admitted.

In prosecution of a member of the Communist Labor party under Criminal Syndicalism Act, for belonging to an organization advocating crime to effect political change, publications found at the headquarters of the party were properly admitted to show the character of the organization.

4. Constitutional law 🔑90—Statute denouncing advocacy of crime to effect change of government held not to violate right of free speech.

Though the right of free speech is violated by statutes denouncing organizations promoting or encouraging hostility or opposition to the government, such principle does not apply to statutes denouncing organizations formed for the purpose of committing crimes against persons and property in furtherance of political or industrial change.

5. Insurrection and sedition 🔑2—Whether a party was organized to abet criminal syndicalism was for the jury, and not for the court.

In a prosecution under Criminal Syndicalism Act, § 2, subd. 4, question whether or not the Communist Labor party, to which the defendant belonged, was organized to advocate and abet criminal syndicalism, was for the jury, and not for the court, on evidence as to the nature and character of such party.

6. Insurrection and sedition 🔑2—In prosecution of member of Communist Labor party, literature of I. W. W. held admissible.

In a prosecution of a member of the Communist Labor party for criminal syndicalism under St. 1919, p. 281, § 2, subd. 4, it was not error to admit in evidence literature and propaganda of the I. W. W. taken with other literature at the headquarters of the Communist Labor party, in view of the approval in its platform, of the I. W. W., and what it had accomplished.

7. Insurrection and sedition 🔑2—Evidence held sufficient to justify conviction for criminal syndicalism.

In prosecution for criminal syndicalism under St. 1919, p. 281, evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction of belonging to a party organized to advocate crime in furtherance of effecting political change, denounced by section 2, subd. 4, but insufficient to sustain a conviction under section 2, subd. 5, charging commission of crimes against persons and property.

8. Criminal law ⚷829(4)—Instructions covered by those given held properly refused.

In prosecution for criminal syndicalism, in which the issue was whether the Communist Labor party, to which defendant belonged, was an organization furthering crime as a means of effecting political change, instructions on the general rights of the masses to strike, and the propriety or impropriety to sympathize with the Soviet Russia, were properly refused, any relevant matter therein being covered by other instructions.

9. Indictment and information ⚷110(3)—Following language of Criminal Syndicalism Act insufficient.

Indictment for criminal syndicalism under St. 1919, p. 281, couched in the language of the statute, is insufficient where the charge made relates to advocacy of doctrines or publication and circulation of books, etc., as each separate act and publication would constitute a separate offense; and the specific acts charged should be designated.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; James G. Quinn, Judge.

John C. Taylor was convicted of criminal syndicalism, and appeals. On hearing after judgment in the District Court of Appeal. Judgment affirming conviction on one count and reversing as to conviction on another.

Austin Lewis, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

WILBUR, J. The defendant was convicted by a jury of the crime of criminal syndicalism. The indictment contained four counts, based upon subdivisions 1, 2, 4, and 5 of section 2 of the Criminal Syndicalism Act of 1919 (Stats. 1919, p. 281). He was convicted upon the first and fourth counts. The first count charged the defendant with the offense of knowingly belonging to an organization advocating sabotage, etc., and the fourth count with committing certain lawless acts defined in subdivision 5 of section 2 of the Criminal Syndicalism Act. The District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, sustained the conviction as to the first count, charging an offense under subdivision 4 of section 2 of the Criminal Syndicalism Act, and reversed the case as to count 4, charging an offense under subdivision 5. The defendant petitioned for a transfer to this court on the ground of the insufficiency of the indictment. The petition was granted because at the time we had under consideration a similar question in the case of People v. N. Steelik, since decided, 203 Pac. 78, in which the constitutionality of the statute and the sufficiency of an indictment thereunder were under consideration. It was desired that the matter should be fully considered in that case, and that the ruling therein might be applied in this case. If we agree with the holding of the District Court of Appeal that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict of the jury on the fourth count, then this case becomes almost identical with that of People v. N. Steelik, with the single exception that, in the indictment in this case, the name of the organization to which the defendant belonged is not stated. That organization is the Communist Labor party. On the consideration of the petition for a transfer we were inclined to the opinion that, where a defendant was charged with advocating a certain doctrine or printing a certain book or pamphlet, or circulating the same, it was essential that the name and description of the book, document, etc., should be contained in the indictment for the information of the defendant. If there had been a conviction under counts 2 and 3 of the indictment in this case, that question would be directly involved here; but, in view of the fact that the jury disagreed upon these two counts, they have been dismissed, and the question is not now involved in the case.

[1] As to the fourth count of the indictment, in which the defendant is charged with committing acts in violation of the Criminal Syndicalism Law in furtherance of political and industrial change, it is clear that these acts should have been specified in the indictment. The fact that the jury, in the absence of such specifications, found the defendant guilty of committing such acts, and that the District Court of Appeal was unable to find any evidence in the case which justified such a conviction, merely emphasizes the fact that the acts charged to have been committed should have been specified. If the crime of arson, or murder, or larceny, or malicious mischief was intended to be charged by the indictment, that charge should have been made specifically, so that the defendant would be advised as to the particular charge he was called upon to meet in his defense. Inasmuch as we agree with the conclusion of the District Court of Appeal that there was no evidence upon which to justify a conviction upon this count, and therefore concur in the conclusion of that court that the judgment must be reversed upon that count, the only question remaining in the case with reference to the sufficiency of the indictment, in view of our decision in People v. Steelik, supra, is the question as to whether or not a charge that the defendant was a member of an organization denounced in subdivision 4 of section 2 of the Criminal Syndicalism Act is sufficient where it states the offense in the language of that subdivision without naming the specific party or organization to which the defendant is alleged to have belonged.

[2] If, however, the indictment is broad enough in its terms to include the Communist Labor party, as is the case here, in testing the sufficiency of the indictment we are confronted with the provisions of article 6, section 4½, of the Constitution, which admonishes us not to reverse cases for mere defects in the pleadings. As the indictment was sufficient to charge the offense specified in subdivision 4 of section 2 of the Criminal Syndicalism Act in general terms, we are called upon to determine in this case whether the failure to name the organization to which the defendant was alleged to belong resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

The defendant in this case acted as his own counsel, and upon the voir dire of the jury asked the district attorney to specifically state what organization or party was referred to in the indictment for which it was intended to prosecute him. The district attorney replied, "Communist Labor party," so that during the actual trial of the case there was no doubt in the mind of the defendant as to the organization with which he was charged with affiliating. The defendant testified on his own behalf not only that he was a member of the Communist Labor party, but also that he had participated in its organization thereof at Chicago, Ill., and also of the local branch in Oakland, Cal., and was the secretary of the local organization. In his brief on appeal he states:

> "One question is presented by the evidence, 'Is the Communist Labor party of California an organization within the scope of subdivision 2[4], section 2, of the act?' "

He also states in his brief:

> "There is evidence, and we admit, that defendant went to Chicago and was in a minor capacity one of the organizers of the Communist Labor Party of America, all of which is material, if at all, for the sole reason that it shows that he knew of the purposes and objects of the party. There is evidence and we admit that the defendant took a prominent part in the organization of the Communist Labor Party of California, and the latter party affiliated with the Communist Labor Party of America. These facts could have been presented to the jury in 10 minutes and the defendant never denied them."

The defendant was thus fully advised, by the statement of the district attorney in response to his question, that the organization intended to be designated by count 1 of the indictment was the Communist Labor party. In the absence of some indication in the record or some claim on appeal that the defendant was surprised by the method in which the charge against him was made and proven, we cannot see that the defendant was prejudiced by the failure to mention the name of the organization to which it is charged he belonged. He was fully advised by the indictment that he was charged with belonging to an illegal organization, and fully advised by the statement of the district attorney that the particular organization intended was the one in which his membership was admitted. There was no miscarriage of justice in this case resulting from the failure to specify the organization intended, and this court cannot reverse the judgment of conviction, even though it is clear that the indictment should have stated the name of the organization to which it was claimed defendant belonged.

[3] Error is assigned in the admission of testimony offered by the people consisting of books, pamphlets, and publications found at the headquarters of the Communist Labor party in Oakland. This testimony was all received for the purpose of showing the character of the organization to which the defendant belonged, and his knowledge of that character. It is true, as the defendant contends, that the mere possession of books and documents advocating criminal syndicalism and sabotage would not be sufficient evidence to convict of the crime of criminal syndicalism. Such evidence, however, was admissible as tending to show the character of the organization, and was supplemented by other proof with reference to the nature and character of the organization, including debates over the policy of the organization in which the defendant participated, the constitution of the organization and propaganda prepared for its use, coupled with evidence that it indorsed the I. W. W. and had possession of literature used by that organization. The possession of the documents and pamphlets in question, taken alone, would be insufficient to characterize the organization, but it was one item in the evidence tending to show the nature of the organization, the weight and effect of which under the circumstances was to be determined by the jury.

[4] The defendant calls attention to the ruling of the Supreme Court of the state of New Jersey in the case of State v. Gabriel, 112 Atl. 611, and also to the opinion of Judge Anderson in Colyer v. Skeffington (D. C.) 265 Fed. 17. The New Jersey case is cited as authority for the proposition that subdivision 4 of section 2 of the Criminal Syndicalism Act of this state is unconstitutional, as violating the right of free assembly. The court in that case carefully distinguished the statute there held unconstitutional from one previously held valid by the Supreme Court of New Jersey in the case of State v. Tachin, 92 N. J. Law, 269, 106 Atl. 145. The statute held unconstitutional denounced an organization "promoting or encouraging hostility or opposition to the government of the United States or to the state of New Jersey." This was held to violate the constitutional right of the people to freely assemble and consult together for the common good, etc. This decision has no application to a statute such as ours, which denounces organizations formed for the purpose of committing crimes against persons and property in furtherance of political or industrial changes. Our statute, on the contrary, is similar to that held constitutional in State v. Tachin, supra, and carefully distinguished in the later case of State v. Gabriel, supra. The decision by Judge Anderson in Colyer v. Skeffington, supra, represents the conclusion of that judge upon the evidence there submitted as to the character of the Communist Labor party, and as to whether or not it violates the federal statute authorizing the deportation of undesirable aliens. The question we are called upon to determine is whether the evidence is sufficient in this case to justify the finding of the jury that the Communist Labor party is such an organization as denounced by the law. As pointed out in the opinion of the District Court of Appeal, there was abundant evidence to sustain this conclusion by the jury. We approve and adopt the following conclusions of the District Court of Appeal:

[5] "Subdivision 4 of section 2 of the act provides that any one who organizes, or assists in organizing, or is, or knowingly becomes, a member of any organization, society, group, or assemblage of persons, organized or assembled to advocate, teach, or aid and abet criminal syndicalism, is guilty of a violation of the statute. The first count of the indictment upon which appellant was convicted is based upon this subdivision. He contends that the evidence does not support the finding of the jury and the verdict of imprisonment entered thereon. Under this phase of his appeal he attempts to narrow consideration to the question of whether or not the Communist Labor Party of California and the Communist Labor Party of America are organizations within the scope of the inhibitions of the Criminal Syndicalist Act. Stated in another way, as we understand appellant's position, his contention is that, in arriving at a decision in this matter, the jury based its decision largely upon its interpretation of the constitution, platform, and other documents setting forth the aims and objects of the communist parties, and that the construction of these documents was really a question of law for the court, and that, as a matter of law, the only evidence introduced in the case does not establish that the organizations named fall within the purview of the statute. This contention is plausible, but it is not sound, even if the issues were narrowed to the extent that the appellant would have us go. The authorities appear to be all to the contrary. Were it only necessary in the instant case to determine the beliefs, plans, and prospective actions of a large number of people organized in so-called political parties it would be a question of fact. Colyer v. Skeffington (D. C.) 265 Fed. 17, 56. Whether or not the Communist Labor Party of America, particularly the Communist Labor Party of California, in the organization of the latter of which appellant took part, were organized to advocate, teach, aid, and abet criminal syndicalism, was for the jury to determine, and not for the court to infer as a matter of law. Kumpula v. United States, 261 Fed. 49, 51, 171 C. C. A. 645; Pierce v. United States, 40 Sup. Ct. 205, 209, 252 U. S. 239, 64 L. Ed. 542; Shenck v. United States, 249 U. S. 47, 52, 39 Sup. Ct. 247, 63 L. Ed. 470; State v. Moilen, 140 Minn. 112, 167 N. W. 345, 348, 1 A. L. R. 331; People v. Malley, 194 Pac. 48.

"There was evidence in this case from which the jury might not be, and evidently were not, willing to draw as favorable conclusions of the aims and objects of the so-called political parties to which defendant belonged, as the appellant would have us reach. Again, the activities of the appellant do not appear to have been merely confined to his being 'in a minor capacity one of the organizers of the Communist Labor Party of America,' and taking 'a prominent part in the organization of the Communist Labor Party of California.' It appears from the record that he was at one time a member of the Industrial Workers of the World, an organization commonly known as the I. W. W. When his membership in that organization ceased, if it ever did, does not clearly appear from the record. He was also state secretary and organizer for the socialist party. He conceived and broached to Alverson, a state organizer for the party, and who was a witness for the people, a plan to gain control of the 'Local' of the socialist party, with which they were affiliated, by inducing and securing a large number of members of the Industrial Workers of the World to become members of the socialist organization, thereby affording the opportunity of transforming the socialist party from a political to a revolutionary party. With others, Taylor was a delegate to a gathering or convention of a faction, or 'left wing,' of the socialist party which met in Chicago. Dissension appears to have arisen in the meeting, and a portion of the delegates either withdrew or were excluded from its deliberations. They repaired to the hall of the I. W. W. in Chicago and proceeded to organize the Communist Labor Party of America. The constitution, platform, and manifesto of that organization were admitted in evidence, as were a number of reports of the proceedings of that so-called party.

"In the platform and program of the Communist Labor party the organization declares itself in 'complete accord with the principles of communism, as laid down in the Manifesto of the Third International formed at Moscow,' and calls upon the working class to organize and train itself for the capture of state power by the establishment 'of organs of administration created and controlled by the masses themselves, such, as, for example, the Soviets of Russia.' The platform also declares for the transfer of private property and the means of production and distribution to the working class government, to be administered by the workers themselves, and calls upon the revolutionary working class movements of all countries to closely unite. That manifesto advocates 'the disarming of the bourgeois at the proper time, the arming of laborers and the formation of a Communist army as the protector of the rule of the proletariat and the inviolability of the social structure.' Such, according to the manifesto, is the red army of Soviet Russia, which is declared to be inseparable from the soviet state. 'Conquest of political power,' according to the manifesto, 'means not merely a change in the personnel of ministries, but annihilation of the enemy's apparatus of government; disarmament of the bourgeois, of the counter-revolutionary officers, of the White Guard; arming of the proletariat, the revolutionary soldiers, the Red Guard of Workingmen; displacement of all bourgeois judges and organization of proletarian courts; elimination of control by reactionary government officials and substitution of new organs of management of the proletariat.' The revolutionary era, according to the manifesto, 'compels the proletariat to make use of the means of battle, which will concentrate its entire energies, namely, mass action, with its logical resultant, direct conflict with the governmental machinery in open combat. All other methods, such as revolutionary use of bourgeois parliamentarism, will be of only secondary significance.' For an interesting discussion of the effect of these declarations, see U. S. v. Wallis (D. C.) 268 Fed. 413.

"In its program, which appears to be part of its platform, the Communist Labor party favors international alliance only with the communist groups of other countries, those which have affiliated with the communist international. It also favors organized party activity and co-operation with 'class-conscious industrial unions, in order to unify industrial and political class-conscious propaganda and action, and advocates conduct of the communist propaganda and organization in the shops and to encourage the workers to organize in one big union.' Then follows the declaration that, 'in any mention of revolutionary unionism in this country, there must be recognition of the immense effect upon the American labor movement of the propaganda and example of the Industrial Workers of the World, whose long and valiant struggles and heroic sacrifices in the class war have earned the respect and affection of all workers everywhere. We greet the revolutionary industrial proletariat of America, and pledge them our whole-hearted support and co-operation in their struggles against the capitalist class.'

"Upon the return of Taylor and the other delegates to the Chicago convention to Oakland, steps were taken to form, and there was organized, the Communist Labor Party of California, which was closely allied with, and apparently became an integral part of, the parent organization. There seems to be no doubt that its aims, objects, and purposes were in full accord and in entire sympathy with the platform and principles of that body, including its allegiance to the soviet movement in Russia. At the outset of the organization meeting, those present gave three cheers for the Bolsheviki, and the appellant also led the meeting in singing songs, one of which called upon:

"'All who right and justice seek,
Burst your bonds no longer weak,
Unite and join the Bolshevik.
Rise! Rise! Rise!'

"Taylor took an active part in the organization of this body. The Oakland local of the socialist party, with which appellant seems to have been allied, seceded from that organization and went into the Communist Labor party. The appellant outlined an ambitious plan concerning the tactics to be used in accomplishing the ends of the Communist Labor party. His plan, according to his program, was to bring about a general strike of the workers in all industries and in all governmental offices. The army and navy and the police forces of the country would be paralyzed by the general strike and the failure of telephones and telegraphs, the railroads and food supply. The 'Red Guard,' of which he was to be the organizer, was to step in and immediately take control of all state, county, and city offices which were to be ruled and governed by those who were in the 'inner circle,' or those who were to be recognized as leaders of the revolution. This 'Red Guard,' according to the testimony, was to be in process of organization through those interested in the revolution, to be assembled the moment the general strike was called. This inner circle of leaders of the revolution was designated by the number '77.' Taylor referred to the uprising as the 'bloody revolution.' The Red Guard, it was planned, would seize the police stations and take the banks, moving all the currency and coin to one central place, there to be held by the guard. All newspapers in the locality were to be seized, except one, which, 'as a matter of revolutionary tactics,' should be spared as a medium of spreading the propaganda of the revolutionists. Advantage was to be taken by the party of the alleged unrest caused by German propaganda and discontent among soldiers returning from the war. The Red Guard, according to Taylor, had spies in the ranks of the American Legion and in and around the police department and in the various offices of the city hall in Oakland. Members of the inner circle had selected hiding places on the Mendocino coast and in the Sacramento valley to utilize in case of emergency.

"In outlining his further plans, according to the testimony, Taylor disclaimed any hope of success of political change through the ballot, and advocated getting results by force. He favored sabotage as a weapon of the working class against the employers and capitalists, such as pulling up rails and derailing trains in railroad strikes, destroying machinery in factory disturbances, and wrecking street cars in traction troubles. He also advocated burning hay stacks in order to bring the farmers to terms. During the time he was advocating all such measures, Taylor was active in the work of the Communist Labor party.

"Appellant attacks the veracity of the witness Alverson, from whose lips much of the foregoing testimony was elicited, and at the trial attempted to discredit a number of other witnesses. We are not concerned with that question here. The credibility of the various witnesses and the weight to be given to their testimony were matters resting entirely with the jury.

"In addition to the foregoing evidence it was shown that the headquarters of the Communist Labor party in the city of Oakland had been continually under the surveillance of the police authorities and agents of the federal Department of Justice. A newspaper, called 'The World' was established there for the purpose of disseminating the propaganda of the organization. In the hallways of the headquarters were news stands on which were displayed and from which were sold books, pamphlets, and newspapers. The meeting room of the party was in a hall adjoining. Eventually the place was raided, and the police authorities seized a mass of documents and files and carried away a large number of books and pamphlets and a miscellaneous assortment of literature and publications, including copies of The World and other papers, which appears to have been devoted to disseminating the propaganda of the Communist Labor party. Copies of the publications and documents were admitted in evidence. There was also admitted in evidence, over the objection of defendants, a number of books and publications having to do with the Industrial Workers of the World. There were books on 'Sabotage,' by Elizabeth Gurly Flynn, Walker C. Smith and Emil Pouget; 'I. W. W., Its History, Methods, etc.,' 'Revolutionary I. W. W.,' works on syndicalism, reports of the I. W. W. convention, and books and songs of the organization. Other documentary evidence of like nature was also admitted.

[6] "Appellant objected to the introduction of this evidence on the ground that it was in no way shown to be indorsed by or a part of the propaganda or platform of the Communist Labor Party, and also on the ground that it was not shown to be the property of, or in any way connected with, either himself or the organization. The court admitted the various publication of this evidence on the ground that it was material to show the purpose, and expressly limited it for the purpose of establishing the nature, aims, and objects of the Industrial Workers of the World in view of the approval of that organization and what it accomplished in the platform of the Communist Labor party. We think this was a correct ruling. It also had a tendency to connect the defendant, more or less intimately, with the organization of the so-called Red Guard, in which, according to the witness Alverson, he was industriously engaged.

"The appellant was also found guilty under the fourth count of the indictment, which charged that he did, by personal acts and conduct, commit acts advised, advocated, taught, and aided and abetted by the doctrine and precepts of criminal syndicalism, with intent to accomplish a change in industrial ownership and control, and effecting a political change. We are unable to see how conviction of the defendant on that charge can be sustained. The allegation was framed under the fifth subdivision of section 2 of the act, by reference to which it will be noted that it deals with the commission, by personal act or conduct, of any of the things prohibited by the statute, and which are held to amount to the practice of criminal syndicalism. It is not shown that the defendant committed any unlawful act of force or violence, or that he personally, or with others, directed or took part in any 'unlawful methods of terrorism.' It is undoubtedly true, as the record clearly indicates, that the defendant was guilty of advocating sabotage, violence, and unlawful methods of terrorism as a means of accomplishing changes in industrial ownership and control, and effecting political changes. For that reason we are unable to understand why the jury was unable to agree upon a verdict under the second count of the indictment. We are equally unable to comprehend how it arrived at a verdict of guilty under the evidence and instructions of the court upon the fourth count. There is no evidence to warrant conviction upon that charge.

[8] "Appellant complains of the refusal of the court to give certain instructions requested by him. Examination of these instructions clearly demonstrates that they go far afield from the issues involved in this case, and were, in the main, properly refused for that reason. The general right of the masses to strike, and the propriety or impropriety of extending sympathy to the soviet government of Russia, were not issues in this case. Certain portions of the requested instructions which were refused by the court, if segregated, might properly have been given, but the matters there involved were sufficiently covered by other instructions which the court gave. The charge appears to have been fair and comprehensive.

"As to the first count of the indictment, the judgment and the orders denying the motions in arrest of judgment and for a new trial are, and each is, affirmed. As to the fourth count, the judgment and said orders are reversed."

[9] As the case must be sent back for a new trial upon the fourth count other points will be considered which may arise on the new trial. With reference to the sufficiency of the fourth count, we hold that it does not state an offense because of its utter failure to state generally or specifically any crime or crimes alleged to have been committed by the defendant in furtherance of a change of industrial ownership or of political control. A demurrer thereto should have been sustained. As to the second and third counts of the indictment, we do not wish to be understood as holding that an indictment couched in the language of the statute is sufficient where the charge made relates to the advocacy of doctrines or the publication and circulation of books, etc. As each separate act and publication would constitute separate and distinct violations of the statute, the specific acts charged should be designated in the information with certainty. Without such information it would be impossible for the defendant to make his defense, and such information is always given and required in indictments for libel, fraud, and similar offenses.

The difficulty resulting from the form of indictment used in this case was very well illustrated by the following colloquy which occurred when the jury returned into court after seven hours' deliberation:

"The Court: Ladies and gentlemen of the jury, have you agreed upon a verdict?

"The Foreman: Your honor, we are not ready. We wish some further instructions or interpretation of a portion of the indictment. Some of us don't seem to be able to quite grasp the meaning of the wording, and we were rather wandering in the dark, because we don't know what it means.

"The Court: I don't know that the court could go very far, other than read the indictment to you. You might state the question that you desire to be instructed upon.

"The Foreman: Shall I read this portion of the indictment some of us do not understand?

"The Court: What?

"The Foreman: Should I read the portion—

"The Court: I don't know that there is any particular objection to your reading it. You may read it if you desire.

"The Foreman: This indictment charges that Mr. Taylor did then and there unlawfully—this is the portion that we do not understand: 'By spoken and written words, and by personal conduct, advocate, teach, aid, and abet criminal syndicalism, and the duty, necessity, and propriety of committing crime, sabotage, violence, and unlawful methods of terrorism as a means of accomplishing a change in industrial ownership and control, and as a means of effecting a political change. * * *'

"The Foreman: And then going to the other portion of the third count: 'That the said John C. Taylor did then and there unlawfully, willfully, wrongfully'—this is the part—'by spoken and written words justify and attempt to justify criminal syndicalism, and the commission and attempt to commit crime, sabotage, violence, and unlawful methods of terrorism, with intent then and there to approve, advocate, and further the doctrine of criminal syndicalism. * * *'

"The Foreman: This is the portion we do not understand. They don't both mean the same thing."

The court thereupon read sections 1 and 2 of the Criminal Syndicalism Act and the instructions given on the second and third counts of the indictment, and read the third count of the indictment as follows:

"And the said John C. Taylor is accused by the grand jury of said county of Alameda, by this indictment, of the crime of felony, to wit, a violation of an act entitled 'An act defining criminal syndicalism and sabotage, prescribing certain acts and methods in connection therewith, and in pursuance thereof, and providing penalties and punishments therefor,' approved April 30, 1919, committed as follows: That the said John C. Taylor, prior to the time of finding this indictment, and on or about the 28th day of November, A. D. 1919, at the said county of Alameda, state of California, did then and there unlawfully, willfully, wrongfully, deliberately, and feloniously, by spoken and written words, justify and attempt to justify criminal syndicalism, and the commission and attempt to commit crime, sabotage, violence, and unlawful methods of terrorism, with intent then and there to approve, advocate and further the doctrine of criminal syndicalism.

"If you are satisfied, to and beyond all reasonable doubt, that the said John C. Taylor, on or about the time alleged in the indictment, and within three years prior to the finding thereof, in the county of Alameda, did then and there, by either spoken or written words, justify or attempt to justify criminal syndicalism, as that term has been defined in the statute referred to, or the commission or attempt to commit crime, or sabotage, or violence, or unlawful methods of terrorism, with intent then and there to approve or advocate or further the doctrine of criminal syndicalism, then, and in such case, you should find the defendant guilty under such third count.

"Let me repeat, ladies and gentlemen of the jury, do you feel any clearer now than you did before on the questions that were bothering you concerning these two counts? The second count in the language, that you have mentioned, Mr. Rowe, reads: 'And by personal conduct advocate, teach, aid, and abet criminal syndicalism, and the duty, necessity, and propriety of committing crime, sabotage, violence, and unlawful methods of terrorism as a means of accomplishing a change in industrial ownership and control, and as a means of effecting a political change.'

"Foreman H. D. Rowe: Yes, your honor.

"The Court: That is the second count. You will see that it speaks, or charges the defendant, rather, that he did then and there, by spoken and written words, and by personal conduct, advocate, teach, aid, and abet criminal syndicalism, and the duty, necessity, and propriety of committing crime, sabotage, violence, and unlawful methods of terrorism, as a means of accomplishing a change in industrial ownership and control, and as a means of effecting a political change. And the language in the third count that you have pointed out reads as follows—or charges in the following language: 'Did then and there unlawfully, willfully, wrongfully, deliberately, and feloniously, by spoken and written words, justify and attempt to justify criminal syndicalism, and the commission and attempt to commit crime, sabotage, violence, and unlawful methods of terrorism, with intent then and there to approve, advocate, and further the doctrine of criminal syndicalism.'

"The Court: Do you see the difference now, ladies and gentlemen of the jury?

"A Juror: I do your honor.

"The Court: And the other ladies and gentlemen of the jury, do they see the difference in these two counts?

"The Second Juror: They are so much alike.

"The Court: You understand the language itself, do you not?

"The Second Juror: Yes, your honor.

"The Court: One speaks of willfully, wrongfully, deliberately, and feloniously, by spoken and written words, justify and attempt to commit crime, sabotage, violence, and unlawful methods of terrorism with intent then and there to approve, advocate, and further the doctrine of criminal syndicalism, and the other count in the language pointed out charges that the defendant did then and there unlawfully, willfully, deliberately, and feloniously, by spoken and written words and by personal conduct, advocate, teach, aid, and abet criminal syndicalism, and the duty, necessity, and propriety of committing crime, sabotage, violence, and unlawful methods of terrorism, as a means of accomplishing a change in industrial ownership and control, and as a means of effecting a political change. It would seem that that count charges the defendant with—that the defendant by spoken and written words and personal conduct advocated, taught, aided, and abetted criminal syndicalism, and the duty, necessity, and propriety of committing crime, sabotage, violence, and unlawful methods of terrorism as a means of effecting a change in industrial ownership and control, and as a means of effecting a political change, while the other count, in the language that no attention has been drawn to, charges that he did then and there unlawfully, willfully, wrongfully, deliberately, and feloniously, by spoken and written words, justify and attempt to justify criminal syndicalism, and the commission and attempt to commit crime, sabotage, violence and unlawful methods of terrorism, with intent then and there to approve, advocate, and further the doctrine of criminal syndicalism. Are you satisfied now, do you believe, ladies and gentlemen?

"The Foreman: I am.

"The Court: And you and each of you? (The jury answer in the affirmative.)

"The Court: Very well. I hope I have made it plain in discussing or rather, giving the instructions. I kept close to the legal verbiage for the reason that it was the proper thing and the duty of the court, and the court had to do it. I do not desire to analyze the language of the count, since it is in the lawful words and terms that you find it in." (Italics ours.)

Thirty-five minutes after these instructions were given the jury returned with a verdict against the defendant on two counts. They could not agree on the other counts.

In addition thereto there was evidence of speeches and debates participated in by the defendant. There is no reason why the rule pertaining to the trial of libel cases could not be equally applicable to a trial of criminal syndicalism, so far as the relative duty of court and jury with reference to interpretation of documentary evidence is concerned. In a libel case, where the language of the article published is clear, and definite, the court should say whether or not it is a libelous article. Van Vactor v. Walkup, 46 Cal. 124; Tonini v. Cevasco, 114 Cal. 266, 46 Pac. 103; Mellen v. Times-Mirror Co., 167 Cal. 587, 140 Pac. 277, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 766.

On the other hand, if the instrument is susceptible of two different interpretations, one of which would be libelous and the other not, it would be for the jury to say, on proper instruction from the court, whether or not the article is libelous under all the circumstances and proofs of the case. Van Vactor v. Walkup, supra; Tonini v. Cevasco, supra; Mellen v. Times-Mirror Co., supra. If a pamphlet, newspaper, or article circulated by the defendant is in plain and unequivocal terms, it is the duty of the court to construe the meaning and effect of the document for the benefit of the jury.

It appears from the colloquy above quoted as well as from the general tenor of the instructions given by the court, that the trial judge felt that it was a more conservative, if not a necessary, course, to confine the instructions and observations of the court to the general language of the statute and indictment. In view of the general and comprehensive character of these statements, the jury should have been more definitely informed, not only concerning the nature of the charge, but the character of the evidence sufficient to support the charge. It is evident that the trial court took the view that the statute was dealing with a course of conduct on the part of the defendant; that is to say, if the defendant in various ways, by pamphlets, by speech, by circulars, newspapers and posters advocated sabotage, this course of conduct in its sum total constituted a violation of the law. On the contrary, as already pointed out here and in the case of People v. Steelik, supra, each separate act constitutes a crime. The only way in which the sum total of these acts can properly be presented under one charge is where they resulted in the actual commission of crime or are a part of propaganda carried on by an organization, and are thus pertinent, not for the purpose of showing the separate acts of crime, but for the purpose of proving the character of the organization with which the defendant has wrongfully affiliated himself.

In view of the general nature of the charges, of the wide scope of the evidence, and the lack of definiteness in the instructions, we would unhesitatingly reverse the judgment if there had been a conviction on counts 2 or 3. We do not agree with the contention of the Attorney General that a charge under this statute in the language of the statute is sufficient. It is true that as to many crimes an indictment in the exact language of the statute is sufficient, but the fundamental rule which controls in the interpretation of the indictment is that announced in section 959, subdivision 6, of the Penal Code:

> "That the act or omission charged as the offense is clearly and distinctly set forth in ordinary and concise language, without repetition, and in such a manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended." (Italics ours.)

The indictment in this case is no more illuminating in that regard as to counts 1, 2, 3, and 4 than if the defendant had been merely charged with "violating the statute defining criminal syndicalism found in the statutes of 1919, p. 281." This is clearly insufficient.

The suggestions herein contained as to the sufficiency of the indictment as to counts 2 and 3 are made because it is clear from the many informations and indictments called to our attention that district attorneys generally are using the general language of the statute in indictments under the Criminal Syndicalism Act. And, in such cases it is manifest that great injustice may be done a defendant by a mass of evidence which may establish the commission of many different offenses not called to the attention of the defendant with sufficient clearness to enable him to prepare an intelligent defense thereto. This is particularly true where a mass of documentary evidence is admitted to establish the character of the organization to which it is alleged the defendant belongs, and where there is also a general charge of criminal syndicalism under the subdivisions 1 and 2 of section 2.

As pointed out in People v. N. Steelik, supra, there is no essential difference between "advocating" and "justifying" crime. Either charge covers the other. Hence subdivisions 1 and 2 of section 2 do not state separate offenses.

While appellate courts may be compelled in many cases to affirm convictions under this law, because of article 6, § 4½, of the Constitution, because there is no miscarriage of justice in the particular case under review, this fact ought not to encourage a system of pleading or practice under which proper notice of the nature of the offense is given by accident rather than by design. It is well to remember in this type of case that, while the defendants may be charged with an attempt to destroy this government, they are as much entitled to its protection, until convicted of crime as any other citizen or individual, and one of these fundamental rights is that when they are charged with crime they should know the particular crime they are charged with.

The judgment is affirmed as to count 1 and reversed as to count 4.

WEEKS v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA, IN AND FOR ALAMEDA COUNTY. (S. F. 9906.)

1. Divorce ⚷170—Final decree not granted as of course.

It is within the contemplation of Civ. Code, § 132, as to final decree one year after interlocutory decree, that facts arising subsequently to the granting of the interlocutory judgment should have their influence in determining the right to a final decree.

2. Contempt ⚷80—Party in contempt cannot secure aid of court.

No party to an action can ask the aid and assistance of a court in hearing his demands while he stands in an attitude of contempt to its legal orders and processes.

3. Contempt ⚷80—Defendant disobeying order as to child's custody cannot secure final decree.

Where, by the terms of the interlocutory decree, the court determined that the husband was entitled to a divorce and awarded him the custody of the minor child of the parties, and defendant wife thereupon left the state with the child, held, she could not procure the entry of final decree at the expiration of a year after the interlocutory decree, under Civ. Code, § 132, while still remaining with the child outside the state so that the court's decree as to the child's custody could not be enforced.

WASTE, J. The petitioner seeks a writ of mandate to compel the respondent to grant her a final decree of divorce. the court relating to the custody of a child of the marriage, and is, therefore, in contempt of court.

The petitioner is the defendant in an action for divorce brought against her by her husband on the ground of extreme cruelty. When the action came on for trial she was represented in court by counsel, and she and the minor child of the marriage were in the state and within the jurisdiction of the Superior court. By the terms of the interlocutory decree the court determined that the husband was entitled to a divorce, and awarded him the custody and control of the minor. On the day of the trial, and after the decree was granted, the petitioner, without the consent or permission of the court or of the plaintiff in the action, removed the minor from the state, where she has kept the child ever since. When one year expired after the entry of the interlocutory judgment, the petitioner, without coming into the state, applied to the respondent, through an attorney, for the entry of a final judgment granting the divorce. Her application was opposed by the plaintiff in the action on the facts stated, and upon the ground that petitioner is in contempt of court in keeping the minor outside the jurisdiction of the superior court to prevent him from gaining possession of the child in accordance with the court's decree. Petitioner made no attempt to controvert these facts or the allegation as to her motive.

[1-3] We think the respondent was right in refusing to enter the final decree of divorce. Section 132 of the Civil Code provides that when one year has expired after the entry of the interlocutory decree the court, on motion of either party, or upon its own motion, may enter the final judgment granting the divorce. But that does not mean that a party to the action may have a final decree entered when to do so would be a flagrant abuse of the principles of equity and of the due administration of justice. It is within the contemplation of the section that facts arising subsequently to the granting of the interlocutory judgment should have their influence in determining the right to a final decree. Olson v. Superior Court, 175 Cal. 250, 252, 165 Pac. 706, 1 A. L. R. 1589. When one becomes a voluntary actor before a court and seeks the court's aid, it is manifestly just and proper that in invoking that aid he should submit himself to all legitimate orders and processes. No party to an action can, with right or reason, ask the aid and assistance of a court in hearing his demands while he stands in an attitude of contempt to its legal orders and processes. O'Neill v. Thomas Day Co., 152 Cal. 357, 362, 92 Pac. 856, 14 Ann. Cas. 970. "No rule of law seems more widely prevalent or better established than that a court whose authority has been put to naught will extend no favors or privileges to the party in contempt until he has acknowledged its authority by purging the offense." 4 Ency. Pl. and Pr. 805; 13 Corpus Juris, 91; Winter v. Superior Court, 70 Cal. 295, 11 Pac. 633; Monterey Coal Co. v. Superior Court, 11 Cal. App. 207, 104 Pac. 585; Smith v. Smith, 18 Wash. 158, 51 Pac. 355; Campbell v. Justices of the Superior Court, 187 Mass. 509, 73 N. E. 659, 69 L. R. A. 311, 2 Ann. Cas. 462; White v. White, 148 App. Div. 883, 132 N. Y. Sup. 1043.

The identical situation presented by this application was but recently considered by the Supreme Court of Washington. Pending the determination of a divorce action the superior court of that state ordered the plaintiff, the wife, to keep the child of the parties to the action within the jurisdiction of the court. She failed to comply with the order and moved the court for a voluntary dismissal of her action. The court refused to entertain the motion for the reason that the plaintiff was at the time in contempt of court for failure to obey its order. The plaintiff thereupon sought a writ of mandate to compel the superior court to hear and grant her motion. The Supreme Court held that the statute of Washington conferred an absolute right upon the plaintiff in the action to dismiss her action, but that as she was in contempt, she would not be allowed to present her motion to dismiss until she cleared herself of that contempt. State ex rel. Hunter v. Ronald, 106 Wash. 413, 180 Pac. 125. So, in this case, the petitioner has treated the order of the court with contempt and removed herself and the minor from the jurisdiction so that it cannot be enforced. She should not be allowed to make application for final decree of divorce until she has submitted to the lawful order of the superior court in relation to the custody of the child of the parties to the action or otherwise purged herself of the contempt.

The application for the writ is denied.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY ASSUR. CORPORATION, Limited, et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. (S. F. 9839.)

1. Master and servant 🔑347 — Workmen's compensation confined to relation of employer and employee.

Const. art. 20, § 21, as to workmen's compensation, does not give the Legislature power to create and enforce a liability on the part of any one not an employer to compensate persons not his employees, nor to create courts or commissions having judicial power for the settlement of disputes concerning such liability between persons not sustaining the relation of employer and employee, and is not changed in this respect by its amendment in 1918.

2. Master and servant 🔑361—Compensation award to partner as employee unauthorized.

Where claimant's own testimony showed that he was a partner of the firm by which he claimed to be employed, in that he performed his part of the business of the firm without wages, receiving his only reward therefor out of an equal division of the firm profits, the fact that his name was among the employees of the firm on the firm's workmen's compensation policy, and that the insurance carrier received benefits in the way of additional premium because his name was added to the list of employees in the policy, did not give the Industrial Accident Commission power to award him compensation as an employee, for whether or not the insurance company would be estopped to deny liability to claimant as an employee covered by the policy in another form of proceeding, no such estoppel would confer jurisdiction to make such an award upon the Commission, a tribunal with powers limited to awarding compensation to claimants who are employees in fact.

3. Courts 🔑24—Jurisdiction of subject-matter not conferred either by agreement or estoppel.

Jurisdiction of the subject-matter of a controversy cannot be conferred on a tribunal of limited powers either by the direct agreement of the parties or by an estoppel growing out of such agreement.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by W. L. Williams, as employee, opposed by Employers' Liability Assurance Corporation, Limited, insurance carrier, and Green & Williams, a copartnership, employers. The Industrial Accident Commission awarded compensation to claimant, and the insurance carrier and employers apply for certiorari to review the Commission's order. Award annulled.

R. P. Wisecarver and Redman & Alexander, all of San Francisco, for petitioners.

A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco, for respondent Commission.

Courtney L. Moore, of San Francisco, for respondent Williams.

RICHARDS, Justice pro tem. This proceeding was instituted by the petitioners herein to review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission granting compensation to W. L. Williams, one of the respondents herein. There is no dispute as to the facts upon which this proceeding is predicated. W. L. Williams was a partner in the firm of Green & Williams, copartners, engaged in the rock-crushing business and employing several men. The duties of Williams as a member of said firm were those of working with the men in the gravel pit, while the duties of Green, the other member of the copartnership, were those of attending to the selling and collecting business of the firm. Each was an equal partner, neither receiving wages, but deriving his benefits from the association solely out of the profits of the business. The petitioner herein was the insurance carrier of the firm under the terms of a policy issued by it, which policy, as to most of its provisions, was in the usual printed form, apparently intended for general use throughout the United States where workmen's compensation laws existed, with addenda attached thereto referring particularly to the provisions of the California law upon the subject. In this policy of insurance there was inserted the following clause:

> "Pay roll for Comp. to include drivers and drivers' helpers, also chauffeurs and chauffeurs' helpers.
> "Including William L. Williams at an amount not exceeding $1,666 per annum. All others excluded."

W. L. Williams was injured while at work in the gravel pit during the life of this policy, and made application to the Industrial Accident Commission for an award, naming the firm of which he was a member and its insurance carrier as the respondents in said application. An answer was filed by the said respondents, denying the jurisdiction of the Commission over said proceeding, and also denying that the applicant was in the employ of said firm, and alleging that upon the date of his injury said applicant was not earning more than the minimum amount upon which compensation is based under the Workmen's Compensation Act. Upon the hearing before the Commission it made an award to the applicant of $20.83 a week for 240 weeks, and $12.82 a week for the remainder of his life, together with the sum of $708.22 accrued from the date of his injury to the date of said award. The award states:

> "That the foregoing weekly benefit is based upon wages exceeding the maximum at which compensation shall be computed."

The insurance carrier applied for a rehearing before the Commission, which was denied, whereupon it instituted this proceeding, seeking the annulment of the foregoing award.

The petitioner's first contention is that W. L. Williams was not an employee of the firm of Green & Williams, and hence the Industrial Accident Commission could have no jurisdiction over his case. It must be concluded that as to the facts of the case, the undisputed evidence showed that W. L. Williams was not an employee of the copartnership of Green & Williams of which he was an equal member, performing without wages his part of the work and business of said firm, and receiving and to receive his only reward therefor out of an equal division of the profits thereof. There had been no profits earned by said copartnership up to the date of the applicant's injury. While he had withdrawn some small amounts from the firm, these were, according to his own testimony, in the nature of loans, some portion of which he had repaid from other resources. Section 21 of article 20 of the state Constitution, as it read prior to 1918, provided:

> "The Legislature may by appropriate legislation create and enforce a liability on the part of all employers to compensate their employees for any injury incurred by the said employees in the course of their employment, irrespective of the fault of either party. The Legislature may provide for the settlement of any disputes arising under the legislation contemplated by this section by arbitration, or by an industrial accident board, by the courts or by either any or all of these agencies, anything in this Constitution to the contrary notwithstanding."

[1, 2] It has been held by this court in several recent cases that the Legislature had no power under this clause of the Constitution to create and enforce a liability on the part of any person not an employer to compensate persons who do not sustain to him the relation of employee, and that the Legislature under said section had no power to create courts or commissions having judicial power for the settlement of disputes concerning such liability between persons who did not sustain the relation of employer and employee to each other. Carstens v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 572, 158 Pac. 218; Pacific G. & El. Co. v. Industrial Accident Comn., 180 Cal. 497, 181 Pac. 788. Each of these cases had reference to liabilities arising out of and during a partnership relation, and in each of which it was decided that the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act wherein it was attempted to invest the Industrial Accident Commission with jurisdiction to hear and determine such cases were unconstitutional and void. In the year 1918 the foregoing section of the Constitution was amended so as to broaden the powers of the Legislature "to create and enforce a complete system of workmen's compensation, by appropriate legislation." Whatever the effect of this amendment to the Constitution may be in other respects, its primary object remains that of dealing, and of authorizing the Legislature to deal, with the subject of workmen's compensation. In that respect it purports to be no broader in its scope than the section of the Constitution above quoted and which it replaced. This being so, the above-cited decisions of this court defining the powers of the Legislature under said former clause in the Constitution still remain as to the particular point at issue here in full force and effect. The respondent herein concedes the force of these decisions, but undertakes to avoid their effect by showing that in the policy of insurance issued to the firm of Green & Williams, said W. L. Williams was expressly mentioned and listed among the employees of said firm, and it is the respondent's contention that the name of W. L. Williams having been thus inserted in said policy among the employees of the firm, even though he was not in fact such employee, and that said insurance carrier having received benefits in the way of added premium by virtue of the insertion of the name of said Williams in said policy as such an employee, were sufficient to give the Industrial Accident Commission jurisdiction to determine the fact as to whether said Williams was or was not an employee of his own firm. This contention is based upon the showing that the Workmen's Compensation Act embraces certain sections which provide that working members of partnerships receiving wages, irrespective of profit from said partnership, shall be deemed employees thereof, and which also undertake to give the Commission jurisdiction to determine controversies arising out of insurance policies issued to self-employing persons. Workmen's Compensation Act, 1917, §§ 8b, 57b (St. 1917, pp. 835, 869). Even if it were to be conceded that such a stipulation between the insured and the insurance carrier could suffice to confer jurisdiction upon the Industrial Accident Commission to hear and determine the question as to whether the person named as an employee therein is or is not such an employee as would be entitled to the benefits of the act, it would avail the applicant in this proceeding nothing since the undisputed evidence shows that he was not in fact an employee of the partnership of which he was was a member. His own testimony before the Commission is conclusive upon this subject, and brings the case squarely within the above authorities so as to compel an annulment of this award.

estoppels arising therefrom in no way affecting the question of the jurisdiction of tribunals to hear and determine such controversies. On the other hand, it has been held in this state that a surety company is not estopped to deny liability upon a void obligation by reason of the fact that it has executed the same and received the benefits thereof. Loop L. Co. v. Van Loben Sels et al., 173 Cal. 228, 159 Pac. 600; Shaughnessy v. American Surety Co., 138 Cal. 543, 69 Pac. 250, 71 Pac. 701; Coburn v. Townsend, 103 Cal. 233, 37 Pac. 202. The case of Kennedy v. Kennedy Mfg. Co., 177 App. Div. 56, 163 N. Y. Supp. 944, is the only case cited by petitioner bearing upon the question at issue here. That was a case arising under the Workmen's Compensation Act of New York, and the court held that the insurer in that case was estopped to deny that the applicant was an employee of the insured corporation when he had been listed as such employee in the insurance policy. This ruling, however, was not necessary to the decision of that case, since it clearly appeared that, irrespective of the terms of the policy, the applicant was, upon the facts, an employee of the corporation. That case is therefore not authority for the respondent's contention in the instant case. Upon principle it must be held that jurisdiction of the subject-matter of a controversy cannot be conferred upon a tribunal of limited powers either by the direct agreement of the parties or by an estoppel growing out of such agreement. 15 Corpus Juris, p. 844, § 164; Lindsay-Strathmore I. Dist. v. Superior Court, 182 Cal. 334, 187 Pac. 1056. Upon the facts of this case the applicant for this award was not an employee of the copartnership of which he was a member at the time of his injury. The Industrial Accident Commission had therefore no jurisdiction to entertain his application or to make the award. Whether or not W. L. Williams would have a right of recovery in the ordinary courts of law upon any obligation on the part of the insurer arising out of the terms of this policy and of his injuries is a matter which we are not called upon to determine in this proceeding.

The award is annulled.

MORE v. HUTCHINSON. (S. F. 9836.)

1. Corporations 🔑264—No liability to creditor where one corporation assumes indebtedness of another until creditor accepts the offer thereby made.

Where one corporation assumes an indebtedness of another corporation, the contract between the corporations, as far as the creditor is concerned, amounts to a mere offer, and as affecting the time of accrual of liability of stockholders there is no liability to the creditor on the corporation assuming the indebtedness until the creditor accepts, by suit or otherwise.

2. Corporations 🔑264—Action on note held to accrue only on acceptance by creditor of agreement to assume.

Where a corporation was formed to take over the assets and assume the indebtedness of another corporation, including an obligation evidenced by a note, there was no liability on the part of a stockholder of the new corporation until the holder of the note assented to or accepted the agreement, and an action against a stockholder was not barred until three years after such acceptance and assent, expressed by acceptance of a new note from the new corporation, under Code Civ. Proc. § 359, Civ. Code, § 1559, and in this connection the new note cannot be considered a renewal of the old one, but constituted a new and independent contract.

3. Corporations 🔑264—Liability of stockholder not revived by renewal or extension.

Where a note is given by a corporation in renewal of an existing indebtedness of its own, the liability of stockholders of such company cannot be revived or extended beyond three years by such renewal or extension, under Code Civ. Proc. § 359.

Sloane, J., dissenting.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by J. L. More against Kate K. Hutchinson, as executrix of the last will and testament of Joseph Hutchinson, deceased. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. S. Hutchinson and Walter Slack, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Robert B. Gaylord, of San Francisco, for respondent.

WILBUR, J. This is an action to recover on a stockholder's statutory liability. The defense is that the cause of action is barred by the provisions of section 359, Code of Civil Procedure. Defendant is a stockholder in a corporation which assumed and agreed to pay an outstanding obligation of the Morris Real Estate Company. The question involved is as to whether or not the liability of the stockholders of the Palo Alto Investment Company, in which the defendant was a stockholder, accrued at the time of the assumption of this outstanding indebtedness or at the time of the execution of the note given by the latter company to the creditor.

note sued on, and not at the time of the assumption of the liability. In the petition for transfer to this court it was claimed that the decision was directly contrary to the established law in this state. The transfer was made in order that this point might receive further consideration. After such consideration we are satisfied with the opinion of the District Court, written by Mr. Justice Kerrigan, and adopt it as our own. It is true that our authorities uniformly hold that suit may be brought by the third person upon a contract entered into for its benefit immediately upon the execution of the contract, but this rule arises from the fact that the suit itself is deemed an acceptance of the contract. The true rule is that until such acceptance by the third person, there is no liability on the part of the person who assumes the indebtedness, but, as stated in the opinion of Mr. Justice Kerrigan, such contract, as far as the third person is concerned, amounts to a mere offer.

In addition to the authorities cited by the District Court of Appeal the following authorities support this view: Blake v. Atlantic National Bank, 33 R. I. 464, 82 Atl. 225, 39 L. R. A. (N. S.) 874, see note; Tweeddale v. Tweeddale, 116 Wis. 517, 93 N. W. 440, 61 L. R. A. 509, 96 Am. St. Rep. 1003; Zwietusch v. Becker, 153 Wis. 213, 140 N. W. 1056; see cases cited in Decennial Digest, Contracts, § 187, subd. 5.

Appellant insists that the case of Morgan v. Overman S. M. Co., 37 Cal. 534, 537, sustains his position. In that case suit was brought by a third party, and the bringing of the suit constituted an acceptance. Appellant quotes from Washer v. Independent Mining, etc., Co., 142 Cal. 702, 708, 76 Pac. 654, as holding that the obligation accrued at once in favor of the third person without an acceptance. The quotation in appellant's petition is taken from that opinion but is in turn a quotation from Brewer v. Dyer (Mass.) 7 Cush. 337. Turning to that decision we find it stated:

> "It seems to us that the case at bar falls clearly within them, and that the agreement in question, having been made for the benefit of Brewer on a sufficient consideration, and having been accepted and adopted by him, he can well maintain his action of assumpsit against the defendant." (Italics ours.)

Neither this Massachusetts case nor our own case are authority for the proposition that an acceptance is unnecessary.

The decision of the District Court of Appeal, hereby adopted, is as follows:

"This is an action to enforce a stockholder's liability. The proceeding was instituted by respondent as the holder of a promissory note of the Palo Alto Investment Company, a corporation, to enforce the liability of the appellant's testator as a stockholder of that company. Judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $1,371.83, and defendant as executor has appealed.

[2] "The defense urged at the trial was that the action was barred by the statute of limitations, and this is the sole question presented on this appeal.

"The facts are undisputed, and were established by stipulation at the trial. They may be briefly summarized as follows: The history of the transaction dates back to the year 1906. At that time one J. J. Morris and Marshall Black borrowed $7,500 from the Crocker National Bank, giving their note therefor. In 1908 this note was taken up by the individual note of Morris. In 1912 the Morris Real Estate Company assumed payment thereof. There was then due and unpaid thereon the sum of $5,545. In March of the same year the Palo Alto Investment Company was organized for the purpose of taking over the assets and liabilities of the Morris Company, and this arrangement was consummated at that time, and later, on April 29, 1912, the Palo Alto Investment Company executed an instrument, acknowledging receipt of a conveyance from the Morris Company of its assets, and in consideration of this transfer it thereupon agreed to assume the liabilities of that company, among which was the note in question. About seven months thereafter, and on December 4, 1912, the board of directors of the Palo Alto Company adopted a resolution to renew this promissory note by executing a new note for $5,545, payable to the Crocker Bank. The note was accordingly executed by the Palo Alto Company, drawn to its own order, indorsed by it in blank, and delivered to and accepted by the Crocker National Bank, which in turn subsequently transferred the note to plaintiff, who thereafter, on November 29, 1915, commenced this action. This was the last day of the three-year period established by section 359, Code Civ. Proc., when computing the time from the date of the note.

"It is appellant's contention that decedent's liability as a stockholder of the Palo Alto Investment Company to the Crocker Bank was created by the consummation of the agreement between the Morris Company, by which the former conveyed its assets to the latter, which in turn assumed the liabilities of the former, and that the stockholders' liability began to run from the date of this agreement. Respondent, on the other hand, insists that the indebtedness was incurred at the time the note was executed, and not before. There is no showing in the record that the bank ever knew of the existence of the obligation of the Palo Alto Company to assume the liabilities of the Morris Company, or that it ever assented to it in any way, or accepted its benefits or its burdens prior to the time that it might be charged with such knowledge by its acceptance of the note in suit.

"The contention of the appellant is based upon the doctrine laid down in Hunt v. Ward, 99 Cal. 612, 34 Pac. 335, 37 Am. St. Rep. 87, and subsequent cases, to the effect that actions based upon a stockholder's liability must be brought within three years after the liability is created. If the doctrine invoked can be made to apply to this case so as to successfully avail appellant, then a situation is presented of a person being made a party to a contract and foreclosed of certain rights thereunder, based upon facts of the existence of which he has absolutely no information or knowledge whatsoever, and to which he has never assented. We are cited to no authority supporting such a principle.

"There is no question that it is the settled law of this state that the statute of limitations begins to run in favor of the stockholder of a corporation at the time the debt against the corporation is created; and that under this principle the obligation of the Palo Alto Investment Company's stockholders to the Morris Company, being incurred when the agreement of April 12, 1912, was executed, was barred as against the Morris Company in three years from that date. Quite different, however, is the situation of the bank in its transaction with the Palo Alto Company. It never knew of, and consequently never assented to, the agreement transferring its claim until the new note was executed in its favor, and it accepted the same on November 29, 1912, the day the note bore date. So far as the record shows, this is the only knowledge or information that it had concerning the entire transaction.

"Appellant claims that the assent of the bank was in no manner essential to the creation of the liability of the Palo Alto Company or the accruing of the action in favor of the bank against such company, for the reason that where, as here, one corporation takes over the assets of another with an agreement to assume the liabilities of the latter, the creditors of the old corporation may enforce the agreement against the new corporation, citing Morgan v. Overman, etc., Co., 37 Cal. 534; Stanford Hotel Co. v. Schwind, 180 Cal. 348, 181 Pac. 780. Authority in support of this principle is unnecessary. Our Civil Code (section 1559) expressly provides that 'a contract made expressly for the benefit of a third person may be enforced by him at any time before the parties thereto rescind it.'

"A contract for the benefit of a third person, however, like any other contract, requires an acceptance; and until such acceptance is manifested in some manner no rights creating a corresponding liability in favor of such party can arise. Until then the transaction amounts to a mere offer. 13 Corp. Jur. 711; Johnson v. Central Trust Co., 159 Ind. 605, 65 N. E. 1028. The exemption from liability here claimed by appellant finds no support in the doctrine announced in Hunt v. Ward, supra. If the operation of the statute could be set in motion against the bank seven months before it had any knowledge of the liability created in its favor, and to which arrangement it had never assented, it might be concealed for a period beyond which any liability against stockholders might be invoked. In other words, the statute could toll against a right of the existence of which one was ignorant by reason of the fact that he had never assented to the agreement out of which it arose. We cannot subscribe to such a doctrine.

[3] "Equally untenable is the appellant's contention that the note of the Palo Alto Company was a mere renewal, one which did not extend the time prescribed in the statute. It is undoubtedly true that where a note is given by a company in renewal of an existing indebtedness of its own the liability of stockholders of such company cannot be revived or extended by such renewal or extension. Hyman v. Coleman, 82 Cal. 650, 23 Pac. 62, 16 Am. St. Rep. 178; Goodall v. Jack, 127 Cal. 258, 59 Pac. 575. Here, however, no such condition is presented. The transaction under consideration was a new and independent contract, made with a different company. Under such circumstances it cannot be said that the new note was a renewal of the old one. The bank had the right to, and undoubtedly did, rely upon the right of recourse to the stockholders of the new company in accepting its note."

Judgment affirmed.

We concur: SHAW, C. J.; LENNON, J.; SHURTLEFF, J.

SLOANE J. I dissent. From whatever standpoint we view the transaction, it seems to me the liability impressed upon the defendant as a stockholder of the Palo Alto Investment Company was created when that corporation in its contract with the Morris Real Estate Company agreed to pay the latter's indebtedness to plaintiff's assignor, the Crocker National Bank. That obligation was the foundation of defendant's liability. It was the only consideration for the note subsequently given by the corporation and sued on in this action. Whether the note was an extension or a renewal of the original liability, it, in neither case under the established rule in this state, could stay the statute of limitations as to the defendant.

I do not think it is at all clear that an acceptance was necessary by the plaintiff here before a complete accrual of a cause of action in its favor upon the obligation assumed by the Palo Alto Company.

Section 1559 of the Civil Code declares that such a contract may be enforced by the third party "at any time." Notice of acceptance is not required. He may sue precisely as upon a direct contract in his favor. Our decisions, so far as they go, seem to recognize such a contract as in itself establishing the cause of action. As said in Washer v. Independent M. & D. Co., 142 Cal. 702, 709, 76 Pac. 654, 657, the action "does not rest upon the ground of any actual or supposed relationship between the parties, as some of the earlier cases seem to indicate, but upon the broad and more satisfactory basis that the law operating upon the acts of the parties, creates the duty, establishes the privity, and implies the promise and obligation on which the action is founded."

The case of Tweeddale v. Tweeddale, 116 Wis. 517, 93 N. W. 440, 61 L. R. A. 509, 96 Am. St. Rep. 1003, one of the decisions cited in Mr. Justice WILBUR'S opinion, we think is misapprehended therein. While it recognizes authority in the books for the doctrine that the third party does not become possessed of the benefit of the promise until he accepts it, the court, after an elaborate review of the authorities, reaches the following conclusion:

"Without further discussion of the matter, we adhere to the doctrine that when one person, > for a consideration moving to him from another, promises to pay to a third person a sum of money, the law immediately operates upon the acts of the parties, establishing the essential of privity between the promisor and the third person requisite to binding contractual relations between them, resulting in the immediate establishment of a new relation of debtor and creditor, regardless of the relations of the third person to the immediate promisee in the transaction; that the liability is as binding between the promisor and the third person as it would be if the consideration for the promise moved from the latter to the former and such promisor made the promise directly to such third person, regardless of whether the latter has any knowledge of the transaction at the time of its occurrence; that the liability being once created by the acts of the immediate parties to the transaction and the operation of the law thereon, neither one nor both of such parties can thereafter change the situation as regards the third person, without his consent."

The suggestion that to apply the bar of the statute of limitations in this case, during a period when the plaintiff probably had on knowledge of his right of action against the defendant, would be unfair and unreasonable, is beside the point. Obviously the statute did run against the original liability from the date of the assumption of the debt. If there had been no new obligation entered into by the Palo Alto Company by making of the note to plaintiff, defendant's liability would clearly have expired, even if plaintiff had never heard of the transaction. If the action is not barred, it is because the note created a new and independent indebtedness of the corporation.

Even if notice to and acceptance by the beneficiary of the contract was necessary, it had such notice and made such acceptance when it received this new note of the Palo Alto Company for the old note of the Morris Company. The old note was surrendered on the making of the new, and the only consideration was the renewal or satisfaction of the old debt, the one by which defendant's statutory liability was originally created. The complaint in this action recognizes the assumption by the Palo Alto Company of the liabilities of the Morris Company as the basis of its claim. There is set forth in the complaint the facts that plaintiff's assignor in the first instance held the obligation of the Morris Company for its indebtedness, that the Palo Alto Company took over the assets of the former, and executed this new note "in renewal" of the Morris Company note. The logical deduction from this state of facts is that the parties met in the execution of the new note upon a mutual recognition of the liability which had been assumed by the Palo Alto Company to pay to the Crocker Bank the old indebtedness of the Morris Company. The new note of the Palo Alto Company to the Crocker Bank was received in recognition and settlement of that liability.

Clearly, the only claim the Crocker Bank had upon the Palo Alto Company was by reason of the latter's assumption of the indebtedness of the Morris Company. Had the Bank rested its claim on that liability, it would have had to begin his action within three years of the assumption of the debt. Instead, it consented to take a "renewal" note. This could not be done to the prejudice of the stockholders' rights, to rest on the original liability.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; R. Y. Williams, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Elmer Barnes, deceased. From an order appointing an administrator and denying Hervey Barnes' petition to be appointed administrator, Hervey Barnes appeals. Order affirmed.

John A. Harvey, of Santa Ana, for appellant.

H. C. Head and A. W. Rutan, both of Santa Ana, for respondent.

RICHARDS, Judge pro tem. This is an appeal from an order of the superior court of Orange county appointing Charles D. Brown, public administrator of the estate of Elmer Barnes, deceased, and denying the application of Hervey Barnes to be appointed such administrator. Elmer Barnes died intestate on or about January 5, 1920, at Wheaton, Ill., being at the time of his death a resident of the county of Orange, state of California, and leaving estate consisting of an undivided half interest in certain real property therein. He left as his surviving heirs his father and mother, Hervey Barnes and Mary Barnes, who, up to the time of his death and for a long time prior thereto, resided in Wheaton, Ill. On December 14, 1920, Raymond C. Barnes, a brother of said deceased, filed a petition to be appointed administrator of the decedent's estate, whereupon the said public administrator filed a like petition, in which he alleged that said Raymond C. Barnes was not qualified to be appointed as such administrator for the reason that he was not entitled to share in the distribution of said estate. Thereupon Hervey Barnes, the father of said deceased, having received at his home in Illinois a telegram from his son, Raymond C. Barnes, stating that the latter was having some difficulty in being appointed administrator, and requesting him to come out as an heir of his deceased son and apply for letters of administration, came at once to California, arriving in Orange county on December 20, 1920, and filed his petition for letters of administration in said estate on December 30, 1920. The petition of Raymond C. Barnes was thereupon dismissed. Both of the other petitions came on for hearing at the same time, and the court, after taking evidence for and against each petition, made its order denying Hervey Barnes' petition upon the ground that he was not a bona fide resident of the state of California at the time, and granting the petition of the public administrator for letters of administration. This appeal is from said order.

It is the contention of the appellant that he was a bona fide resident of the state of California at the time of filing his petition to be appointed administrator of his son's estate, and as such was entitled to be appointed such administrator under section 1365 of the Code of Civil Procedure. This contention rests almost entirely for its support upon the testimony of the appellant himself that it was his intent in coming to California upon this occasion to become a bona fide resident thereof. The appellant argues that this expression of his intent, coupled with the fact of his presence in California at and after the time of the filing of his petition for letters of administration, are controlling upon the question of his qualification as a bone fide resident within the state to receive such letters of administration. In support of such contention the appellant cites Estate of Newman, 124 Cal. 688, 57 Pac. 686, 45 L. R. A. 780, wherein, upon a much similar state of facts, the probate court found in favor of the applicant and appointed her administratrix, and this court upheld such finding and the order making such appointment. The respondent, on the other hand, contends that, looking to the record as a whole, there was sufficient evidence to justify the holding of the trial court that the appellant herein was not a bona fide resident of California at the time his petition for letters was filed; and the respondent upon his part relies upon Estate of Donovan, 104 Cal. 625, 38 Pac. 456, wherein, upon a state of facts almost identical with those of the instant case, the probate court denied letters to the petitioner, and upon his appeal this court upheld the finding and order of the probate court. In Estate of Newman, supra, the attention of this court was called to its decision in Estate of Donovan, supra, and to the similarity of the facts in each case, whereupon it made the following significant comment:

> "The difference between this case and the case of In re Donovan, 104 Cal. 623, is that there the court found against the petitioner as to the fact. In each case this court must abide the conclusion."

There is no escape from the application of a like conclusion to the instant case.

[1] The appellant, it is true, testified to his present intention to become and be a bona fide resident of the state of California and that such intent had been forming in his mind for about two years and ever since the occasion of a former visit to this state. But the evidence also showed his long residence in Illinois, where he had maintained the family home and where his aged mother, his wife, and certain of his children were still residing. The evidence also showed that his mother's age and infirmities were such that she could not be moved at the time, and that it was necessary that his wife should remain in Illinois to care for her for an indefinite period of time. It also appeared that while his son, Elmer Barnes, had died in January, 1920, leaving estate in California, the appellant had taken no steps toward coming to this state or acquiring a residence therein until, in the following December, his other son had telegraphed for him to come on and apply for the letters of administration, which he himself was unable to obtain. He then came hastily, bringing no property, and, upon his own statement, being obliged presently to return to Illinois for the purpose of so adjusting his affairs there as to make his removal to California feasible, depending upon the future condition of his mother's health. There can be no doubt that upon this state of the proof there was sufficient evidence to justify the finding of the probate court that the appellant was not, at the time of his application for letters of administration, a bona fide resident of the state of California. Such finding and the order based upon it will not be disturbed upon appeal.

[2] The appellant makes the further contention that the statute denying to nonresident heirs the right to administer upon the property of decedents in this state is void as in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment to the federal Constitution, which provides that no state shall "deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." This contention is supported by no authority and has no merit. The administration of estates is a matter of statutory regulation, and the right to provide thereby for the temporary possession of the property of decedents for the purpose of paying their debts and distributing the residue of their estate among those entitled to succeed thereto has been universally recognized and upheld.

The order is affirmed.

CALIFORNIA PACKING CORPORATION v. LARSEN. (S. F. 9705.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 20, 1921.)

1. Reformation of instruments 🔑37—Defendant need not ask for reformation for mutual mistake.

A defendant may plead and prove a mutual mistake in the making of a contract which is sought to be enforced against him, and be entitled to relief therefrom, without asking for a reformation of the contract or having the same reformed.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1008(1) — Whether clear evidence of mistake is convincing for trial court.

If it is the rule that mutual mistake must be shown by clear and convincing evidence, the question whether clear evidence introduced is convincing rests entirely with the trial court.

3. Reformation of instruments 🔑25—Failure to read does not bar.

Mere failure of a party to read an instrument with sufficient attention to perceive an error or defect in its contents will not prevent its reformation for mutual mistake at the instance of the party who executes it thus carelessly.

4. Reformation of instruments 🔑45(15) — Evidence held sufficient to sustain finding of mutual mistake.

In an action by a packing company for damages resulting from failure to deliver an entire crop of apricots as provided by contract, evidence held to sustain a finding that there was a mutual mistake in the minds of defendant and plaintiff's agent as to terms and scope of the written contract; the agent knowing that defendant owned only half of the crop.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; M. F. McCormick, Judge.

Action by the California Packing Corporation against H. Larsen. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Short, Lindsay & Woolley, of Fresno (Pillsbury, Madison & Sutro, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Harris & Hayhurst and Julius Hansen, all of Fresno, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This action was brought by the plaintiff for the recovery of the sum of $387.50, damages alleged to have resulted from the failure and refusal of the defendant to deliver to plaintiff one-half of a crop of apricots, amounting in all approximately to four tons, grown upon the premises owned by the defendant. The plaintiff alleged that the said defendant entered into a written contract with it for the sale and delivery of the whole of said fruit, but only delivered one-half thereof under said contract, and failed and refused to deliver the other half thereof, to its damage in the sum stated. The written contract between the parties relating to the sale and delivery of said fruit is attached to and made a part of the complaint.

The defendant in his answer denied the execution of said contract in the form and effect averred by the plaintiff, and further affirmatively set forth substantially the following facts: That as the owner of the premises upon which the apricot crop in question was grown he had, some time before the contract for the sale of said fruit was made between the plaintiff and himself, entered into a lease of said premises with one Poulson, who went into possession thereof; that by the the terms of said lease each of the parties thereto was to receive one-half of the crops grown on said premises, and each was to have the right to sell his one-half thereof; that, on the date on which the contract between himself and the plaintiff was signed, one Pilegard, a purchasing agent of the plaintiff, came to said premises and requested the defendant to sell to plaintiff the crop of apricots growing thereon; that thereupon the defendant fully explained to the said agent of the plaintiff that the said premises were leased to the said Poulson, and that he, the defendant, had only the right to sell one-half of the said apricot crop, and would not agree to sell any more than one-half thereof, that thereupon, and with that understanding, the defendant signed the memorandum of agreement which the said agent of the plaintiff then prepared, it being fully understood and agreed between himself and the said agent of the plaintiff that the "crops" mentioned in said agreement referred only to the portion of the crop which the defendant could sell, viz. the one-half thereof; that by mistake on the part of the said Pilegard he failed to write into said agreement that the defendant was selling only one-half of the crop; and that at said time said Pilegard fully knew and understood that the defendant intended to sell only one-half thereof. The defendant further averred that he had fully delivered to plaintiff the one-half of said crop so sold and agreed to be delivered by him and has fully performed the terms of his said contract to be by him performed. The defendant prayed that plaintiff have nothing by its action and that he have judgment for his costs.

Upon the trial of the cause the defendant testified fully in support of the foregoing affirmative averments of his answer, and was supported therein by other testimony and evidence. Upon the submission of the case the trial court found that all the foregoing averments of the defendant's answer were true, and, as a conclusion of law therefrom, found that the plaintiff should take nothing by its action and that the defendant should have judgment in his favor and for his costs. From the judgment entered in conformity with these findings, the plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

[1] It is conceded by the appellant upon the threshold of its argument herein that there is but one issue upon this appeal, and that is as to "whether or not the evidence sustains the findings of the court that the parties made a mutual mistake in executing the agreement sued on." This concession takes out of review all questions as to the sufficiency of the averments of the defendant's answer as to a mutual mistake of fact attending the execution of the contract in question, and it must therefore be taken as conceded that, had the defendant asked for affirmative relief in the way of the reformation of said contract, he would, if the proof had supported his averments, have been entitled to such relief. It was not necessary for the defendant to ask for such relief, since this court has held that a defendant may plead and prove a mutual mistake in the making of a contract which is sought to be enforced against him, and be entitled to relief therefrom without asking for a reformation of the contract or having the same reformed. Newman v. Lassing, 141 Cal. 174, 74 Pac. 761; Field v. Austin, 131 Cal. 379, 63 Pac. 692; Toby v. Oregon Pacific Ry., 98 Cal. 490, 33 Pac. 550; Pomeroy Equity Jurisprudence (4th Ed.) § 868. The case of Bradbury v. Higginson, 167 Cal. 553, 140 Pac. 254, cited by the appellant, is not in conflict with the foregoing cases, since in that case a rescission was affirmatively pleaded and sought, and the court was dealing with the sufficiency of the averments and proofs to justify a rescission of the contract, and was not dealing with the question of defensive relief where a right of reformation was sufficiently pleaded and shown.

[2] We are thus brought to the second question presented by the appellant herein, which is as to the sufficiency of the evidence educed by the defendant to establish a mutual mistake in the execution of the contract for the sale of the fruit in question. The appellant insists that the evidence which will be sufficient to justify the reformation of a contract upon the ground of mistake must be clear and convincing. Assuming that the rule for which the appellant contends would have application to the attitude of the trial court toward cases of this character, we are satisfied that in this case there was clear evidence of a mistake, and whether or not it was convincing was entirely a question for the trial court. Wadleigh v. Phelps, 149 Cal. 627, 637, 87 Pac. 93; Mahoney v. Bostwick, 96 Cal. 53, 30 Pac. 1020, 31 Am. St. Rep. 175; DeKahn v. Chase, 177 Cal. 281, 170 Pac. 608.

[3] The evidence which the defendant presented to the trial court sufficiently showed the following facts in this case. The defendant, as the owner of the premises upon which the apricot crop in question was grown, had leased the same to one Poulson under a cropping lease which gave the latter possession of the premises with the right to one-half of the fruit grown thereon, each of the parties to said lease having the right to sell his one-half of said fruit. On the day upon which the contract between plaintiff and the defendant was entered into, the plaintiff's agent approached the defendant with an offer to buy said fruit. The defendant informed him that he had only the right to sell one-half of the apricot crop. The agent understood at the time that Poulson was the defendant's lessee under a cropping contract entitling him to one-half of the fruit crop grown on the premises. He went away for the stated purpose of securing the consent of his principal to purchase the defendant's fruit, and a few hours thereafter returned, bringing with him the usual printed form of contract for the buying of fruit crops, which he proceeded to fill out with the few written words requisite to give it application to the defendant's fruit, and passed it to the defendant to sign. The defendant did not read the contract closely, for the reason that he understood it was to have application to his portion of the fruit crop only, and also because the plaintiff's agent had hurriedly prepared and proffered said contract to him for his signature, and then hastened away to secure contracts from other fruit growers, taking the contract with him and not leaving with the defendant any copy thereof.

It is urged by the appellant that the fact that the defendant did not read his contract, as it was his legal duty to do, should militate strongly against the right of the defendant to a reformation thereof. But whether or not it does so must depend upon the circumstances of the particular case. This subject was fully discussed by this court in Los Angeles, etc., Co. v. New Liverpool Salt Co., 150 Cal. 21, 87 Pac. 1029, which, after a full review of the cases, this court said:

> "It has been frequently decided that the mere failure of a party to read an instrument with sufficient attention to perceive an error or defect in its contents will not prevent its reformation at the instance of the party who executes it thus carelessly."

The defendant never saw the contract again until after he had delivered to plaintiff his one-half of the apricot crop, which the latter received and paid for, and thereafter for the first time demanded that he deliver the whole of the crop. The defendant is supported in his testimony as to the foregoing facts by other witnesses called on his behalf, while the evidence of the plaintiff's agent, Pilegard, called on its behalf, tends to support the defendant's story in so far as it shows that he knew at the time the contract was drawn that the defendant was not entitled to sell but one-half of the crop. In so far as the testimony of the defendant and his witnesses is in conflict with the testimony of the plaintiff's agent, Pilegard, it was for the trial court to determine which was to be believed, and its conclusion thereon is not the subject of review here.

[4] We think the finding of the trial court to the effect that there was a mutual mistake in the minds of the parties as to the terms and scope of the written contract for the sale of this fruit was sufficiently supported by the evidence, and, since this is the only question in the case, the judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frederick W. Houser, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Eva Van Buskirk Carrillo. From a decree of distribution, Maude M. Whitaker, the daughter and sole surviving heir of decedent, appeals. Affirmed.

Thomas K. Case, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Peyton H. Moore, of Los Angeles, for respondent administrator.

Charles L. Evans, of Los Angeles, and W. W. Butler, for other respondents.

RICHARDS, Justice pro tem. This appeal is from a decree of final distribution of the residue of the property belonging to this estate. The only question presented upon this appeal is as to the meaning to be given to the word "cash" as used by the testatrix in her olographic will. Eva Van Buskirk Carrillo was the widow of one J. J. Carrillo, who had died, leaving a will by the terms of which she was given a one-eighth interest for life in the residue of his estate, consisting at the time his will was made of certain lands subject to mortgage. She was also given a legacy of $5,000. During the course of probate of his estate she had applied for and received a family allowance, a considerable portion of which was not promptly paid, nor was her legacy delivered to her up to the time of the making of her olographic will. In the year 1918 Eva Van Buskirk Carrillo executed her olographic will, wherein, with much detail, she proceeded to bequeath numerous articles of personal property, such as rings, brooches, bracelets, earrings, china, clothing, and other personal effects of which she was then possessed to her various relatives, giving to each specific articles by name. She also devised the only piece of real estate of which she was then the owner, her home, to her brother and her daughter, share and share alike. As to her said daughter, Maude M. Whitaker, the clause in her said will by which the latter was to receive certain specific articles of personalty, and was also to receive her above-named interest in said real estate, contained the added words "1 third cash." The succeeding clause in said will, by which her brother, James L. Orr, was also given considerable personal effects, together with a one-half interest in said real estate, contained the words, "1 third of cash that is left after my demise." One other clause in said will may be noted as bearing on the question involved in this appeal. It reads as follows:

> "If I have the $7,000 coming to me I give to Mr. Peyton H. Moore for the legal work $500.-00 he is deserving of it, as I promised if he got my estate settled I would make him a present and please give this amount to him providing I have $7,000.00 left."

At the time of the execution of this will the only actual money which Mrs. Carrillo had on hand was the sum of $95 in bank. There was then due her, however, the sum of $1,450 upon account of her widow's allowance from her husband's estate, together with her one-eighth interest in the residue thereof, as well as her said unpaid legacy. Between the date of her said will and the date of her death in October, 1919, she effected a compromise of her claims against her said husband's estate by which it was agreed that she should be paid the sum of $10,500 in full settlement. Of this sum she received the sum of $1,000 during her lifetime, of which sum $907.17 was on hand at the time of her death. After her death, and while her estate was in course of probate, her administrator with the will annexed received the additional sum of $2,500 in money and a promissory note and mortgage for the sum of $7,000 executed by the duly authorized executors of her husband's estate. Of the money thus received there were expended certain sums in the course of administration, so that there remained on hand in money the sum of $1,612.98 when the estate was ready for distribution. There was also on hand the aforesaid note and mortgage for the sum of $7,000. The petition for final distribution, which was filed by Maude M. Whitaker, the daughter of said decedent, set forth the foregoing two items as assets of the estate and prayed that they be distributed to her as the sole surviving heir of her mother. The court, however, disregarded this prayer, and, treating these assets as "cash," distributed the same by its decree of distribution one-third each to the persons named in said will as entitled to "1 third of cash that is left after my demise." From said decree of distribution the said daughter and sole surviving heir of said decedent prosecutes this appeal.

[1, 2] It is the contention of the appellant that the word "cash" and the phrase "cash that is left after my demise" are to be construed as meaning the actual money on hand at the time of the death of the testatrix, to wit, the sum of $907.17, and that it is this sum only that should have been divided among the three persons mentioned in the said will as entitled to "cash that is left after my demise." The balance of the money on hand at the date of distribution and the said note and mortgage the appellant claims herself to be entitled to as the unassigned residue of said estate. It is to be noted at the outset that this claim on the part of the appellant, if acceded to, would compel the conclusion that the testatrix did not intend to dispose of her whole estate by her said will, but did intend to leave that portion thereof which the appellant now claims in a state of intestacy. Such an interpretation is not favored by the law. Estate of O'Gorman, 161 Cal. 654, 120 Pac. 33; Estate of Heberle, 153 Cal. 275, 95 Pac. 41; Estate of Blake, 157 Cal. 448, 108 Pac. 287; Civ. Code, § 1326. It is also to be noted, as an aid to our reasoning as to the proper interpretation to be given to these words in this will, that the testatrix began to write her said olographic will with the following words:

> "I, Eva Van Buskirk Carillo being in sound mind and body do hereby give to the following persons named herein for love and affection money and articles."

It is also to be noted that no money is disposed of by the terms of this will unless the word "cash" as used therein is to be interpreted as the synonym of "money." It is significant at this point to take note of the fact that the maker of this will had expressly in mind the sum of $7,000 which she was entitled to receive, and which, according to her expression, was "coming to me" in cash from the estate of her deceased husband, and which she had an expectancy of receiving during her lifetime. Had this expectancy been realized then, according to the appellant's own interpretation of the meaning of this will, it would under its terms have been properly divided into the three equal shares among those entitled to "cash" bequests in said will. It must therefore have been so intended by the testatrix, if the appellant's own contention be taken to be sound. In this immediate connection also it is to be noted that this expected increment was still in the form of money due and payable at the time of her demise, and was only placed in the form of a note and mortgage by the act of her administrator after her death. It must therefore, for the purpose of interpreting this will, be treated as money in expectancy when the testatrix drew her will. Pursuing the foregoing chain of reasoning, and treating the testatrix's use of the word "cash" as employed in her said will as intended to mean "money," we are led to the conclusion that the testatrix used the word "cash" in the broader meaning of "money," which has sometimes been given to it. The following cases show the sense in which the word "money" has been sometimes used in wills. In Estate of Miller, 48 Cal. 165, 22 Am. Rep. 422, the following words were used:

> "It is conceded by the appellant that the word 'money' in wills has been frequently construed by the courts, both in England and America, to include the personal estate of the testator. The following authorities would seem to place this point beyond all doubt: Dawson v. Gaskoin, 2 Keen. 14; Boys v. Morgan, 3 Mylne & Craig, 661; Kendall v. Kendall, 4 Russ. 360; Chapman v. Reynolds, 20 Beav. 221; Levinson v. Lady Lennard, 34 Beav. 490; Morton v. Perry, 1 Metc. 446; Cowling v. Cowling, 26 Beav. 452; Langdale v. Whitfield, 4 Kay & J. 436; 2 Redfield on Wills (2d Ed.) 111; 2 Williams on Executors, 1025; 2 Redfield on Wills, 437, note; Jarman on Wills, c. 24, and cases there cited."

In Estate of Jacobs, 140 Pa. 268, 21 Atl. 318, 11 L. R. A. 767, 23 Am. St. Rep. 230, the property of the testatrix at the time her will was executed consisted only of personal estate. She disposed of the residue of her estate as follows:

> "The remainder and residue of my money I give and bequeath to the hospital of the Protestant Church of Philadelphia."

The Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, in construing this clause in her will, said:

> "It appears very plain to us that this testatrix used the word 'money' in the popular sense as the equivalent of 'property,' and that she intended all of her estate to pass by the residuary clause. She knew of what her estate consisted when she made her will. She knew it would satisfy all the pecuniary legacies, and leave a small residue."

In 27 Cyc. at page 120, the commentator, in defining the word "money" as used in wills, says:

> "In its widest and popular sense it is frequently employed as synonymous with property, estate, including, when the contest so indicated, any kind of property, even land. Sometimes it includes the whole personal estate and often the proceeds of realty. The meaning of the word, when used in a will, depends upon the context, and may be affected by the conditions of the testator's property and the surrounding circumstances."

[3] We are pointed by these authorities to the final test to be applied to the determination and meaning of doubtful words and phrases in the will of a decedent. Such words and phrases should be so construed as to give effect, if reasonably possible, to the intent of the testatrix. Estate of Heywood, 148 Cal. 184, 82 Pac. 755; Estate of Reith, 144 Cal. 314, 77 Pac. 942; Estate of Koch, 8 Cal. App. 90, 96 Pac. 100. In ascertaining this intent resort may be had to the circumstances under which the instrument was executed. Estate of Spreckels, 162 Cal. 559, 123 Pac. 371. One of the most significant circumstances attending the execution of a will is to be found in the knowledge which the testatrix has of what her estate consists. In the case at bar this knowledge on the part of the testatrix was most exact and detailed. She knew she had certain items of jewelry and of household and personal effects, which she distinctly identifies and distributes to the recipients of her bequests by name. She knew she had certain real estate, and to whom she wished to devise it. She knew she had the sum of $7,000 in the form of a money obligation presently payable, and which she expected to receive before she died. She knew she had no other estate. By use of the words in her will, "what is left after my demise," she clearly intended to refer to the residue of her estate, and she therefore as clearly did not intend to leave any portion of her estate undisposed of. These considerations lead to but one unavoidable conclusion, which is that by the use of the word "cash" in her will, with its context, the testatrix intended to refer to and distribute the money to be received by her from her deceased husband's estate. This construction the trial court adopted in its decree of distribution in this estate, and we are satisfied that it committed no error in so doing.

The judgment is affirmed.

CLAYTON v. PERRY et al.

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 20, 1921.)

Husband and wife 🔑264 — Evidence held to show property acquired after marriage was separate property of husband.

In contest as to distribution of estate of a deceased husband, evidence, as to property acquired during his marriage, held to overcome the presumption under Civ. Code, § 164, that it was community property, and to sustain finding that it was his separate property.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

In the matter of the Estate of John Nickson, deceased. Contest as to distribution of the estate by Minnie L. Clayton, opposed by H. L. Perry, executor, and others. From the decree of distribution Minnie L. Clayton appeals. Affirmed.

W. C. Shelton, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

R. S. Parker and Parker & Parker, all of Pasadena, and Owens & Wingert, of Whittier, for respondents.

RICHARDS, Judge pro tem. This appeal is from a decree of final distribution wherein the trial court, over the objection of the appellant, distributed the whole of the estate of the decedent as having been his separate property during his lifetime. Decedent died in Los Angeles county, Cal., where he had lived since his removal to California from the the state of Iowa in or about the year 1894. Prior to his residence in Iowa he had lived in Wisconsin for a number of years where, in the year 1878, he had married Naomi Nickson, who thereafter lived with him as his wife in Wisconsin, in Iowa, and in California up to the time of his death. Both parties to this marriage had been married before and each had children of such prior marriage, Naomi having two daughters, Lillie Watson and Mrs. Minnie L. Clayton, the latter being the contestant and appellant herein. John Nickson had by his prior marriage five sons, J. W. Nickson, T. J. Nickson, C. D. Nickson, Samuel S. Nickson, and Harry S. Nickson. There were no children of this second marriage. Some time prior to his death John Nickson made his last will, in which he declared that the whole of his estate was his separate property, which he therein proceeded to dispose of by making certain specific legacies to certain of his said children and stepchildren. He then devised all of the remainder of his property to his wife, Naomi Nickson, for and during her natural life, with the right to the total net income thereof, and also with right that, in the event of such net income not being sufficient for her reasonable care and support, she might use so much of the principal estate as might be necessary for such purpose. Upon her death the remainder of said estate was to be divided among four of his said sons, share and share alike. John Nickson died on December 15, 1917. His said will was offered for probate shortly thereafter, and, having been duly admitted to probate the administration of his estate proceeded until the same was ready for distribution in September, 1919, when the executor filed his final account the petition for distribution of said estate, wherein he averred that "the whole of the said estate is separate property of said deceased," and prayed for its distribution according to the terms of the last will of the decedent. In the meantime his widow, Naomi Nickson, had been declared incompetent, and her daughter, Mrs. Minnie L. Clayton, had been appointed her guardian; and the latter, on October 8, 1919, appeared on behalf of her said mother and objected to the distribution of said estate as prayed for by said executor, alleging that the whole of the decedent's property and estate was community property of himself and his said wife, Naomi Nickson, and praying that the same should be distributed one-half to said Naomi Nickson, as her share of the community property, and the balance thereof according to the terms of said last will of the decedent. The contest thus created came on for hearing before the court, and a large amount of testimony was offered thereon. At the conclusion of such hearing the court made its findings in words and effect "that all of said property and every part thereof was at his decease the separate property of said John Nickson, deceased, and that no part thereof was or is community property of said John Nickson and Naomi Nickson." The court accordingly by its decree distributed the whole of said property and estate according to the terms of the last will of said deceased. From this decree the appellant, Minnie L. Clayton, prosecutes this appeal.

It is an undisputed fact upon this appeal that all of the property which John Nickson undertook to dispose of by his last will and testament and of which he died seized he had acquired by purchase and increment since his arrival in California, and hence during his marriage with his said wife, Naomi. This being so, the appellant invokes the presumption created by section 164 of the Civil Code that all of said property was community property, and, having done so, insists that this presumption is one which can only be overcome by "clear and satisfactory proof," or, as it is sometimes stated in the cases, by "clear and convincing evidence" that such property was acquired by separate funds, and that the burden of producing such proof lies upon the party claiming the property as separate, citing in that behalf Smith v. Smith, 12 Cal. 216, 76 Am. Dec. 533; Dimmick v. Dimmick, 95 Cal. 323, 30 Pac. 547. There can be no quarrel with a rule as well and old established as the rule above stated and supported by said authorities; but we are still required to determine the scope and meaning of the terms "clear and satisfactory proof" and "clear and convincing evidence" as employed in these cases. In arriving at this determination we are directly aided by the decision of this court in the case of Freese v. Hibernia Savings, etc., Society, 139 Cal. 392, 73 Pac. 172, in which the precise question was discussed and decided as to the force and effect to be given to both of the foregoing phrases:

> "Speaking of expressions of this nature," says the court, "some of which were stronger in terms than any used by this court, * * * Ballinger, in his work on Community Property, says (section 167): 'It is not believed, however, that these terms should be considered as going to the length that their general meaning might import. Certainly it is not required that the proof to destroy this presumption should be any more than sufficient to satisfy the mind of court or jury that its weight is enough to cause a reasonable person, under all the circumstances, to believe in its sufficiency, in order to counterbalance the naked presumption that the property was acquired with the funds of the community. The property is merely considered as the property of the community until the contrary is shown by legal proof, and legal proof would seem to be a preponderance of the testimony under all the facts and circumstances of the particular case.' * * * We are of the opinion that it is incumbent on the party seeking to overcome the presumption of community property to do no more than to produce such legal evidence as, under all the circumstances of the particular case, would ordinarily produce conviction in an unprejudiced mind, and that in the face of such evidence, the naked presumption, unsupported by any testimony, must fall."

In the later case of Couts v. Winston, 153 Cal. 686, 96 Pac. 357, this court says:

> "Whether or not the evidence offered * * * is clear and convincing is a question for the trial court. * * * In such cases, as in others, the determination of that court in favor of either party upon conflicting or contradictory evidence is not open to review in this court."

In the case of Estate of Pepper, 158 Cal. 619, 112 Pac. 62, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1092, the language of both of above cases was quoted and approved. In the light of these cases we approach the evidence in the instant case, which may be fairly summarized as follows: John Nickson, prior to the time of his marriage with his second wife, Naomi, in the year 1878, had been the owner of a farm in Wisconsin and also of some mining interests therein, which, together with his personal property, consisting of money, cattle, and farming equipment, was variously estimated by several witnesses to be of the value of from $10,000 to $14,000. About 3 years before his marriage with Naomi, and while his first wife was still living, he began to remove his property interests and effects to the state of Iowa, where he acquired a farm of about 160 acres, which he stocked with his cattle and farming machinery brought from Wisconsin. These possessions were his when he returned to Wisconsin to marry Naomi, and he was then sufficiently well-to-do to be loaning money in the neighborhood of his Iowa home. From time to time during the 20 years he lived in Iowa after his marriage he added to his farm holdings until they amounted to about 540 acres in 1894, when he determined to remove to California, which he did in the month of December of that year. During the 16 years of his married life in Iowa he and his wife Naomi were both hard-working people on the farm, his wife performing the usual work of a farmer's wife thereon, and both deriving their living from its proceeds. Whatever increment there was in the acreage or equipment of his farm during these years came chiefly from its annual product and the profits arising therefrom. When the resolution was reached to remove to California John Nickson offered his realty holdings in Iowa for sale, and held a public auction of his personal property, and derived from the sale of both the sum of about $16,000, which he transferred to this state and began investing here. Some question has been raised as to the rights of the wife in this property prior to its removal to California and under the laws of the state of Iowa, but we think this question is fairly set at rest by the decisions of that state holding that the dower interest of the wife under the statutes of Iowa then in force was a mere expectancy, dependent on survivorship to become a vested right. Mock v. Watson, 41 Iowa, 241; Daugherty v. Daugherty, 69 Iowa, 677, 29 N. W. 778; Purcell v. Lang, 97 Iowa, 610, 66 N. W. 887; Beach v. Beach, 160 Iowa, 346, 141 N. W. 921, 46 L. R. A. (N. S.) 98, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 216. Within a short time after his arrival in California John Nickson began investing in real estate. He first purchased 5 acres of land planted to citrus fruit at Chula Vista, Cal., upon which he and his wife lived, and where for a brief time they ran a boarding house, but whether at a profit or not does not appear. He also invested in a prune orchard near Tulare, Cal., where he and his wife worked for two summers. Some 6 years later he bought another tract of land in Whittier for $1,400 on the installment plan, for which he finally paid. He also from time to time purchased other property, so that at the time of his death he was the owner of real estate in the counties of Orange, Riverside, and Los Angeles of the appraised value of $28,472.46. During these years of residence in California and of the acquisition of these properties therein John Nickson was an elderly and aging man, with no trade, profession, or business, but worked hard upon the properties he from time to time owned, and showing some considerable degree of shrewdness in making his investments. During these years also his wife, Naomi, lived and worked with him upon whichever of their properties they resided, but it nowhere appears that any income which could reasonably be credited to these joint labors would have more than sufficed for their mutual support. In the year 1915 John Nickson executed his will, which was the subject of probate in this proceeding, and in his said will stated that all of his property devised thereby was his separate property and estate. About 2 years thereafter, and in December, 1917, he undertook to establish the title to his various pieces of real estate in the county of Los Angeles under the Torrens Land Act. In the petition filed by him in that proceeding he alleged himself to be "the owner of an estate in fee simple as his separate property" of the real estate described therein. It was also stated that "Naomi Nickson joins herein as applicant," and the affidavit appended to said petition was signed by both John and Naomi Nickson. The decree followed the language of the petition in finding that all of the allegations thereof were true, and in decreeing that John Nickson "is the owner of an estate in fee simple as his separate property in the premises described in said petition." We do not undertake to consider or decide herein the validity of the foregoing proceeding or the effect of the decree therein as being res adjudicata between the parties hereto, since we think that our conclusions herein may be put upon other grounds.

In addition to the other facts above set forth, there was some further evidence produced tending to show that Naomi Nickson had at one time stated that she herself was the owner of certain separate property at the time of her marriage to John Nickson, which had gone or was to go to her daughters, whereas the property belonging to John was to go to his sons exclusively; and that upon various other occasions after the making of his said will she had stated to various parties that she was satisfied with its terms and with her husband's treatment of her therein, and that all of the property was his. On the other hand, there was some evidence that at the time the proceeding under the Torrens Land Act was taken and the foregoing statements were made by her, Naomi Nickson was over 80 years of age, and was in a feeble condition of both mind and body. In regard to these matters the evidence is somewhat conflicting, but with respect to the main body of the evidence touching the property, ownership, investments, and accretions of John Nickson before and after his marriage to Naomi Nickson there is practically no conflict in this evidence, and we are of the opinion that it is ample to produce that degree of proof which would suffice to overcome the presumption that the properties acquired by John Nickson after his said marriage were community property, and also to sustain the finding and decree of the probate court that the said property and the whole thereof was his separate property.

The appellant chiefly relies for a reversal upon the case of Estate of Hill, 167 Cal. 59, 138 Pac. 690, but an examination of that case shows that the appellant can derive no comfort therefrom, since upon a state of facts in many respects similar to those in the instant case the trial court decided that certain of the property involved therein was the separate property of the husband, which conclusion this court approved upon appeal.

TURNER v. TURNER. (L. A. 6217.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑1011(1) — Findings on conflicting evidence not disturbed.

Where the evidence is in substantial conflict, the findings of the trial court, if in themselves responsive to the issues, will not be disturbed.

2. Trial 🔑395(3)—Findings which are mere conclusions of law insufficient.

General findings which, standing alone, amount to nothing more than a conclusion of law are insufficient.

3. Trial 🔑395(3)—General finding as to truth or falsity of material averments insufficient.

A general omnibus finding that all the material allegations in the complaint are untrue, and that all the material allegations in the answer are true, is insufficient, since no one can know what averments were deemed material.

4. Trial 🔑395(9) — Where specific findings support judgment, insufficient general findings may be disregarded.

Notwithstanding the court makes general findings which are insufficient to support the judgment, such findings may be disregarded, where other specific findings as to the truth or falsity of each particular averment in the complaint are sufficient.

5. Divorce 🔑37(7) — Separation by mutual consent not desertion.

A separation between husband and wife by mutual consent will not support a charge of desertion.

6. Trial 🔑395(1)—Finding negativing allegation in identical language sufficient.

A finding which is in identical language a negation of an allegation in the complaint is sufficient.

7. Trial 🔑404(1)—Findings construed to support judgment.

Findings are to be construed so as to support the judgment.

8. Divorce 🔑150(2)—Finding of absence of cruelty held not overcome by another finding.

Since findings must be read together, a judgment refusing a divorce on findings that defendant had not been guilty of cruelty toward plaintiff is not erroneous, notwithstanding a single finding capable of a construction in favor of plaintiff on the charge of cruelty.

9. Evidence 🔑317(8)—Statements by plaintiff to third persons as to cause of physical condition inadmissible as hearsay.

In a divorce suit, it was not error to exclude evidence by the plaintiff wife's physician and another witness as to statements made by her to them relative to the cause of her condition; such evidence being hearsay.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action by Jennie Walz Turner against Lewis Maney Turner for divorce. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Williams & Williams and Goudge, Robinson & Hughes, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.
W. I. Gilbert, of Los Angeles, and Maury Kemp, of El Paso, Tex., for respondent.

RICHARDS, Justice pro tem. This appeal is from a judgment in favor of the defendant in an action for divorce upon the grounds of extreme cruelty and desertion. The parties intermarried on September 16, 1899, in El Paso, Tex. Several children were born of said marriage, of whom there were living, at the time this action was instituted, three daughters, whose names and ages were: Virginia, aged 17 years; Marion, aged 12 years, and Jane, aged 2 years.

Plaintiff sets forth in the first count of her complaint certain acts and conduct of the defendant which are alleged to have caused said plaintiff great mental suffering and a nervous breakdown, seriously impairing her health. It is not necessary to consider these allegations in detail for the reasons hereinafter stated, with the exception of the following averment. The complaint alleges:

> "That, within one year last past, the said defendant has, at divers times, falsely and willfully insinuated and stated to the two older children of the plaintiff and defendant that the plaintiff was not a proper person to have the care, custody, and upbringing of the said children, and has questioned the said two older children as to the acts and conduct of the plaintiff during the absence of the defendant, in such a manner as to tend to cause them to believe that the plaintiff's acts and conduct have not been proper, but that defendant well knew, at the time, that the plaintiff had been guilty of no improper conduct, and that it was the purpose and intention of said defendant to prejudice the said children against the plaintiff."

The defendant in his answer specifically denies the above allegation. Upon the trial and submission of the cause the court made the following finding in respect thereto:

> "The court finds that the defendant did not, within one year last past, or at any time or at all, falsely, or willfully, or at all, insinuate or state to the two older children of the plaintiff and defendant, or to either of said children, that the plaintiff was not a proper person to have the care, or custody, or upbringing of said children, and finds that the defendant has not questioned the said two older children as to the acts and conduct of the plaintiff during the absence of the defendant, in such a manner as to tend to cause them to believe that the plaintiff's acts or conduct had not been proper, when the defendant knew at said time that the plaintiff had been guilty of no improper conduct, and the court finds that it was not the purpose or intention of said defendant to prejudice the said children against the plaintiff."

[1] The appellant urges several contentions upon this appeal, the first of which is that the evidence is insufficient to justify the findings of the trial court upon the various acts of alleged cruelty, other than the specific act embraced in the foregoing averment and finding. It is sufficient to say in response to this contention that as to each and all of these acts of alleged cruelty, with the exception above noted, the evidence is in substantial conflict, and, this being so, the findings of the trial court, if in themselves sufficient to respond to these issues, will not be disturbed. The appellant, however, contends that the findings of the trial court upon these several alleged acts of cruelty, other than that above specifically referred to, are insufficient to respond to the issues therein presented, and hence insufficient to support the judgment. An examination of the findings of the court discloses that at the outset the court made the following general finding having relation to the first count of the plaintiff's complaint:

> "The court finds that the defendant has not, at divers times within 18 years last past, or at any time, or at all, been guilty of extreme or any cruelty toward the plaintiff, and has not wrongfully, or at all, inflicted upon the plaintiff grievous or any bodily injury, or grievous or any mental suffering."

It will further be noted that toward the close of its findings the court made the following two general findings:

> "And the court further finds that, except as herein found to the contrary, each and every material allegation contained in plaintiff's complaint herein is untrue.
> "The court finds that, except as herein found to the contrary, each and every material allegation contained in the defendant's answer is true, as therein stated."

[2] It may be conceded that the foregoing general findings would, neither separately nor in conjunction, be sufficient to respond to the issues above referred to, nor to support the judgment; the first, because, standing alone, it would amount to nothing more than a conclusion of law. Franklin v. Franklin, 140 Cal. 607, 74 Pac. 155; Smith v. Smith, 62 Cal. 466.

[3] It may also be conceded that the further and concluding findings of the court above quoted would also be insufficient to support the judgment for the reason that they are each subject to the vice pointed out in the case of Holt Manufacturing Co. v. Collins, 154 Cal. 276, 97 Pac. 520, wherein the court said:

> "The general omnibus finding 'that all the material denials, and averments in answer to the complaint herein are true, and all of the material averments of the amended complaint in intervention are true,' is insufficient for any purpose."

The reason is that it is uncertain; no one can know what averments were deemed material.

See, also, Johnson v. Squires, 53 Cal. 37; Ladd v. Durkin, 54 Cal. 395; Krug v. F. A. Lux, etc., Co., 129 Cal. 322, 61 Pac. 1125; Stampfli v. Stampfli, 199 Pac. 829.

[4] The difficulty with the appellant's foregoing contention as to the insufficiency of these findings is that the trial court did not content itself with the general findings above criticized, but proceeded to make specific findings as to the truth or falsity of each and all of the particular averments of cruelty set forth in the plaintiff's complaint, with the exception above noted, and as to these found them to be either untrue or unsustained by sufficient evidence. The generalities in the court's findings may therefore be disregarded, and the contention of the appellant with regard to the insufficiency of such findings to support the judgment be held to be without merit.

[5] It may be said that as to the second count of the plaintiff's complaint alleging desertion, there was sufficient evidence before the court to justify the conclusion that whatever separation there was between the parties was by mutual consent, which would suffice to justify the finding which the court made against the plaintiff upon that alleged cause of action.

[6] This brings us to the main contention of the appellant as to the insufficiency of the evidence to support the finding and of the findings to sustain the judgment of the trial court in relation to the averment and finding first above specifically set forth. As to that finding, it is the contention of the appellant in substance that it is ambiguous and misleading, and that, drawn as it is in a partly disjunctive and partly conjunctive form, it cannot be determined therefrom whether it is to be understood as a finding in favor of or against the allegations of the plaintiff's complaint as to the specific charge referred to in said finding. The appellant further contends that if said finding is to be construed as a finding against the plaintiff as to this specific charge it is unsupported by the evidence in the case. In answer to the first of these contentions it may be stated generally that a finding which is in identical language a negation of the allegation in the complaint is sufficient. Dam v. Zink, 112 Cal. 91, 44 Pac. 331; McCarthy v. Brown, 113 Cal. 15, 45 Pac. 14; Hayne, New Trial and Appeal (Rev. Ed.) § 242.

[7, 8] It should also be stated as a general rule that findings are to be construed so as to support the judgment. It was evidently the intention of the trial court in this case to make a finding against the plaintiff in the identical language of the complaint, except as such finding was attempted to be cast in the negative form. Its efforts so to do may have resulted in giving to such finding the doubtful and ambiguous meaning of which the appellant complains, but, even if this be conceded to be true, it does not therefore follow that the judgment should be reversed for that reason, since even if said finding should be given the construction which the appellant claims for it, and even if it were true that said finding was a clear and unambiguous finding of fact in favor of the plaintiff upon this single charge of cruelty, it must still be read in conjunction with the conclusion of the trial court above quoted, to the effect that the defendant has not at any time or at all been guilty of extreme cruelty toward the plaintiff. Such findings, read together and taken in connection with the other specific findings of the court against the plaintiff as to every other specific charge of cruelty averred in her complaint, would amount to the finding that the single act of alleged cruelty intended to be covered by the objectionable finding was insufficient in itself to amount to extreme cruelty so as to entitle the plaintiff to a divorce. If our reasoning and conclusion in this regard be correct, it follows that the appellant's second contention that said finding, if taken to be a finding against her, is unsupported by the evidence, becomes immaterial, since even if said finding were clearly in accord with the evidence it would still be insufficient, according to the trial court's conclusion, to constitute extreme cruelty so as to justify a judgment of divorce.

[9] The appellant further urges that the trial court committed error in the rejection of certain evidence offered on her behalf. The plaintiff's physician was called by her, and testified as to certain troubles existing in her sexual organs and a general nervous condition due to such trouble. He was then asked the question as to whether she made any statement to him as to the cause or reason of her condition, which question he answered affirmatively. He was then asked: "What did she say about it?" which question was objected to, and the objection sustained. He was then asked as to whether he had formed an opinion as to the reason for or cause of her condition. Upon an objection being urged to this question, the court inquired of the physician whether he could tell from his objective examination what the cause of the condition of the plaintiff was, and upon his answer that he could do so relatively he was permitted by the court to answer, limiting his reason to what he ascertained from objective examination. The trial court also refused to allow another witness called on behalf of the plaintiff to testify as to statements and complaints made to her by the plaintiff of unhappiness in her married life. We see no error in the rulings of the trial court in regard to these two witnesses. Whatever statement the plaintiff may have made to her physician regarding her husband's treatment of her as affecting the happiness or unhappiness of her married life would not be the less hearsay and self-serving declarations when made to him than when made to any other person not a physician. They were not part of the res gestæ, as was the case in Venzke v. Venzke, 94 Cal. 225, 29 Pac. 499, cited by appellant, nor does it appear that they were necessary to enable the physician to determine the nature of her malady, to which he fully testified as the result of his objective examination. The only purpose for which the evidence of these two witnesses apparently was offered was to show that the plaintiff had made statements to each of them as to the unhappiness of her married life. Such evidence was clearly hearsay and inadmissible.

A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

WASTE, J. This is a proceeding brought to review, and have annulled, an award of the respondent the Industrial Accident Commission. S. E. Hayden was killed on March 24, 1920, while working as a carpenter for Florence Ritchie Dearborn, the petitioner herein. The accident was caused by his being thrown from an automobile while on his way to a telephone to order lumber needed in the erection of the building on which he was working. He left surviving him the other respondents, a widow and three minor children, who were dependent upon him for support. The employer denied any liability for compensation for the death of Hayden, and the dependents made due application for an adjustment of the claim. There were two hearings before the Commission. On the first the applicants were awarded the sum of $4,999.98. That decision was confirmed on the rehearing. Thereupon the petitioner brought this proceeding in review.

The defendant before the Commission, the petitioner here, denied liability for compensation in the matter of Hayden's death, upon the ground that his employment was both casual, and not in the course of petitioner's trade, business, profession, or occupation. There was ample proof that Hayden, at the time of receiving the injuries from which he died, was actually performing services for Mrs. Dearborn. The burden was therefore cast upon petitioner to prove that the deceased was an independent contractor in the matter, or otherwise excluded from the provisions of the Compensation Act. Workmen's Compensation Act, § 19d (Stats. 1917, p. 849). She was unsuccessful before the Commission, which found that the employment of Hayden was not casual, and made the award. The correctness of that finding presents the only point of controversy on the hearing.

The material facts appear without conflict. Mrs. Dearborn, the petitioner, is associated with her husband in ranching near Blythe, in this state. Being desirous of having a small dwelling house erected for the occupancy of her brother and his family, she employed the deceased, Hayden, to attend to the matter for her. She ordered the lumber and paid the labor bills. Her testimony relating to the employment is that—

> "He (Hayden) was to build that little house at Fertilla. He was to receive his pay by the day; that was what he asked; he did not ask for pay any other way. I employed him. I authorized him to employ the other carpenters. There was no understanding with him that I would give him a lump sum of money for building the house so that he could pay them; the arrangement was hurried; there was nothing said about help. Ultimately the price (for the help) would come out of my pocket. The only sum that was mentioned was the amount he asked me for his services by the day—that was $8.50. That is what I agreed to pay him. There was no provision whatever in the arrangement with Mr. Hayden by which a sum of money was to be paid to him for building this house, out of which he could pay these other men."

It appears also that Mrs. Dearborn bought and paid for all the lumber and materials used in the erection of the building. It seems conclusively established, therefore, that the deceased was not an independent contractor in building the house. Was he otherwise excluded from the protection of the act? To have worked this result his employment must have been both casual, and not in the course of the business or occupation of his employer. As before stated, Mrs. Dearborn was engaged, with her husband, in farming. Respondents do not contend that the employment of Hayden was in the course of that business. Hence the inquiry narrows to a consideration of the alleged nature of his work.

The relevant portion of the Workmen's Compensation Act, section 8a (Stats. 1917, p. 835), provides that the term "employee," as used in sections 6 to 31, inclusive, of the act, shall be construed to mean, "every person in the service of an employer, * * * but excluding," among others, any person whose employment is casual. Section 8c of the act provides that the term "casual" "shall be taken to refer only to employments where the work contemplated is to be completed in not exceeding ten working days, without regard to the number of men employed, and where the total labor cost of such work is less than one hundred dollars." The application of this test to the facts of the case presents the question to be determined.

At the outset of this inquiry we may repeat what was said by the present Chief Justice in Southern Pacific Co. v. Industrial Accident Comm., 177 Cal. 378, 380, 170 Pac. 822, 823:

> "This court, in reviewing awards of the commission, is not acting as a court of appeal. It has no power to weigh the effect of positive evidence. It must assume that the Commission believed all the evidence given which tends to sustain the award made. * * * Section 84 [section 67 of the present act] of the Workmen's Compensation Act, which gives us the power we are now exercising over this award of the Commission, authorizes us to annul an award only when the Commission acted without or beyond its powers, or when the award was procured by fraud, or is unreasonable, or when the findings of fact do not support it. The findings are not subject to review except in so far as they may have been made without any evidence whatever in support thereof. The review of the findings, even in such cases, is not based on the theory that they are not supported by the evidence and that we are weighing evidence to determine that proposition, but upon the theory that the Commission has no jurisdiction to make a finding where there is no evidence to support it."

This restatement of the power of the court on review in these proceedings is pertinent for the reason that the petitioner takes the position that there was no evidence in this proceeding below to support the finding of the noncasual character of Hayden's employment, and that, as a consequence of such absence of fact, the Commission exceeded its jurisdiction in making the award. If the petitioner's contention is correct the award must be annulled; otherwise it must stand.

According to the testimony before the Commission, Mrs. Dearborn contemplated the construction of a small dwelling on property to be purchased, to be occupied by her brother and his family. She wanted the work to be done quickly. Consequently she talked the matter over with the decedent, and employed him in the manner already shown. She was assured by Hayden that the work would take three or four days. Mrs. Dearborn and Hayden, together, ordered the first list of materials for the building. Hayden secured two carpenters to work with him on the job for two or three days, agreeing to pay them $8.50 per day, the same wages he was to be paid by the petitioner. The work was commenced on Wednesday, and had not proceeded far before the carpenters found they were short the amount of milling needed for the building. Hayden started to go to a nearby store to telephone to the lumber company about the shortage of material. He had not gone far when Mr. Ritchie, brother of Mrs. Dearborn, for whose use the latter was building the house, volunteered to take him to the store in his automobile. On the way Ritchie turned suddenly to avoid running down a chicken. As the auto swerved back into the roadway, which was in the sand, Hayden was thrown out, coming into violent contact with the ground, and sustained the injuries which resulted in his death. The work on the building was interrupted for a short time on the day of the accident, and for a like period on the day Hayden was buried. Lumber and materials for the job, costing in all $454.39, were ordered, from March 24th to and including April 9th. It was used in the building. Mrs. Dearborn testified that workmen were on the job all the time between those dates. Switzer, the last of the carpenters to be paid off, received a check dated April 10th. He testified that he worked but 8, 9 or 10 days, but the fact remains that the materials were being furnished to and were used in the erection of the structure by some one over a period far in excess of 10 days. The total cost of the labor for the building was $189.15. On the foregoing evidence the Commission based its findings and made the award.

The petitioner seeks to avoid the effect and compelling force of the evidence already summarized by asserting that, while the cost of the labor on the finished house, and the length of time consumed in its erection, unite to remove the work of decedent from the category of a "casual employment," the work actually "contemplated" by her when she employed Hayden was completed within 10 days, and at a cost for labor of less than $100. In support of this contention she testified that the structure she was building for the occupancy of her brother, and family, was to be completed only as far as the exterior was concerned. No inside comforts or furnishings were to be provided, and no toilet was to be built on the premises; that as the work progressed she changed her mind, and, in order to make the place more habitable as a dwelling, she went ahead and completed the structure. She relies upon evidence of an alleged understanding with the decedent, Hayden, that the house would be built in 3 or 4 days, and her own testimony as to what work she contemplated at the time. However that may be, at one point in her testimony Mrs. Dearborn testified that she employed Hayden "with the expectation that he would remain to finish—to go through with the building." It is quite clear that the death of Hayden in no way operated to cause any change in the plans for the building. It seems only reasonable to infer that the work actually contemplated by the petitioner, when she employed Hayden, was the erection of some kind of a dwelling house, which would be habitable, and at least fairly comfortable when occupied by her relatives. She may not have had very definite ideas on the subject as to the cost and duration of the work. Whatever her plans may have been, her testimony last quoted shows that it was undoubtedly within her contemplation that the decedent would remain to finish the work of erecting the building. That work, as has been shown, took more than 10 days, and the cost of the labor was in excess of $100. In the judgment of the Commission the petitioner did not successfully overcome the burden of proof imposed by the statute. It specifically found that the evidence before it was insufficient to show that the work contemplated was confined to exterior work and flooring, and did not include interior work and the toilet.

The respondents point out that, if it were true that the work contemplated by the petitioner, when she employed the decedent, was to be completed in 4 days, there would still be evidence to support the finding of the Commission that the cost of the labor was in excess of $100, and the employment was therefore not casual. The carpenters, and there were three of them, each received $8.50 per day. At that rate, the cost of their labor alone for the four days would amount to $102.

From this review of the proceedings it clearly appears that facts were not wanting before the Commission to justify the finding that the total labor cost of the building upon which the decedent employee was engaged was in excess of $100, and the time occupied by the contemplated work more than 10 days. Its conclusion, based thereon that the employment was not casual is amply supported. The Commission was therefore not without jurisdiction in the matter, and the award is affirmed.

SHIELDS v. RANCHO BUENA VENTURA.

1. Appeal and error 🔑1195(1)—Decisions on appeal law of case upon retrial.

Decision of District Court of Appeals reversing a judgment is to be taken as the law of the case upon retrial as to all points of law passed upon.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1194(3)—Decision of appellate court construed.

A statement of District Court of Appeal, on reversing a judgment for plaintiff, that "there can be no doubt that the plaintiff was required by his contract to render an account annually, and it is apparent that without this annual account there was no basis upon which a settlement could be arrived at between the parties," was not a decision that on retrial plaintiff could not recover without proving an annual submission of accounts to the defendant.

3. Master and servant 🔑70(3) — Keeping of accounts and yearly settlement held not essential to recovery of salary payable out of profits.

In an action to recover for services rendered in managing a ranch during three years, requirement in contract that there be a keeping of annual accounts held not of the essence of the contract, and plaintiff was entitled to compensation if he proved the items of account at the end of three years, and showed that the profits were sufficient for each year to pay his salary, which was dependent upon the profits exceeding a certain amount in each year; it appearing that, owing to the fact that the profits were not in the form of cash, there was not sufficient money with which to pay plaintiff at the end of the first two years, and he did not ask payment, and both parties continued under the contract, thereby waiving the right to a yearly settlement of accounts.

4. Evidence 🔑376(1)—Books of account held admissible.

Where manager of ranch kept a complete record of transactions by entries in memorandum books, books of secretary of corporation owning ranch were admissible in evidence, where such secretary testified that the entries therein were taken entirely from the manager's memoranda, and that these memoranda were correctly copied by him, and the manager testified as to the completeness and accuracy of his own memoranda.

5. Evidence 🔑177—Summaries of entries in book properly admitted.

Books of account being properly admitted in evidence, it was not error to permit a party to read in evidence summaries of the accounts therein for the purpose of avoiding delay, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1855, subd. 5.

6. Evidence 🔑354(19)—Witness may corroborate accounts by testifying to facts.

A party was properly entitled to corroborate accounts shown by books admitted in evidence by testifying to facts from his own personal knowledge.

7. Evidence 🔑314(1) — Testimony of corporate secretary held not hearsay.

Testimony of secretary of corporation that an entry in cash account represented cash belonging to plaintiff manager of ranch personally, and not cash obtained from defendant corporation, was not open to the objection that it was hearsay testimony, in view of the fact that the secretary was the bookkeeper for the corporation, and kept the books of the ranch before and during plaintiff's management, and was therefore presumably thoroughly familiar with the financial affairs of the corporation.

8. Master and servant 🔑80(10)—Evidence to show advances by employé.

In action by manager of ranch to recover compensation, evidence held to support an inference that $1,000, appearing in the cash account of defendant corporation owning the ranch, was the property of the plaintiff, and not the corporation, and that it was not chargeable against the plaintiff.

9. Appeal and error 🔑930(1)—Evidence viewed in light favorable to judgment.

On appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff, the evidence must be viewed in the light most favorable to plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Action by A. J. Shields against the Rancho Buena Ventura, a corporation. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 38 Cal. App. 696, 177 Pac. 499.

Short & Sutherland, Carl E. Lindsay, and Short, Lindsay & Woolley, all of Fresno, for appellant.

George Cosgrave and Frank Kauke, both of Fresno, for respondent.

LENNON, J. This is the second appeal prosecuted by the defendant corporation, Rancho Buena Ventura, from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, A. J. Shields, in an action upon claims alleged to have arisen in connection with the management of a ranch in Shasta county, Cal.

The ranch was the property of the defendant corporation. Practically the entire capital stock of this corporation was owned by three persons—Frank Short, George Hoxie, and the plaintiff, Shields. E. A. Mower was the secretary of the corporation, and handled all its accounts. For several years prior to 1910 plaintiff had been in charge of the ranch, developing it and working under a salary. In 1910 plaintiff and defendant corporation entered into a contract under which plaintiff operated and managed the ranch from January 1, 1910, until the month of October, 1912, when the land was sold. The provisions of the contract which are of importance for present purposes may be summarized as follows: Plaintiff was to have complete charge of the ranch and was to manage and conduct the same. It was agreed that:

> "The party of the second part [plaintiff herein] is to keep full and correct books of account showing all receipts and expenditures by him received, incurred or made in connection with said ranch, all business and the products thereof, and all of the same, and on the first day of January of each year the party of the second part will render a complete, full and correct statement of his accounts and transactions, receipts and expenditures."

The proceeds of the ranch were to be applied in the following manner: After the payment of all expenses incurred in the management of the ranch, including the household and living expenses of himself and family, plaintiff was entitled to $1,500 each year in full payment for his services; all of the residue was the property of the defendant corporation. There was a provision that the contract should cease to operate upon certain contingencies, one of which was a sale of the premises, and therefore the agreement was terminated by the sale of the ranch in October, 1912.

In this action plaintiff seeks to recover compensation for his services, at the rate of $1,500 per year, or $125 per month, for the period during which he managed the ranch under the above-mentioned contract, namely, from January, 1910, until October, 1912. He also asks repayment of a certain sum claimed to have been advanced by him in connection with the management of the ranch and not repaid by defendant. The first trial resulted in a verdict and judgment in plaintiff's favor for the sum of $7,060.94, but the judgment was reversed by the District Court of Appeal. Shields v. Rancho Buena Ventura, 38 Cal. App. 696, 177 Pac. 499. Upon the second trial plaintiff voluntarily reduced his claim to $5,742.52, and recovered a verdict and judgment for that amount. This latter sum is arrived at by computing plaintiff's salary at $125 a month for 34 months, making a total of $4,250, and allowing $1,492.52 for money advanced for the use of defendant.

[1-3] The decision of the District Court of Appeal in Shields v. Rancho Buena Ventura, 38 Cal. App. 696, 177 Pac. 499, reversing the first judgment in plaintiff's favor, must as to all points of law therein passed upon be taken as the law of the case upon retrial. Relying upon this fact, defendant contends that the holding in that case was that plaintiff could not recover without a showing that he had rendered annual accounts to the defendant as required by his contract, and, inasmuch as it is conceded that plaintiff did not report to defendant concerning the state of his accounts at the end of each year during the time that he was managing the ranch, defendant deduces the conclusion that plaintiff has failed to make out a case under the law as established upon the previous appeal. This contention cannot be sustained for the reason that it is based upon an incorrect interpretation of the decision of the District Court of Appeal. In that decision it was held that "the operation of the ranch by the plaintiff was as to each year a separate and distinct transaction, and not a continuous transaction for the entire period," and that consequently before plaintiff could recover for any year the compensation of $1,500 provided for by the contract, it must be made to appear that the net proceeds of the ranch for that year equaled that sum. At the first trial plaintiff made no attempt whatever to show the amount of the proceeds of the same for any one year, but merely introduced in evidence a single account covering the entire period from January, 1910, to November, 1912, and, accordingly, the judgment was reversed for the reason that—

> "The jury in the condition of the evidence upon which the cause was submitted, had no means of knowing whether for the years 1910 and 1911 there was anything due from the defendant to the plaintiff under the terms of the contract."

Since the total lack of evidence concerning the annual profits of the ranch was the ground of the reversal of the first judgment in plaintiff's favor, it is apparent that the question of the effect of plaintiff's failure to render an annual report to the defendant was not within the issues decided upon the former appeal. Upon that appeal it was said:

> "There can be no doubt that the plaintiff was required by his contract to render an account annually; and it is apparent that without this annual account there was no basis upon which a settlement could be arrived at between the parties."

Defendant interprets this to mean that plaintiff could not recover without proving an annual submission of accounts to the defendant, but that is not the purport of the quoted sentence. The keeping accounts in annual periods and the submission of these accounts to the defendant at the end of each year are distinct obligations, and the sentence in question may be paraphrased thus: The keeping of accounts in annual periods was indispensable to the performance of the contract by its very terms; the contract also called for the presentation of these accounts annually. But the annual presentation of the accounts was not of the essence of the contract. Plaintiff was not entitled to compensation until he proved that the amount of compensation claimed by him had been earned by the ranch during the year in which the services were rendered, and, therefore, if plaintiff demanded that his compensation be paid precisely at the end of each year, it was incumbent upon him to report upon his accounts at that time. It appears, however, that, owing to the fact that the profits of the ranch were not in the form of cash, there was insufficient money with which to pay plaintiff at the end of the years 1910 and 1911. As a result, plaintiff did not ask payment at the end of these years, but plaintiff and defendant continued under the contract, payment of the salary being deferred, until the sale in 1912. Under these circumstances it must be held that both parties waived the right to a yearly settlement of accounts. Therefore, if plaintiff can prove that there was each year a profit equal to or in excess of the sum of $1,500, he is entitled to full compensation, irrespective of the fact that his accounts were not presented and settled annually.

[4-6] Proceeding in accordance with the ruling of the District Court of Appeal, plaintiff introduced evidence at the second trial showing, or tending to show, that he had kept a complete record of all transactions at the ranch by entries in memorandum books, and that from these memoranda the secretary of the corporation subsequently posted up the corporation's books. The plaintiff's memorandum books were not offered in evidence for the reason that they were left upon the ranch when it was sold in 1912 and were subsequently burned, but the books kept by the secretary of the corporation were produced in court. The secretary testified, regarding the manner in which he kept the books, that the entries therein were taken entirely from plaintiff's memoranda, and that these memoranda were correctly copied by him. Plaintiff himself testified concerning the completeness and accuracy of his own memoranda of the transactions on the ranch. The books having thus been authenticated and their correctness attested by the party who made the entries and by the person furnishing the original data from which the entries were made, they were admissible as containing the first permanent entries of the transactions in question. Chan Kiu Sing v. Gordon, 171 Cal. 28, 151 Pac. 657; San Francisco Teaming Co. v. Gray, 11 Cal. App. 314, 319, 104 Pac. 999; Mercantile Trust Co. v. Doe, 26 Cal. App. 246, 256, 146 Pac. 692; Chicago Lumbering Co. v. Hewitt, 64 Fed. 314, 12 C. C. A. 129. The books of account being properly admitted, it was not error to permit the plaintiff to read in evidence summaries of the accounts therein, for the purpose of avoiding delay. Code Civ. Proc. § 1855, subd. 5. Nor was error committed in admitting, in addition to these accounts, the testimony of the plaintiff concerning the transactions on the ranch during each of the years mentioned. If plaintiff was able to corroborate the accounts by testifying to facts from his own personal knowledge, certainly the admission of this testimony furnishes the defendant no ground of complaint.

It appears from the accounts, and testimony, that there was not enough cash on hand to pay plaintiff's salary at the end of the years 1910 and 1911, but plaintiff contends that the gain is to be found in the value of the increase in stock and products, together with an increase in the permanent improvements on the ranch. Upon this phase of the case it was stated in the opinion of the District Court of Appeal upon the former appeal:

> "A proper construction of this contract, having in mind the conditions under which it was entered into and its objects and purposes, would treat as proceeds, not only money received from actual sales of produce, but the increased value of stock or produce on hand at the end of a given year over the value of stock or produce on hand at the end of the preceding year; for it was the duty of the plaintiff, under his contract, to manage the business prudently and for the best interests of his employer, and it would not be to that interest that he should, in anticipation of the closing of the annual period, make hasty and ill-advised sales of produce merely for the purpose of having money on hand applicable to the payment of expenses and his own compensation."

This interpretation of the contract is not attacked by defendant, and, placing this construction upon the contract, the accounts and the inventories put in evidence at the second trial, supplemented by Mr. Mower's and the plaintiff's testimony, reveal a net gain each year considerably in excess of $1,500. The evidence is too voluminous to warrant setting it forth in this opinion. Suffice it to say that the evidence was sufficiently substantial to support the finding of the jury, which must be implied from the verdict, that the amount of the net proceeds resulting from the operation of the ranch each of the years in question entitled plaintiff to full compensation for his services under his contract.

The next question for consideration is plaintiff's right to reimbursement in the sum of $1,492.52 for money alleged to have been invested by him in the ranch. The only question raised by defendant in connection with this phase of the case is whether or not there is sufficient evidence that that sum was actually advanced by plaintiff in the management of the ranch. This must be ascertained from the summaries of cash receipts and disbursements. It may be stated, by way of preliminary explanation, that these accounts contained entries of the receipt and disbursement of some $6,200, which was borrowed for use in the management of the ranch and repaid by plaintiff from the income from the ranch. An additional $3,000, borrowed by plaintiff, was entered among the receipts of the ranch. At the termination of the agreement plaintiff had on hand a sum sufficient to repay this obligation. The transactions concerning this $9,200, and the payment of interest thereon, may, it is conceded, be eliminated from the accounts in determining the amount of cash received and disbursed in managing the ranch. Moreover, plaintiff's salary, although not actually paid, was entered among the disbursements as a matter of bookkeeping, because sufficient profits had in fact been earned to entitle plaintiff to the amount thereof. Eliminating the money borrowed from receipts and eliminating the money repaid, together with interest thereon, and the salary items from the disbursements, the accounts show that the excess of cash disbursements over receipts was approximately $3,800 in the year 1910, and $790 in 1911, while receipts were about $3,082 greater than disbursements for the 10 months of 1912, making a total of some $1,500 excess of disbursements over receipts during the period of plaintiff's management. This fact, when considered in connection with the testimony of plaintiff that he received no money from the corporation for the management of the ranch, is sufficient evidence in support of plaintiff's claim to reimbursement to the extent that the expenditures exceeded receipts.

[7, 8] Defendant attacks this conclusion upon two grounds. It is first claimed that in this computation plaintiff has failed to credit defendant with $1,000 in cash which the cash account shows he had on hand at the time he started operations under the contract, and which, it is claimed, was the property of the defendant corporation. Mr. Mower, the secretary of the corporation, testified that this entry in the cash account of $1,000 "cash on hand" as of January 1, 1910, represented cash belonging to the plaintiff personally, and not cash obtained from the defendant. The suggestion that this was hearsay testimony is of little weight, in view of the fact that Mr. Mower was bookkeeper for the company, kept the books of the ranch both before and during plaintiff's management, and therefore was presumably thoroughly familiar with the financial affairs of the company. Moreover, plaintiff himself testified that the defendant never advanced any money for use on the ranch and the money in question is not listed in the inventory of the property of the corporation intrusted to plaintiff under the contract on January 1, 1910. Clearly, therefore, there is evidence to support the inference that this $1,000 appearing in the cash account was the property of the plaintiff, and no more belonged to the defendant than the money borrowed by the plaintiff and repaid by him, which likewise found its way into the cash account.

[9] The next contention of defendant is that, even conceding that this $1,000 expended in the management of the ranch was the money of the plaintiff, the latter's own testimony proves that there is no possible source from which he could have obtained the remaining $492.52 claimed to have been advanced by plaintiff to the corporation and allowed him by the jury. Plaintiff testified, in effect, that on January 1, 1910, he had $2,000 in his own personal funds, and that later he received a dividend of $2.000. Aside from the $1,000 expended by him in the management of the ranch, this $4,000 represents the total amount of plaintiff's personal funds while he was in control of the ranch. It is defendant's theory that the disposition of this money is entirely accounted for by plaintiff's testimony to the effect that he had spent some $4,000 in the support of his wife and children during the period between January 1, 1910, and October, 1912, and that it is therefore apparent that plaintiff did not have $492.52 of his own money to expend for the corporation. The fallacy of this argument lies in defendant's interpretation of plaintiff's testimony concerning the amount of money spent by him in the support of his family. It is true that there is some confusion in plaintiff's testimony, and that it is possible to interpret his testimony as estimating his expenses to have been as high as $4,000. Nevertheless, the testimony will also support a lower estimate, and upon this appeal it must be viewed in the light most favorable to plaintiff. In approximating plaintiff's personal expenses it must be remembered that the household and living expenses of plaintiff were, under the terms of the contract, paid from the income from the ranch and rated as part of the expense of managing the ranch, and that there was testimony that plaintiff's wife had money of her own, and "always attended to her own buying."

Turning, then, to the testimony relied upon by defendant, it may be summarized, in the aspect most favorable to plaintiff, as follows: Plaintiff expended "around $100 a month" upon his three children during the time they were in school. Allowing for a three months' vacation, this would amount to $900 a year. From January, 1910, until October, 1912, this would mean an expenditure of approximately $2,500. Plaintiff estimated his own personal expenses, and those of his wife paid by him, at less than $500, making a total of $3,000. Even allowing a margin of $500, this calculation shows that plaintiff would still have had sufficient cash to advance to the corporation the $492.52 for which the jury allowed him reimbursement.

The judgment is affirmed.

MARTIN v. DE SHIELDS, Auditor of Tehama County. (Sac. 3234.)

1. Counties 🔑74(6)—Provision in freeholders' county charter setting compensation of deputy county officer is illegal.

An allowance in a county freeholders' charter to a chief deputy or other deputy as a salary for the services of such deputy is in violation of Const. art. 11, § 7½, subd. 5, requiring that the power to fix the number and compensation of deputies must be vested by the charter in the board of supervisors.

2. Sheriffs and constables 🔑29—County charter fixing salary of sheriff and deputy held legal under authority to fix salary of sheriff.

Under Const. art. 11, § 7½, subd. 2, authorizing a county freeholders' charter to fix the compensation of the sheriff, a clause of a freeholders' county charter setting the salary of the sheriff and allowing him deputies not to exceed a certain sum, being a method of fixing the sheriff's compensation, is legal notwithstanding subdivision 5, providing that such a charter must provide for the appointment and compensation of deputy county officers by ordinance of the board of supervisors.

3. Sheriffs and constables 🔑17—County freeholders' charter held not to limit right of Legislature to provide for deputy sheriffs.

Where a county freeholders' charter contained no limitation on the power of the Legislature to give the sheriff additional deputies, and did not authorize the supervisors to make provision for the deputies, the right of providing for deputy sheriffs remains with the Legislature.

Petitioner, Henry Arthur Martin, was appointed by the sheriff of Tehama county to the position of deputy sheriff, but respondent, George M. De Shields, as auditor of said county, refused to draw his warrant on the county treasurer in the sum of $108.33 for petitioner's salary for the month of November, 1920. The contentions of the parties are the same as those made in Jones v. De Shields, supra.

[1] In section 1 of article IV of the charter of Tehama county (Stats. 1917, p. 1883) it is provided as follows:

> "The salary of the sheriff as sheriff and coroner shall be two thousand four hundred dollars per annum, and he may be allowed deputies at not to exceed one thousand three hundred dollars per annum."

As was held in Jones v. De Shields, supra, an allowance to the chief deputy or other deputy as salary for the services of such deputy is violative of the constitutional provision which requires that the power to fix the number and compensation of deputies must be vested by the charter in the board of supervisors. The situation, however, presented by the provision of the charter relating to the salary of the sheriff is different.

[2] The provision with reference to the salary of deputies is a part of the provision fixing the compensation of the sheriff as authorized by subdivision 2 of section 7½ of article 11 of the Constitution. See Dougherty v. Austin, 94 Cal. 601, 28 Pac. 834, 29 Pac. 1092, 16 L. R. A. 161. It is as though the provision had read:

> "The compensation of the sheriff shall be $2,400 per annum and the pay of his necessary deputies to the extent of $1,300 per annum."

If part of the provision must fall, it is clear that all must fall, with the result that the charter would be without any valid provision at all as to the compensation of the sheriff. This would relegate the sheriff to his salary under the general law. Jones v. De Shields, supra. It is not necessary, however, to hold the entire provision invalid. It embodies a well-recognized method of fixing the compensation of an officer, as shown by Dougherty v. Austin, supra, and a long line of subsequent decisions, at either a lump sum, he to pay his own deputies and assistants, or at a specified sum, with an allowance for a part of the expenses of deputies and assistants. Here we have the second one of these alternative methods—a specified sum, together with further allowance for deputies to the extent of $1,300 per annum. If we assume that the sum of $1,300 allowed for deputies is an essential part of the compensation of the sheriff, and therefore the provision concerning the same authorized by the provisions of section 7½, art. 11, providing that the compensation of the sheriff may be fixed by the charter, then the sheriff undoubtedly had a right to appoint the petitioner as deputy sheriff under the general law at a salary to be fixed by the sheriff himself and to be paid from the compensation allowed by the charter to the sheriff, unless other provision is made in that behalf by the general law. The general law relating to Tehama county fixes the salary of the sheriff at $4,800, a lump sum, from which salary the sheriff is required to pay his deputies. The salary of $2,400 allowed by the charter, plus an allowance of $1,300 for deputies, takes the place and supersedes the salary allowed by the general law to the sheriff. It may be assumed, we think, in the absence of any contention or showing to the contrary, that the sheriff in employing the petitioner fixed his salary at the sum of $108.33 per month, and this sum so fixed by the sheriff is payable from the county treasury from that portion of the salary of the sheriff fixed by the charter to be paid to his deputies.

[3] It is to be observed that we are not here considering a situation where the general law fixes the salaries of the sheriff's deputies in Tehama county. We are merely determining that the effect of the charter is to fix the compensation of the sheriff at $3,700 per annum, $1,300 thereof to be used by the sheriff for compensation for such necessary deputies as he may appoint to assist him in the performance of his duties. The charter cannot be considered as a limitation upon the power of the Legislature to give to the sheriff additional deputies, as such limitation has no place in the charter. Jones v. De Shields, supra. The charter having failed to authorize the supervisors to make provision for necessary deputies for the sheriff, that right remains in the state Legislature. In the meantime, however, the sheriff is entitled to appoint deputies and pay their salaries to the extent of $1,300 from the fund set apart for that purpose to him by the charter.

The application for a writ of mandate is granted.

UNITED TAXPAYERS' CO. v. CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO.

1. Interest 🔑39(2)—Judgment 🔑22—Interest improperly allowed on an order for judgment.

An order for judgment is not a judgment under Civ. Code, § 1920, which allows interest upon judgments from the date of their entry, and such is true as to cases brought under Pol. Code, § 3819, to recover taxes paid under protest, and it was error for court to allow interest in a judgment, even though plaintiff was entitled to have such court enter a judgment nunc pro tunc as of the date of the early order; no such form of judgment being asked for or obtained.

2. Judgment 🔑251(1), 255—Must not cover issues and amounts not embraced in pleading or stipulations.

A judgment to recover taxes illegally collected under Pol. Code, § 3819, could not be so expanded as to cover issues and amounts and items not embraced in the plaintiff's pleading, and not covered by stipulations of the parties as to the facts of the case.

Action by the United Taxpayers' Company against the City and County of San Francisco. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Judgment modified.

George Lull, City Atty., and Maurice T. Dooling, Jr., Asst. City Atty., both of San Francisco, for appellant.

J. E. Bien, of San Francisco, and E. H. Williams, of San Leandro, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This action was commenced by the plaintiff, United Taxpayers' Company, as the assignee of seven different taxpayers to recover back from the city and county of San Francisco certain taxes for the fiscal year 1907–08 alleged to have been paid under protest pursuant to the provisions of section 3819 of the Political Code. The aggregate sum which the plaintiff thus sought to recover as stated in the prayer of its complaint was $4,777.26, with interest thereon from the 17th day of January, 1908, together with costs.

The answer of the defendant was so framed as to put in issue most of the allegations of the complaint but subsequently to the date of filing the same and on June 2, 1910, there was filed the stipulation of the parties to the action embracing an agreed statement of facts to be used at the trial of the case. In said stipulation the right was expressly reserved to the parties to introduce evidence at the trial as to any other facts not inconsistent with those admitted to be true by the terms of said stipulation. Shortly after the filing of said stipulation the parties hereto entered into another stipulation permitting an amendment to the plaintiff's complaint so as to show that Jacob Kamm, one of the plaintiff's assignors, had paid an additional sum of $1,690.65 as a second installment of taxes for said fiscal year; it being stipulated, however, that at the time of the payment of said second installment of taxes no other or additional protest was made to that filed by said Kamm at the time of payment of the first installment of his taxes. Certain other amendments to said complaint were agreed to and made, but no additional sum was prayed for to the aggregate demanded in the original complaint.

It would seem that at or about the time when the foregoing stipulations were entered into there had been put to trial and tried and determined in the trial court an action entitled Josselyn v. City and County of San Francisco, which was a case involving the same issues of law as are involved in the present action. An appeal was taken in that case to the Supreme Court, which was heard and determined therein, and a decision rendered on October 2, 1914, which decision is to be found in Josselyn v. City and County of San Francisco, 168 Cal. 436, 143 Pac. 705. While this last-named case was taking its course through the process of trial, appeal, and final determination in the Supreme Court, nothing further was done in the instant case, with the exception of the matters and things which are referred to and agreed to in a stipulation between the parties hereto entered into on the 18th day of June, 1919, and filed on the 28th day of July, 1919. It may be noted that said stipulation refers to the present action and also to another and similar action having the same title and wherein a like agreed statement of facts had been filed. This last stipulation reads as follows:

"Whereas, prior to November 10, 1910, a certain stipulation and agreed statement of fact was entered into by and between the plaintiff above named by Joseph E. Bien, Esq., its attorney, and the defendant above named by the then city attorney, by the terms of which certain facts being then and there matters of record then and there known to the said city attorney of his own knowledge, were stipulated and agreed to as being true with the same effect as if said facts had been proved in open court by competent evidence; and

"Whereas, prior to said November 10, 1910, it was further stipulated and agreed between the said plaintiff and the said defendant by its then city attorney that the said statement of facts should apply to and govern both of the cases numbered and entitled as above in the records and files of the superior court of the state of California in and for the city and county of San Francisco; and

"Whereas, it was prior to November 10, 1910, stipulated between plaintiff and defendant by its then city attorney that the issues of law presented by the facts so stipulated and agreed to should be determined according to the rulings of the courts in other cases arising on identical facts and then and there pending for determination in the courts of California; and

"Whereas, the Supreme Court of the state of California, in the case of Josselyn v. City and County of San Francisco, 168 Cal. p. 436 [143 Pac. 705], in its decision duly given and made October 2, 1914, resolved all points of law presented by an identical agreed statement of facts against defendant; and

"Whereas, the superior court of the State of California in and for the city and county of San Francisco, dept. 1 thereof, J. M. Seawell, judge presiding, did on November 10, 1910, duly give and make its order for judgment in favor of the plaintiff as prayed in both of the said actions numbered and entitled as above:

"Now, therefore, it is hereby stipulated and agreed that said agreed statement of facts may be taken as and for findings in the above-entitled actions, and that all further findings and facts other than the facts stated in the agreed statement may be waived."

Upon the making and filing of the foregoing stipulation, this case came on to trial and was submitted to the trial court for its decision upon the aforesaid agreed statement of facts and upon said last-named stipulation; whereupon, and on August 22, 1919, the trial court rendered and entered its judgment herein in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $5,750. It is from this judgment that the present appeal has been taken.

The single point urged by the appellant upon this appeal is that the judgment appealed from is $972.74 in excess of the sum which the plaintiff, in its original complaint, sought to recover, and is the same amount in excess of any judgment which the trial court was empowered to render under the agreed statement of facts and the stipulations of the parties to the action.

No reason was assigned by the trial court for this increase of $972.74 in its judgment over the amount demanded by the plaintiff in its complaint, and we are left in a large measure to the surmise of the respective parties as embodied in their briefs for whatever reason, good or bad, there may be for this increase. The appellant suggests two conceivable reasons for the court's action, both of which it argues are indefensible. One of these is that the trial court undertook to award to plaintiff interest upon the amount prayed for in its complaint from and after the 10th day of November, 1910, when, according to the last stipulation of the parties above set forth in full, the trial court did "duly give and make its order for judgment in favor of plaintiff as prayed for." This supposititious reason for the increased amount of said judgment is indefensible, according to the contention of the appellant, because no actual judgment was then or ever entered pursuant to said order, and hence there was no actual judgment prior to August 22, 1919, upon which interest could be computed or allowed under section 3819 of the Political Code, as well as under section 1920 of the Civil Code.

The second reason which the appellant surmises for the increase of said judgment is that the trial court undertook to allow plaintiff judgment for some other item of taxes held to have been illegally imposed in the Josselyn Case, but for which item of taxes this plaintiff had not in this action sought recovery.

The respondent herein takes up the gauge of battle which the appellant thus throws down. It asserts, as to the first proposition, that the order for judgment stipulated to have been given and made by the trial court on November 10, 1910, was and is a sufficient foundation for the allowance of interest by it from that date forward in its judgment finally rendered and entered on August 22, 1919.

[1] This contention cannot be sustained. An order for judgment is not a judgment. Delger v. Jacobs, 19 Cal. App. 197, 125 Pac. 258; Canadian, etc., Co. v. Clarita, etc., Co., 140 Cal. 672, 74 Pac. 301. Interest, by the express language of section 1920 of the Civil Code, is allowable upon judgments from the date of their entry only; and concededly no judgment was entered in this action until August 22, 1919. Whether or not, under the terms of the foregoing stipulation the plaintiff would be entitled to have the trial court enter said judgment nunc pro tunc as of the date of its earlier order for judgment is quite immaterial here, since no such form of judgment was asked for or obtained. Under the authority not only of the Code, but of repeated decisions of our Supreme Court, interest prior to the entry of judgment cannot be allowed in the class of cases permissible to be brought under section 3819 of the Political Code. Sav. & Loan Soc. v. San Francisco, 131 Cal. 356, 63 Pac. 665; Columbia Sav. Bank v. Los Angeles County, 37 Cal. 467, 70 Pac. 308; Miller v. Kern County, 150 Cal. 797, 90 Pac. 119; Kern Valley W. Co. v. Kern County, 150 Cal. 801, 90 Pac. 121.

[2] The next contention of the respondent is that, under the terms of the stipulation of the parties entered into on June 18, 1919, and above set forth in full the plaintiff would be entitled in this action to recover everything in the way of taxes illegally collected from him which the plaintiff in the Josselyn Case was held to be entitled to recover. It needs no argument that this contention cannot be sustained, since to do so would be to import into the plaintiff's pleading and prayer for recovery items of taxes regarding which no issues were ever framed nor any agreed statement of facts ever filed. The agreed statement of facts made and filed in open court on June 2, 1910, covers only one item of taxes found to have been illegally imposed in the Josselyn Case. This agreed statement of facts then filed took the place of findings in the instant case by virtue of the stipulation of the parties entered into upon June 18, 1919, and upon which the judgment entered on August 22, 1919, was predicated. This judgment could by no process of sound reasoning be so expanded as to cover issues and amounts not embraced in the plaintiff's pleading and not covered by the stipulation of the parties as to the facts of the case. It follows necessarily that the judgment of the trial court exceeded the amount which under the pleadings in the case and the stipulations of the parties it was entitled to render by the sum of $972.74, and that it must be modified so as to eliminate this excess.

It is therefore ordered that the judgment herein be so modified as to strike therefrom the sum of $972.74 as of the date of the entry thereof; and the trial court is hereby directed to make such modification and enter its judgment accordingly in the plaintiff's favor for the sum of $4,777.26 as of the date of its original judgment herein.

McKINNON v. UNITED RAILROADS OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (Civ. 3925.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Nov. 7, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 5, 1922.)

1. Carriers 🔑321(12)—Instructions in suit for injury in collision against two street railroads held not erroneous as misleading.

In a suit for injury to a passenger in a collision against two street railroads, two instructions given after instructing the jury that each of defendants was a common carrier, one, that proof of injury to a passenger on the car of a common carrier, caused by operation of the car casts on the carrier the burden of proving the injury was occasioned by inevitable casualty, etc., and, the other, that a carrier of passengers is required to exercise the highest degree of care in their safe transportation and is responsible for injuries received by a passenger without fault, which injuries might have been avoided by exercise of such care, and hence when it is shown that injury to a passenger was caused by the carrier operating the instrumentalities employed in its business, there is a presumption of negligence, etc., obviously applied to the carrier on whose car he was riding, and were not erroneous as misleading the jury to apply them to the other carrier's liability.

2. Carriers 🔑321(23)—Evidence held to justify an instruction predicated on violation of a speed ordinance.

Where, in a suit for injury in a collision at a crossing between street cars, one of which was descending a hill, it was shown that it and other similarly constructed and operated cars were accustomed to safely negotiate this particular decline under conditions identical with those attending the collision in question, and no reason appeared why this car could not have done so if in proper mechanical condition and properly run, it justified an instruction predicated on the violation of an ordinance limiting speed to 10 miles an hour, as against a contention that the evidence did not show a violation thereof, and did show the car was a runaway in the sense that owing to a slippery condition it got beyond control.

3. Carriers 🔑297—Motor Vehicle Act held not to apply to street railways and not to repeal speed ordinance and so render erroneous instruction based on violation thereof.

Motor Vehicle Act, limiting speed to 20 miles per hour, has no application to vehicles operated on stationary rails or tracks, and hence does not repeal an ordinance limiting the speed of street cars to 10 miles, and so render erroneous an instruction predicating liability for injury to a passenger on a violation of such ordinance.

4. Appeal and error 🔑1066—Instructions as to liability of a street railroad for the acts of its gripman held not prejudicial to its codefendants.

In suit for injuries received in a collision at a crossing of street car tracks, an instruction that the gripman of one defendant railway company had a right to rely on the right of way given to his street car at that place, but that, if a situation should arise so that the safety of the passengers should require it, it would be his duty to yield the right of way, was correct as to the company whose car was carrying the injured person and specifically applied to that company and was not prejudicial to its codefendant.

5. Appeal and error ⚷1066—In action against two codefendants, instruction specifically applying to one held not prejudicial to the other.

In an action for injuries received in a collision of street cars at crossing of street car tracks, an instruction that if the gripman of the car on which the injured person was riding was suddenly confronted by imminent danger demanding alternative courses of conduct, and made such choice as a person of ordinary prudence placed in such a position might make, the fact that if he had chosen the other hazard he would have escaped the injury was not important, was correct, and, being specifically applicable to one defendant, was not prejudicial to its codefendant.

6. Trial ⚷191(8), 240—Instruction held not defective as argumentative and assuming negligence of defendant.

In an action for injuries received in a collision between street cars at a track crossing, an instruction that a slippery track is no excuse if the railroad company was guilty of negligence in failing to provide against its consequences was correct in principle, and was not defective as being argumentative and assuming the negligence of defendant.

7. Trial ⚷260(1)—Refusal to give instruction in form asked when substance is given in another form is not prejudicial.

Refusal to give instructions in form of which they were asked, which were fully and sufficiently covered by other instructions given by the court, does not constitute prejudicial injury.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by John L. McKinnon against the United Railroads of San Francisco and another. From judgment for plaintiff against the named defendant, it appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. M. Cannon, Wm. M. Abbott, and Kingsley Cannon, all of San Francisco, for defendant and appellant.

Sullivan & Sullivan and Theo. J. Roche, all of San Francisco, for plaintiff and respondent.

Wright, Wright & Stetson and J. J. Dunne, all of San Francisco, for defendant and respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal by the defendant United Railroads of San Francisco from a judgment for the sum of $1,500 rendered against it in an action for damages for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff in a collision between the street car of the said defendant and a street car of its codefendant, California Street Cable Railroad Company, upon the car of which latter codefendant the plaintiff was a passenger.

The collision occurred on the evening of May 27, 1917, at the intersection of Hyde and Sacramento streets in the city and county of San Francisco. The Hyde street car of the California Street Cable Railroad Company had come up Hyde street, traveling in a northerly direction, and was crossing Sacramento street when it was struck by the car of the Sacramento street line of the United Railroads, which descended the hill on that street going west, and collided with the rear end of the Hyde street car. The undisputed evidence shows that a short while before the time of the collision a drizzling rain or mist had been falling in that vicinity, rendering the rails of the respective street car systems quite slippery. The evidence also shows without conflict that both by custom and by agreement the cars of the California Street Cable Company had the right of way at this particular intersection. The plaintiff was himself without fault in relation to the collision and his injuries sustained thereby.

Upon the trial of the cause the jury returned a verdict absolving the defendant California Street Cable Railroad Company from responsibility for the collision, but fixing the responsibility therefor upon the defendant United Railroads, against which it awarded the plaintiff damages in the sum of $1,500. The latter defendant appeals from the judgment which followed this award.

While the appellant herein urges that upon the facts of the case the jury if rightfully instructed, might with reason have returned a verdict in its favor, it does not seriously argue that the evidence in the case is insufficient to support the verdict which the jury in fact rendered. Its argument upon this appeal is devoted solely to alleged errors in the instructions of the trial court by which the jury was prejudicially misled as to the law of the case.

[1] The first two instructions which the appellant assails may be considered together, since the same argument is urged against each. After instructing the jury that each of the defendants was a common carrier of passengers in said city, the court gave these two instructions:

> "The proof of an injury to a passenger on the car of a common carrier, caused by the operation of the car, casts upon the common carrier the burden of proving that the injury was occasioned by inevitable casualty or some other cause which human care and foresight could not prevent.
> "A carrier of passengers is required to exercise the highest degree of care and diligence in their safe transportation, and is responsible for injuries received by a passenger without fault of his own which injuries might have been avoided by the exercise of such care. Hence, when it is shown that an injury to a passenger was caused by the act of the carrier in operating the instrumentalities employed in its business, there is a presumption of negligence which throws upon the carrier the burden of showing that the injury was sustained without negligence on its part."

It is claimed that the jury were misled into giving each of these instructions application to the legal liability of this appellant as one of the defendants in the case, which were prejudically erroneous as applied to it.

If this premise were correct, the conclusion would be irresistible; but reading these two instructions, it is, we think, perfectly obvious that they were applicable only to the codefendant of this appellant, and as applied to it were sound law; and this becomes even more apparent if possible when the instructions of the trial court are considered as a whole, since it therein appears that the court was particularly if not unusually explicit in pointing out to the jury the difference in point of the law of liability between the California Street Cable Railroad Company as the carrier of this particular passenger, and that of the United Railroads as a carrier generally, but not as the carrier of the plaintiff at the time of said collision. This being so, the plaintiff was clearly entitled to have these two instructions given to the jury in support of his claim for damages against the codefendant of the appellant, and, as we have indicated, the jury could not have been misled thereby.

[2] The next contention of the appellant is that the trial court erred in instructing the jury that a violation of the speed ordinance of the city and county of San Francisco, if found to exist on the part of the United Railroads at the time of said collision, constituted negligence per se. The argument offered in support of this contention is threefold: First, that the evidence does not show that there was any violation of the terms of said ordinance, which limits the speed of street cars to 10 miles an hour; second, that the evidence shows that the car of the appellant responsible for this collision was a runaway car in the sense that owing to the slippery condition of the road it had gotten beyond its operator's control while descending the Sacramento street hill immediately prior to the collision; third, that the provisions of the ordinance in question had been repealed by the provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act permitting a speed for vehicles of 20 miles an hour in cities.

As to the first two of these contentions it may be said that the evidence in the case does in our opinion sufficiently justify the instruction in question, both that the car on its way down the hill was traveling at an accelerating speed in excess of that permitted by said ordinances, and that in so doing it was not a runaway car in the sense that the appellant was not to be held liable for its excess of speed. It and other similarly constructed and operated cars of the said defendant were shown to have been accustomed to safely negotiate this particular decline under conditions identical with those attending this particular collision, and no reason appears why this car should not have done so if in proper mechanical condition and if properly run and operated. That it did not do so on this occasion would seem to reasonably give rise to the inference that it was not in such condition or was not carefully controlled.

[3] As to the third of the appellant's contentions in respect to this instruction, it will appear from a cursory reading of the Motor Vehicle Act that it has no application to vehicles operated upon stationary rails or tracks. Stats. 1917, p. 382.

[4] The appellant's next contention is that the trial court erred in its instruction to the jury to the effect that the gripman of the Hyde street car was entitled to rely upon the presumption that the right of way of his car would be respected by the car of the United Railroads Company. While it may be conceded that a general instruction to the above effect would be obnoxious to the law and language of the Supreme Court in the case of Kimic v. San Jose-Los Gatos, etc., Co. et al., 156 Cal. 379, 104 Pac. 986, it will be noted in the instant case that the instruction thus objected to by the appellant herein was not the only instruction which the trial court gave on this subject, since it also gave the following instruction:

"Even if you find that the defendant California Street Cable Railroad Company had the right of way over the crossing of Sacramento and Hyde streets at the time of the accident in question, that fact would not release it from the legal burden of exercising the highest degree of care for the safety of its passengers. If a situation should present itself in which the safety of its passengers would require it to yield the right of way to its codefendant in order to avoid a collision and injury to its passengers, it would be its duty, if by the exercise of the highest degree of care it could do so, to yield such right of way so as to save its passengers from injury."

When these two instructions are read together, they come fairly, we think, within the rule enunciated in the Kimic Case; but however that may be, we are unable to perceive that this appellant was prejudicially injured by the act of the court in giving it, since their special application in this case was not to the defendant which is the appellant here, but to its codefendant, the California Street Cable Railroad Company, and to its liability to the plaintiff. Whether its motorman in negotiating the intersection was or was not entitled to rely upon the presumption that his employer's rights of way would be respected would not excuse the employees of the appellant herein for being themselves negligent in either disregarding such right of way, or exceeding the speed limit, or failing to properly control their car; in other words, would not justify or excuse whatever negligence this appellant might have been guilty of in the premises. We do not see, therefore, sufficient merit in this contention to justify a reversal of the case.

[5] The appellant's next contention is that the trial court committed error in giving an instruction to the jury to the effect that if the gripman of the Hyde street car was in the moment preceding the collision suddenly confronted by imminent danger demanding alternative courses of conduct, and made such a choice as a person of ordinary prudence placed in such a position might make, the fact, if it be, that if he had chosen the other hazard he would have escaped injury is of no importance. We do not think that the authorities cited by the appellant sustain its assumption that this instruction was error; but, on the other hand, we are satisfied that the instruction correctly states the law as sustained by the following cases: Waniorek v. United Railroads, 17 Cal. App. 125, 118 Pac. 947; Green v. Pac. Lumber Co., 130 Cal. 435, 62 Pac. 747; Robinson v. Western Pac. Ry. Co., 48 Cal. 421; Kramm v. Stockton Ry. Co., 3 Cal. App. 606, 86 Pac. 738, 903.

We are, however, also of the opinion that any error which the trial court may have made in giving this instruction would not be a prejudicial error in so far as this appellant is concerned, since, like the other instructions above adverted to, it was given a special application to the appellant's codefendant and had no special application to the liability of the appellant herein.

[6] The appellant's next contention is that the court erred in instructing the jury that—

> "A slippery track is no excuse if the railroad company was guilty of negligence in failing to take proper steps to provide against its consequences."

No authorities are cited in support of this contention, and the only point urged against it is that it is argumentative and assumes that the appellant was negligent. We do not find it subject to either of these defects. It seems to express a truism applicable to the facts of the case at bar.

With respect to the instruction of the trial court as to the application of the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur we have examined the entire instructions of the court upon this subject, and we have no hesitation in reaching the conclusion that the trial court carefully differentiated between the differing situations of the appellant and of its codefendant, the carrier of the plaintiff as a passenger, making application of the rule to the latter defendant only. Whatever might have been its criticism of the correctness of this portion of the court's instruction had judgment gone against it, the appellant herein is in no position to urge that the court was in error in its statement of the law in this respect.

[7] The appellant finally urges that the trial court was in error in several respects in its refusal to give certain instructions requested by it. We have examined these refused instructions in the light of the instructions which the trial court gave to the jury, and we are satisfied that the subject-matter of these refused instructions is fully and sufficiently covered by those which were given, and hence that the appellant suffered no prejudicial injury by the court's refusal to give its instructions in the form in which they were asked.

Finding no prejudicial error in this record which would justify a reversal of the case, the judgment is affirmed.

HUFFMAN v. COULTER et al. (Civ. 4042.)

1. Animals ⚿49—Common-law rule as to preventing trespass in force in San Bernardino county.

Under St. 1915, p. 636, St. 1850, p. 131, and St. 1851, p. 299, the common-law rule requiring the owner of cattle to keep his animals from his neighbors' lands, fenced or unfenced, is in operation in San Bernardino county.

2. Injunction ⚿118(1) — Complaint held to state proper case for injunctive relief against adjoining owner permitting cattle to run at large.

A complaint alleging that defendant adjoining owner had permitted his cattle to trespass on plaintiff's land and threatened to continue to allow and cause said cattle to enter upon plaintiff's premises and to destroy his crops held to state a proper case for injunctive relief.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; J. W. Curtis, Judge.

Action by Earl Huffman against Fred F. Coulter and others. From an order granting a temporary injunction, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Swing & Wilson, of San Bernardino, for appellants.

Glenn M. Ely, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendants from an order granting a temporary injunction preventing defendants from allowing cattle owned or controlled by them to trespass upon the adjoining land of the plaintiff.

Plaintiff and defendant Coulter are the owners of adjoining unfenced lands. The other defendants are employees of the defendant Coulter and in charge of his cattle.

[1] Two questions are presented: The first is whether or not the common-law rule requiring the owner of cattle to keep his animals from his neighbors' lands, fenced or unfenced, is in operation in San Bernardino county, Cal. The other relates to the sufficiency of the complaint to state a proper case for injunctive relief.

The first question is carefully and fully answered by the last case of Montezuma Improvement Co. v. Simmerly, 181 Cal. 722, 189 Pac. 100, wherein it is held that the Estray Act of 1915 (Stats. 1915, p. 636), by the very force of its terms, repeals all "fence laws" in the counties of this state except in the six counties specified therein, of which San Bernardino is not one; that it is settled law in California that the common-law rule applies in those counties of the state which have been excepted from the operation of the so-called "Fence Law" of 1850 (Stats. of 1850, p. 131), the "Estray Act" of 1851 (Stats. 1851, p. 299), and the successors of those statutes.

A detailed discussion of this question by us therefore would be an idle proceeding; the matter being authoritatively settled in this state by a very recent decision of our Supreme Court.

[2] We are also of the opinion that the complaint states a proper case for an injunction. The complaint alleges that the defendants are the owners or custodians of cattle; that at divers and various times said cattle have trespassed upon the land of plaintiff and have eaten up, injured, and destroyed the grain, hay, and verdure growing thereon; that plaintiff has repeatedly driven the cattle of defendants from his said property, and has repeatedly requested defendants to properly care for said cattle and keep the same from trespassing upon plaintiff's land, but all to no avail; that defendants, despite the fact that plaintiff has repeatedly driven said cattle from his land, continue to allow and cause and threaten to continue to allow and cause said cattle to enter upon said premises of plaintiff and tramp, tear up, and injure the soil, and destroy the grain and feed grown and growing thereon, and injure the same for the growing of grasses, grain, and other crops in the future; that the repeated trespasses of the cattle of said defendants, if permitted to continue, will compel plaintiff to bring numerous suits against the defendants and each of them for damages, and will compel the plaintiff to take up said cattle, repeatedly, under the Estray Act, which remedies are wholly inadequate, and will not cause said defendants to desist from said acts; that said acts of defendants, if permitted to continue, will cause plaintiff irreparable loss in that said land will thereby be made unfit for farming purposes, and said acts of defendants will prevent plaintiff from putting in a crop for this year unless defendants are immediately restrained and enjoined from committing and permitting said trespasses, on account of the short planting season in the vicinity of said land which is rapidly coming to a close, and that plaintiff, being so prevented from planting his said land, will be forced to move to another locality wherein he can procure food for his stock and be able to make his living, for all of which wrongs plaintiff has no plain, speedy, and adequate remedy at law.

It appears from the foregoing that the complaint in the instant case contained substantially the allegations of the complaint in the case of Montezuma Improvement Co. v. Simmerly, supra, which complaint was held sufficient to warrant the granting of injunctive relief.

PEOPLE v. CHAPMAN. (Cr. 805.)

1. Criminal law 🔑1023(9) — No appealable judgment without sentence.

Where defendant has never been sentenced on charges contained in certain counts on which he was found guilty, there is, as to such counts, no judgment from which an appeal can be taken.

2. Criminal law 🔑1134(4) — Denial of new trial not reviewed when time for sentence has passed.

Whether an order denying a motion for a new trial under Pen. Code, § 1181, is erroneous as to certain counts need not be decided where the time for pronouncing judgment has long since passed, so that defendant is entitled to a new trial as of right under section 1202.

3. Criminal law 🔑108(1) — False pretenses consummated where money or property obtained.

The crime of obtaining money or property by false pretenses is consummated at the place where the money or property is obtained from the defrauded person, which determines the venue, regardless of where the false pretenses may have been made.

4. Criminal law 🔑97(1) — False pretenses punishable under statute though money obtained in another state.

Under Pen. Code, § 532, defining the crime of obtaining money or property by false pretenses, and section 27, declaring that all persons who commit in whole or in part any crime within the state are liable to punishment, one making within the state false or fraudulent representations whereby money or property is obtained without the state, by means of drafts drawn on the defrauded party's agent, is punishable as for obtaining money by false pretenses, and it is immaterial whether the obtaining of money by false pretenses is a crime in the state where the money is obtained.

5. Criminal law 🔑97(1)—Statute as to commission of "any crime" partly within the state construed.

Under Pen. Code, § 27, providing that all persons who commit in whole or in part "any crime," within the state are liable to punishment, the words "any crime" mean any offense which, if committed wholly within the state of California, would constitute a crime against the laws of such state.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Any.]

6. Witnesses 🔑300 — Defendant cannot be compelled to produce incriminating evidence.

The court cannot compel a defendant in a criminal case to produce any incriminating evidence.

7. Criminal law 🔑400(1) — Secondary evidence of contents of incriminating document in defendant's possession admissible.

Ordinarily the prosecution may give secondary evidence of the contents of an incriminating document whenever it appears prima facie that it is in possession of accused.

8. Criminal law 🔑1186(4) — Asking defendant's counsel if he had document held not reversible error.

Even though the prosecution might not have made a prima facie showing that writings were in defendant's possession, and though for that reason it was error to seek to prove defendant's possession thereof by asking his counsel to produce them, the district attorney's question to defendant's counsel as to whether he had such writings was not reversible error under Const. art. 6, § 4½, and Pen. Code, § 1258, relating to technical error, where the nature of the writings are not shown, and there is nothing to show that, if produced, they would have worked any damage to defendant.

9. Criminal law 🔑1163(1)—Incumbent on defendant to show prejudice from error.

Under Const. art. 6, § 4½, and Pen. Code, § 1258, injury is no longer presumed from error, and it is incumbent upon appellant to show affirmatively that the error upon which he relies was prejudicial, even though the error consisted of an invasion of defendant's constitutional rights.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

R. E. Chapman was convicted of obtaining money by false pretenses, and from the judgment and an order denying a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

W. I. Gilbert, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Arthur Keetch, Deputy Atty. Gen., and John W. Maltman, of Los Angeles, for the People.

FINLAYSON, P. J. By an indictment containing twelve counts defendant in each of six counts was charged with the crime of obtaining money by false pretenses, as defined in section 532 of the Penal Code, and in each of the six remaining counts he was charged with the crime of embezzlement. He was acquitted of the embezzlement charges and convicted on each of the counts charging him with the crime of obtaining money by false pretenses; the jury returning a separate verdict on each count. On four of the verdicts finding defendant guilty of obtaining money by false pretenses, namely, on the verdicts finding him guilty as charged in the first, second, fifth, and sixth counts of the indictment, the court passed sentence; a separate judgment being pronounced on each of said four verdicts. Before any judgment was pronounced, an application for a new trial was made by defendant on certain of the grounds mentioned in section 1181 of the Penal Code. The motion for a new trial was denied, and thereafter the court pronounced judgment upon each of the four verdicts whereby defendant had been found guilty as charged in said first, second, fifth, and sixth counts.

In two of the counts whereby he was charged with obtaining money by false pretenses—two counts upon which no judgment has ever been pronounced, namely, counts 9 and 10—defendant was charged with having defrauded one F. J. McCann of certain sums of money by certain false and fraudulent representations. As to these two counts there was a variance between the allegations and the proof, in that the evidence showed that the person defrauded was not F. J. McCann, but the F. J. McCann Brokerage Company, a corporation. Though a verdict of guilty was returned on each of these two last-mentioned counts, the court, for reasons which developed after the motion for a new trial had been denied, but which we do not find it necessary to recapitulate, declined to pass sentence upon the verdicts of guilty that were rendered thereon. The time for pronouncing judgment on the verdicts finding defendant guilty of the charges contained in counts 9 and 10 has long since passed, and the trial court should therefore, and doubtless will, grant a new trial of the issues presented thereby whenever defendant shall see fit to make application therefor under section 1202 of the Penal Code, whereby it is provided that, if judgment is not pronounced within the time fixed therefor by the court, or the time to which it is continued under the provisions of section 1191, "then the defendant shall be entitled to new trial."

[1, 2] Defendant has appealed from each of the four judgments pronounced on the verdicts finding him guilty as charged in the first, second, fifth, and sixth counts, and has likewise appealed from the order denying the motion for a new trial which was made by him under section 1181 of the Penal Code before sentence was passed. Since defendant has never been sentenced under the charges contained in the ninth and tenth counts, there is as to those two counts, no judgment from which an appeal can be taken. Nor is it necessary to consider whether the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial on the issues presented by counts 9 and 10 should be reversed by reason of the variance between the allegations and the proof, because, as we have stated, as to these two counts, the defendant, whenever he shall conclude to make application under section 1202, clearly is entitled to a new trial upon the ground that no judgment was passed within the time allowed by law. Indeed, we do not understand that, as to these counts 9 and 10, defendant's counsel is seeking a reversal of the order denying his motion for a new trial on the ground of any variance between the allegata and probata.

Defendant's real contentions on this appeal are: (1) That the crime charged in each of the four counts upon which he was found guilty and sentenced—that is, the crime charged in counts 1, 2, 5 and 6, respectively—was committed outside the state of California, and that therefore the courts of this state have no jurisdiction thereof; and (2) that a question which was propounded by the district attorney to defendant's counsel in the presence of the jury, asking counsel if he had in his possession certain writings, constituted prejudicial misconduct, necessitating a reversal of the judgments pronounced on the four counts upon which defendant was sentenced. We think that each of these contentions lacks merit.

In each of the four counts upon which he was found guilty and sentenced, defendant is charged with having obtained the moneys in the county of Los Angeles. But the evidence discloses that the moneys were obtained in a manner substantially as follows: Defendant drew certain drafts upon the Chaddock Carney Sales Company, of Boston, Mass., as the drawee. That company, it seems, was acting for and as the agent of the persons alleged to have been defrauded. The drafts were delivered by defendant, at Los Angeles, to the Hellman Commercial Trust & Savings Bank for collection. That bank, a corporation engaged in the banking business at Los Angeles, forwarded the drafts to its banking correspondent at Boston. In the regular course of business the drafts were presented to the drawee, the Chaddock Carney Sales Company, at Boston, and were there paid by the drawee by means of checks drawn by it upon its local bank at Boston. The drawee's local bank then remitted the money to the Boston correspondent of the Los Angeles bank, the Hellman Commercial Trust & Savings Bank, and in due time the latter institution was credited with the amounts by its Boston correspondent. In this way defendant was enabled to and did receive the moneys at Los Angeles from the Hellman Trust & Savings Bank, or was credited therewith by that bank. Upon these facts it is contended that the moneys were paid by the defrauded persons at Boston, and hence that the moneys were obtained, not in California, but in Massachusetts, and that therefore, if any crime was committed by defendant, it had its consummation outside of the territorial jurisdiction of this state.

[3, 4] Without doubt, the crime of obtaining money or property by false pretenses is consummated at the place where the money or property is obtained from the defrauded person, regardless of where the false pretenses may have been made, and therefore the place where the money or property is obtained is the place where, ordinarily, the venue should be laid. People v. Cummings, 123 Cal. 269, 55 Pac. 898. In State v. Shaeffer, 89 Mo. 271, 1 S. W. 293, the defendant, who was prosecuted in the Missouri court for obtaining money by false pretenses, had drawn a draft in that state on the bank account of the drawee in New York; the money being collected through the agency of two other banks in New York and Missouri, respectively. It was held that the money was obtained in New York; that therefore the crime was consummated in that state, and not in Missouri, and that, as a consequence, the Missouri court had no jurisdiction. The appellant here, claiming that the facts of this case are, in all substantial respects, analogous to those presented to and passed upon by the Missouri court in the Shaeffer Case, confidently asks for a reversal at our hands. It is not necessary to enter upon any analysis of the evidence contained in the record before us for the purpose of determining whether the moneys were obtained by this defendant in Boston or in Los Angeles; for in this state we have a Code provision (subdivision 1, § 27, Pen. Code) under which, generally speaking, a defendant may be convicted even though the final act necessary to consummate and complete his crime may have taken place outside of this state.

Section 27 of the Penal Code, so far as applicable, reads:

> "The following persons are liable to punishment under the laws of this state: 1. All persons who commit, in whole or in part, any crime within this state."

It is not contended that the Legislature may not declare it to be an offense against the sovereignty of California to make false and fraudulent representations in this state whereby money is obtained elsewhere; and the validity of subdivision 1 of section 27 is not challenged. The sole question, therefore, which is one of interpretation of that Code provision, is this: Is defendant, under the facts charged and proved, guilty of the crime denounced by section 532 of the Penal Code, and is he punishable under subdivision 1 of section 27, notwithstanding the money may have been obtained in Boston?

Without doubt, our Legislature has no extraterritorial jurisdiction; and when it forbids, in unqualified terms, the doing of an act, it must always be understood that the thing forbidden is something done in this state. But if, as we hold, the Legislature, in subdivision 1 of section 27, has declared, in effect, that all persons who make in this state any false or fraudulent representations whereby money or property is obtained without the state are punishable just as though all the acts had taken place in this state, then defendant was properly convicted, notwithstanding the fact that a very substantial part of the crime denounced by section 532 may have taken place in Massachusetts.

[5] The words "any crime," as used in subdivision 1 of section 27, mean any offense which, if committed wholly within the state of California, would constitute a crime against the laws of this state. The provision was designed to apply to the commission within the jurisdiction of this state of any essential part of a crime as defined by the laws of this state, even though, by the commission elsewhere of other parts of the crime, the final consummation of the offense may have taken place without the state. New York has a similar statutory provision. After some wavering, the highest court of that state has finally adopted an interpretation of the New York statute that accords with what we think is the proper construction to be placed upon the corresponding statutory provision in this state—subdivision 1 of section 27 of our Penal Code. The New York Court of Appeals now holds, as do we, that under a statute such as this, one who makes false or fraudulent representations in a state where such statutory provision obtains is guilty of the crime of obtaining money by false pretenses even though the money or property be obtained in another state whose laws do not make it an offense thus to defraud a person of money or property by false or fraudulent pretenses. It was so decided by the Appellate Division of the New York Supreme Court in the case of People v. Arnstein, 157 App. Div. 766, 142 N. Y. Supp. 842. In reversing the decision of the Appellate Division in that case, one of the justices of the New York Court of Appeals held that, in adopting the Code section of that state which corresponds with our section 27, it was not the intention of the Legislature to enact any substantive law so as to make it an offense to commit in the state of New York a part only of a transaction denounced by the New York law as a crime, even though the remaining part of the whole transaction were committed in another state. The remaining six justices held that the statute was intended to give the state of New York jurisdiction of an offense commenced within that state, but consummated beyond its borders. Of these six, three held that it was necessary that the transaction should also constitute a crime under the laws of the foreign state; the remaining three holding that it was not necessary that the transaction be made a crime by the laws of the state where the offense was consummated. People v. Arnstein, 211 N. Y. 585, 105 N. E. 814. The question again came before the Court of Appeals in People v. Zayas, 217 N. Y. 78, 111 N. E. 465, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 309, where it was held that, under the Code section of that state, which corresponds with section 27 of our Penal Code, a person who commits within the state of New York any crime, in whole or in part, is liable to punishment within that state; and it is not necessary that the transaction shall constitute a crime under the law of the foreign state where part of the acts are committed; it being sufficient that the transaction would be a crime under the laws of New York if it were committed entirely within that state. In that case the defendants were charged with larceny by obtaining property under false pretenses. The indictment alleged that the false pretenses were made in the state of New York, and that by reason thereof the complaining witness delivered money or property to the defendants in the state of Pennsylvania. The Court of Appeals held that the defendants were punishable just as they would be if each and all of the acts necessary to complete the crime had occurred in New York, and that therefore the indictment was good, irrespective of the law of Pennsylvania, where the money or property was obtained. We are in entire accord with the reasoning of the New York Court of Appeals in the Zayas Case, as well as that which was pursued by Chief Justice Willard Bartlett in his dissenting opinion in the Arnstein Case. Not only does the interpretation there given to the New York Code provision accord with the construction which our Supreme Court placed upon the corresponding Code section of this state in People v. Botkin, 132 Cal. 231, 64 Pac. 286, 84 Am. St. Rep. 39, but, as was said by the Appellate Division of the New York Supreme Court in the Arnstein Case, 157 App. Div. 766, 142 N. Y. Supp. 846, to hold that the test of jurisdiction is that the entire transaction is likewise made a crime by the laws of the state where the offense is finally consummated "would be to impute to the Legislature an attempt to punish a violation of the statutory law of the foreign jurisdiction, which it could not constitutionally do."

For the foregoing reasons we are of the opinion that the defendant is guilty of the crime charged against him in the four counts upon which he was sentenced, notwithstanding the evidence may show that the money was obtained in the state of Massachusetts. His acts constituted the crime of obtaining money by false pretenses, as defined by section 532 of the Penal Code of this state. The false pretenses alone constituted an essential ingredient of that crime. They were made in this state. Therefore, under subdivision 1 of section 27, defendant is punishable under the laws of this state for the crime with which he was charged—that of obtaining money by false pretenses.

One of the witnesses for the prosecution, during her examination by the district attorney, testified that she had received two written contracts at Butte, Mont.; that, after reading and signing them, she had given them to a broker to be mailed to defendant in California for his signature; and that they had not been returned to her. Nowhere in the briefs is our attention called to any evidence tending to disclose the nature of the terms contained in either of these two contracts. So far as we are aware, neither writing may have contained anything that, by any possibility, could prove harmful to defendant or to his cause. After the witness had thus testified that she had given the contracts to a broker to be mailed to defendant, and that they had not been returned to her, and after defendant's counsel had successfully objected to the introduction of any secondary evidence of the contents of the writings upon the ground that no proper foundation had been laid, the district attorney, addressing himself to defendant's counsel, said: "Mr. Gilbert, have you those contracts of Mr. Chapman?" Whereupon defendant's counsel said: "I assign that question as error." The district attorney immediately withdrew the question, but defendant's counsel insisted that he would not permit it to be withdrawn, saying:

> "I do not propose for it to be withdrawn. I assign the question of counsel propounded to me as attorney for the defendant in the presence of the jury, 'Mr. Gilbert, have you those contracts of Mr. Chapman in your possession?' as error and uncalled for."

Whereupon the court rebuked the district attorney and admonished the jury as follows:

> "Now, just a moment. The district attorney has no right and should know that it is an invasion of the constitutional right of the defendant to be called upon to produce evidence. You should not have asked that question; you should not have made that demand; and I do not want anything of that kind to occur again in the case. The jury are instructed to disregard that statement of the district attorney and to absolutely remove it from their minds in the consideration of this case. The defendant is not called upon to produce any evidence, and he cannot be required to produce any evidence, and the people have no right to demand that he produce evidence; and any inference that might have crept into your minds by reason of the statement of the district attorney, which was highly improper, is to be absolutely removed from your minds in the consideration of this case. Proceed."

[6-9] Appellant now assigns as reversible error the conduct of the district attorney in requesting defendant's counsel to produce the writings. It is axiomatic that the court cannot compel the defendant in a criminal case to produce any incriminating writing. It is for this reason that, ordinarily, the prosecution may give secondary evidence of the contents of an incriminating document whenever it appears prima facie that it is in the possession of the accused. 16 C. J. pp. 616, 617. It was doubtless in view of this rule of law that the district attorney made the demand of defendant's counsel to produce the contracts. It is probable that the district attorney regarded the evidence of the witness then on the stand as being sufficient to make out a prima facie showing that the contracts were in defendant's possession; and, defendant's counsel still objecting to the introduction of secondary evidence, the district attorney was doubtless prompted by the objection to make the request. If, in fact, the prosecution had shown, prima facie, that the contracts were in defendant's possession, then unquestionably appellant would not now be in a position to claim prejudice after having objected to the introduction of secondary evidence. People v. Rial, 23 Cal. App. 714, 720, 139 Pac. 661. But even though the prosecution may not have made a prima facie showing that the writings were in defendant's possession, and even conceding that, for that reason, it was error to seek to prove defendant's possession of the writings by asking his counsel to produce them, still there is no showing of prejudice. For, aside from the court's stern rebuke of the district attorney and its vigorous admonition to the jury to disregard the improper demand, there is nothing to show that the writings, if produced, would have worked any damage to defendant. Appellant therefore has failed to make any affirmative showing of reversible error. The rule obtaining in some jurisdictions that prejudice is presumed from any error of law has been abrogated in this state. Section 4½, art. 6, Const.; Pen. Code, § 1258; People v. O'Bryan, 165 Cal. 65, 130 Pac. 1042; People v. Stephens, 29 Cal. App. 621, 157 Pac. 570, 572. It is incumbent upon the appellant to show affirmatively that the error upon which he relies was prejudicial. People v. Lapara, 181 Cal. 72, 183 Pac. 545. This follows from the consideration that injury no longer is presumed from error. And the rule that, to justify the reversal of a judgment of conviction, it must affirmatively appear to the satisfaction of the reviewing court that the defendant may well have been substantially injured by the error complained of, applies to an erroneous invasion of even a constitutional right. People v. O'Bryan, supra, 165 Cal. 66, 130 Pac. 1042.

The judgments and the order denying a new trial are affirmed.

CORDES v. HAMMOND et al. (Civ. 3949.)

1. Corporations ⟹268(1)—In suit on unpaid subscriptions for stock, averments as to execution not sufficient, but made so by amendment.

In an action by an assignee for creditors of a defunct corporation on unpaid subscriptions for stock wherein it is necessary to show that, prior to beginning action, plaintiff had exhausted his legal remedies, which is usually done by alleging a return of execution unsatisfied, alleging issuance of execution on a certain day, and its return on the following day, was not sufficient, not showing a compliance with Code Civ. Proc. § 683, which directs that no return may be made in less than 10 nor more than 60 days after receipt of the execution by the sheriff; but the averments were made sufficient by an amendment alleging facts showing that the corporation was insolvent, and that an execution could not have been satisfied, a return nulla bona when the complaint shows the corporation wholly insolvent not being prerequisite to suit.

2. Pleading ⟹425—Demurrer and answer to amended complaint held to cure delay in filing.

Where defendants answered an amended complaint before it was filed, and after it was filed demurred and answered thereto, they waived the right to object, because it was not filed until three months after obtaining permission to file it.

3. Stipulations ⟹14(2)—Defect in service of summons held waived by stipulation of parties that summons was duly and personally served.

Where a corporation forfeited its charter for nonpayment of license tax, and was later restored to its former corporate status, and summons was served upon the person who was secretary before the forfeiture of the charter, the neglect, if any, to serve the summons upon an officer of the corporation upon whom service of summons might be made was waived by stipulation entered into by the parties to the action to the effect that the summons was duly and personally served on the corporation, giving the particulars.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George E. Crothers, Judge.

Action by W. F. Cordes against L. C. Hammond and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant Hammond and certain other defendants appeal. Reversed as to defendants Chamberlin and Hammond, and affirmed as to others.

William S. Downing, O. C. Wilson, H. L. McAllister, and Alfred J. Harwood, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

James H. Boyer and Joseph Kirk, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an action brought by the plaintiff, as assignee of numerous creditors of the Combined Amusements Company, a defunct corporation, on a default judgment taken against that concern, to recover from the defendants various sums on account of unpaid subscriptions to the capital stock of said corporation. Plaintiff recovered judgment against the defendants, certain of whom prosecute this appeal, namely, L. C. Hammond, W. C. Chamberlin, Adolph Lehman, R. G. Matzene, Mark H. Manning, and Wm. L. McGuire.

[1] In actions of this character it is necessary for the plaintiff to show that prior to the beginning of the action he had exhausted his legal remedies in an effort to collect the judgment; which is usually done by alleging the return of an execution unsatisfied. Here the plaintiff alleged the issuance of the execution upon a certain day and its return unsatisfied on the day following. This failed to comply with this provision of section 683 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which directs that no return on an execution may be made in less than 10 days nor more than 60 days after its receipt by the sheriff. At the trial the plaintiff amended paragraph V of his complaint by bringing it within the modification of the rule followed in Barnes v. Babcock, 95 Cal. 581, 30 Pac. 605, 16 L. R. A. 745, 29 Am. St. Rep. 133, and as announced in Merchants' M. Adj. Agency v. Davidson, 23 Cal. App. 274, 137 Pac. 1091 (see, also, Sherman v. S. K. Oil Co., 197 Pac. 799), where it is held that, if the plaintiff does not aver a valid return of an unsatisfied execution, but does allege facts showing that the corporation defendant was insolvent, and that the execution could not have been satisfied out of its property, the averments are sufficient. The return of an execution nulla bona, says the court, is not a prerequisite for maintaining an action of this character when the complaint shows that the corporation is wholly insolvent, and has no assets upon which to levy an execution.

[2] That the complaint as thus amended states facts sufficient is not denied; but it appears that, while plaintiff obtained permission to file and serve such amended complaint, and that he served the same, he did not file it until three months later, when the trial of the case was resumed. For this reason the appellants claim that the case rests upon the originally fatally defective complaint, and accordingly that the judgment must be reversed. Whatever merit there may have been in this point was waived by the appellants, for they not only answered the complaint as thus amended, but later, when it was in fact filed, they again demurred and answered thereto, and the parties went to trial upon the issues as thus made up.

Appellants Chamberlin, Hammond, and Matzene contend in support of their respective appeals that the evidence fails to show that they were subscribers to stock in the Combined Amusements Company. The answers of these particular defendants do not, as asserted by the respondent, admit, by failure to deny, or otherwise, that they were subscribers for stock in the corporation at the time and in the manner alleged in the complaint. On the contrary, their answers put in issue the allegations of the complaint to that effect. As to Chamberlin and Hammond, no subscription contracts entered into by them were introduced in evidence, nor does the record show that either of them entered into such an agreement. Their contention must therefore be sustained. But as to the appellant Matzene, while it is true, as just stated, that his final answer, as amended, when fairly read, does put in issue the question of whether or not he was a subscriber for stock in the corporation, and while it is also true that the subscription contract was only marked for identification, and was not in fact admitted in evidence, nevertheless there is sufficient evidence in the record admitted without objection to show that he was such a subscriber, and that he owed the amount alleged on his subscription.

[3] Appellants also contend that the judgment upon which this action is based is void, for the reason that service of summons was obtained on a person who was not at the time an officer of the corporation. From the record it appears that the Combined Amusements Company forfeited its charter March, 1916, for nonpayment of license tax; that prior to the commencement of that action, however, it had been through the method permitted by statute restored to its former corporate status. It also appears that the person on whom summons was served was secretary of the corporation at the time it became defunct. Assuming that the record shows that he had not been re-elected or reappointed as secretary upon the resuscitation of the corporation, and that for this reason, as asserted by the appellants, he was not an officer of the corporation upon whom service of summons might be made, still there is no merit in the point, for the reason that a stipulation was entered into by the parties to this action to the effect that the summons was duly and personally served on the Combined Amusements Company, giving the particulars.

For the reasons stated, the judgment is reversed as to appellants Chamberlin and Hammond, and affirmed as to the other appellants.

McKEVITT et al. v. CITY OF SACRAMENTO et al. (Civ. 3974.)

1. Municipal corporations 🔑108—Referendum provisions in charter held applicable only to exercise of legislative power.

The provisions of the Sacramento city charter relating to referendum are applicable only to ordinances and resolutions which constitute an exercise of legislative power, and cannot be invoked to annul or delay executive conduct.

2. Municipal corporations 🔑108—What constitutes exercise of legislative and administrative powers within referendum law.

Acts of commission of a city which are to be deemed acts of administration, and classed among those governmental powers properly assigned to the executive department, are those which are necessary to be done to carry out legislative policies and purposes already declared by the legislative body, or such as are devolved upon it by the organic law of its existence, while acts constituting a declaration of public purpose and making provision for ways and means of its accomplishment are generally classified as calling for the exercise of legislative power.

3. Municipal corporations 🔑108—Acceptance of offer to sell land for park held to involve only administrative functions not subject to annulment by referendum.

Act of commission of the city of Sacramento in accepting an offer to sell land for a public park under a trust provision in a will leaving money to the city to be expended for the purchase of land for a public park involved only administrative functions, and the resolution of acceptance could not be annulled by referendum.

4. Municipal corporations 🔑48(2)—City commission held successor of mayor and board of trustees charged with duty of administration of park fund.

The city commission of the city of Sacramento is the successor of the mayor and board of trustees under the old form of city government, and is charged with the duty of administration of a park fund left by will empowering the mayor and board of trustees of the city to expend the money for certain purposes.

5. Charities 🔑36—Park fund trust held violated by city.

A will, leaving a fund to the mayor and board of trustees of the city of Sacramento "to expend so much of said sum as may be necessary for the purchase of ground suitable for a public park, and to expend the balance of said fund in properly fixing up said grounds as a public park," was violated by the city in attempting to use it to reimburse the city for money already spent in the purchase and improvement of a park.

6. Charities 🔑20(5)—City may be trustee of park fund, and becomes amenable to same regulations as other trustees.

The city of Sacramento may accept and execute a trust created by a will leaving a fund to be used in the purchase and equipment of a public park, and when the trust is accepted the city assumes the same obligations and becomes amenable to the same regulations as apply to other trustees of such trusts, among which is the obligation to administer the fund in accordance with the expressed wish of the testator.

7. Specific performance 🔑29(2)—Description of land held sufficient.

A contract for purchase of land, "immediately north of the S. road and extends from F. road, or the extension of Twenty-First Street, on the east, to Tenth street on the west, a portion of it lying immediately east of the property now owned by the city, upon which the pumping plant stands, and comprising 238.26 acres, more or less, in the entire offering," held to sufficiently identify the land to entitle the seller to specific performance.

8. Specific performance 🔑29(2)—Description held sufficient to warrant specific performance of contract of sale of land.

Where property in a contract of sale may be readily identified by a competent surveyor with reasonable certainty, either with or without the aid of extrinsic evidence, the description is sufficient to warrant specific performance under Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 5, and section 3390, subd. 6.

9. Evidence 🔑460(4)—Extrinsic evidence admissible to apply description of land in contract of sale.

In an action for specific performance of contract to purchase land, extrinsic evidence is admissible to apply the description to that part of the surface of the earth which is the subject-matter of the agreement, but not for the purpose of adding to or varying the description contained in the contract.

10. Appeal and error 🔑842(1)—Sufficiency of evidence to identify land question of fact for trial court.

In action for specific performance of contract to sell land, whether or not extrinsic evidence, introduced to apply the description in the contract to that part of the surface of the earth which is the subject- matter of the agreement, is sufficient to show that the land can be identified with reasonable certainty, is a question of fact for the trial court.

11. Specific performance 🔑29(2)—Omission of state and county in description of land held immaterial.

The description in a contract is not insufficient in that no particular state or county is named, where the communication offering the land to the city is dated "Sacramento, California, December 15, 1917," and addressed to "The Honorable City Commissioners, Sacramento, California," and tenders to them, "as the legal representatives of the city of Sacramento," the land in question, to be devoted to park purposes, together with references in the description to roads, streets, and property owned by the city.

12. Frauds, statute of 🔑103(3, 4)—City records held a sufficient memorandum of contract to purchase land.

Where the city of Sacramento through its commission, by resolution duly adopted and spread on the minutes, signed by the president of the commission and attested by the city clerk, accepted an offer to purchase land, and a counter proposition, which provided for payment with United States Victory Bonds, instead of cash, was accepted by the sellers in a writing filed with the commission, there was a sufficient memorandum signed by the city, the party to be charged.

13. Reformation of instruments 🔑6—Contract with city may be reformed.

Contracts by or with a city may be reformed for mutual mistake, the same as contracts between individuals; and, where there was a mutual mistake in description of land in contract by city to purchase land, it was within the province of the court to revise the contract, and make it express what it was intended to mean, under Civ. Code, §§ 3399–3402.

14. Specific performance 🔑127(1)—Act which would prevent city from performance of agreement may be enjoined.

Where money was left to city in trust to purchase land for a park and equip it, and the proper officers entered into a contract to purchase certain land, and the sellers brought action for specific performance, it was proper for the court, when it determined that a contract existed which was capable of being specifically performed, to prevent the breach of the agreement by injunction, the city intending to divert the fund.

15. Specific performance 🔑92(2)—Enough that vendor is owner in fee at time of performance or decree requiring it.

In specific performance, where time is not of the essence of a contract to purchase land, and there is a positive agreement to buy, and not a mere option depending upon the sufficiency of showing of title, it is enough if the vendor is in fact the owner in fee, unincumbered, at the time of the performance, or at the time of the final decree.

16. Specific performance 🔑92(2)—Vendor given reasonable time to perfect title.

It is within the jurisdiction of the court to allow the vendor in a suit for specific performance a reasonable time within which to perfect his title, where time is not of the essence of the contract, and to do so will not work an injustice on the vendee.

17. Equity 🔑39(1)—Equity will do complete justice by deciding whole case.

When a court of equity has once obtained jurisdiction of an action for specific performance, it will do complete justice by deciding the whole case and determining the whole controversy between the parties.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Wm. M. Conley, Judge.

Action by F. B. McKevitt and another against the City of Sacramento and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

J. W. S. Butler, of Sacramento, B. F. Van Dyke, of Granite, Okl., and Ben P. Tabor and R. L. Shinn, both of Sacramento, for appellants.

Devlin & Devlin, of Sacramento, for respondents.

WASTE, P. J. The plaintiffs instituted this action against the city of Sacramento and the city commissioners of that municipality to reform and to enforce a purported contract for the purchase by the city of a tract of land for park purposes. They also sought an injunction to restrain the defendants from expending the proceeds derived from a certain bequest in any other manner than in accordance with the terms of the contract alleged to exist. The trial court entered an interlocutory decree in favor of the plaintiffs as prayed for, and defendants have appealed.

The undisputed facts in the case, set out in the complaint and embodied in the findings, disclose that William Land, by his last will and testament, bequeathed the sum of $250,000 to the city of Sacramento, in trust, to purchase a public park within a suitable distance of said city to be known and called "William Land Park," title to which should be vested in the city. The will authorized the mayor and board of trustees, which was the existing form of city government of the city of Sacramento at that time, to expend so much of the bequest as might be necessary for the purchase of ground suitable for a public park, and to expend the balance of the fund in properly equipping the same for park purposes. In the process of administration of the estate of the decedent, the bequest was reduced to $211,250, which amount on final distribution was paid to, and accepted by, the city of Sacramento for the uses for which it was bequeathed, and the city entered upon the administration of the trust. Thereafter, and in response to a published invitation by the city for proposals for a site for the establishment of the William Land Park, the plaintiffs in this action made a written offer to convey to the city certain lands, the purchase price of which was the sum of $146,836.45. These lands did not belong to plaintiffs, but comprised several contiguous parcels of land belonging to various individuals from whom the plaintiffs had obtained options to purchase.

On January 8, 1918, the city commission, which is the present form of government of the city of Sacramento, and successor to the mayor and board of trustees, as provided in the old charter of the city, passed resolution No. 1266, accepting the offer of plaintiffs, and proposing to pay for the lands with United States Victory Bonds, in which the Land bequest had, in the meantime, been invested. A copy of the resolution was transmitted to plaintiffs, who accepted the offer of the commission by filing with the city clerk a writing to that effect. Thereupon the plaintiffs exercised the options held by them on the lands offered to the city for the park in order to be in position to transfer the property in accordance with their contract. Subsequently a purported petition in referendum was filed with the city clerk, requesting that the resolution of acceptance, No. 1266, be reconsidered, and if not repealed on reconsideration, that it be submitted to the referendum vote of the electors of the city. The commission did not annul its former action, but eventually submitted the matter of the purchase of a park site to a referendum vote by resolution of the commission, which recited that such action was taken on the petition theretofore filed. At the election the tract of land submitted by plaintiffs, and accepted by the city commission, was rejected.

At the time William Land made his will, and continuously ever since, the city of Sacramento owned a number of parks, one of which, Del Paso Park, is situated about seven miles northeast of the city and outside its corporate limits. Upon the rejection by the electors of the offer of the plaintiffs, the city commission passed a resolution, No. 1348, by which it decided to expend the William Land fund in reimbursing the city of Sacramento for all sums theretofore paid by the city for the purchase and permanent improvement of Del Paso Park, and that the balance of the fund be used for the improvement of that park. The resolution further provided that the funds derived from the city thus reimbursing itself be placed to the credit of the board of park directors, to be expended by it as were other park funds. The city attorney was directed to take steps to carry out the purpose and intent of the resolution, and to prepare an ordinance changing the name of Del Paso Park to William Land Park.

Plaintiffs thereupon commenced this action to enjoin the city of Sacramento and the city commission from expending the William Land Fund in the manner directed by this last resolution, and from diverting or using the fund except in accordance with the contract entered into between themselves and the city. They also sought to have the contract reformed and corrected by the insertion therein of proper descriptions of the real property, which was the subject-matter of the agreement. A further prayer of the complaint was for such other, further, and different relief as might be meet and proper in the premises. The defendants demurred generally, and interposed the bar of the statute of frauds. The demurrer was overruled. answer was made, and the case proceeded to trial.

The court by its interlocutory decree revised and corrected the contract by the insertion therein of the proper description of the real property, restrained and enjoined the defendants from carrying out the purposes of the resolution whereby the William Land fund was diverted to reimbursing the city for the purchase and equipment of Del Paso Park, and from using or diverting any of the fund of the trust except in accordance with the city's contract with plaintiffs. Certain conditions as to abstracts of title, time within which to examine the same, and report any defects of title or objections, and the removal of defects of title, and examination and tender of deeds, are also provided for in the decree. It was further ordered that plaintiffs receive as the purchase price of the lands United States Victory Bonds to the amount of the purchase price, as agreed to by them in accepting the counter offer of the commission at the time of the tender of the property for park purposes.

On this appeal from the judgment the defendants assail the ruling of the lower court on the demurrer to the complaint, and interpose a number of objections to the interlocutory judgment entered in favor of the plaintiffs. Some of them, particularly those relating to the admission of certain maps, and objections made to evidence of matters of record and other rulings on the admission of evidence, are more or less technical, and may be dismissed with the suggestion that, even were the contentions of the appellants correct, no conceivable injury resulted to their case by reason of the rulings complained of. The ultimate conclusion in the matter rests upon the consideration of two vital propositions: First. Did the matter of the purchase of a site for the William Land Park involve the exercise of legislative power, thereby rendering it subject to referendum, or was it merely administrative, or executive in character? Second. If the question was not one that might be referred to the electors, did the transaction between the plaintiffs and the city commission result in a contract capable of reformation and specific performance? A number of more or less immediate contentions, corollary to the main issues, will be disposed of by the determination of the two questions suggested, and need not be specifically considered.

After the city commission had by affirmative action accepted the offer of the respondents to transfer the park site to the municipality the matter was submitted, by referendum, to the qualified electors of the city. The decision of a majority of the voters was against the acceptance of the site. The appellants take the position that the whole controversy was concluded by the result of that referendum election. There can be no question that if the acceptance of the offer of the respondents to sell a park site to the municipality was an act involving the exercise of legislative power, and if that question was legally submitted to a referendum and rejected, the respondents have no standing in court.

[1] Several questions present themselves in this connection. It is urged by the respondents in the first place that the proceedings under which the purported referendum election was held were fatally defective in certain jurisdictional matters. In the second place respondents contend that the acceptance by the city commission of the offer of the park site was only an administrative or executive act, and therefore not subject to a referendum vote of the electors. Appellants' answer to the first proposition is that, even though the attempt to initiate a referendum by petition may have failed, the city commission was authorized by the provisions of the Sacramento city charter to submit to the electors of its own motion any ordinance or measure that it might have the authority to enact. Sac. City Charter, § 271. To the second proposition they answer that, while convinced that the action of the commission relating to the park site was purely legislative in character, it makes no difference whether it was or not, for, under the section of the charter noted, any proposition, or measure, either legislative or executive, may be submitted to a referendum vote. We are of the opinion, however, that the provisions in the city charter relating to the referendum should be held applicable only to ordinances and resolutions which constitute an exercise of legislative power. To allow the referendum to be invoked to annul, or delay, executive conduct would destroy the efficiency necessary to the successful administration of the business affairs of the city. In many cases it would entirely prevent the exercise of the executive power necessary to carry out the acts determined upon by the legislative department. Hopping v. City of Richmond, 170 Cal. 605, 611, 150 Pac. 977, 979. The charter of Sacramento contains no "clear declaration to the contrary," any more than did the city of Richmond, which was considered in that case.

This brings us to a consideration of the question whether or not the act here involved was done in the exercise of legislative power, or was merely administrative or executive in character.

[2-6] An exhaustive consideration of the whole subject and a clear analysis of the distinction to be drawn between the legislative and administrative or executive power of a municipality is to be found in the decision of our Supreme Court in the case of Hopping v. City of Richmond, supra. Acts constituting a declaration of public purpose, and making provisions for ways and means of its accomplishment, may be generally classified as calling for the exercise of legislative power. Acts which are to be deemed as acts of administration, and classed among those governmental powers properly assigned to the executive department, are those which are necessary to be done to carry out legislative policies and purposes already declared by the legislative body, or such as are devolved upon it by the organic law of its existence. As we view it, the proposal of the respondents to the city commission involved only administrative functions. Whether or not the city of Sacramento should acquire a public park and the necessity of making some provision for the means of paying for it became moot questions when the city accepted the trust imposed upon it by the will of William Land. By that acceptance the city became charged with the duty of the administration of the trust in strict accord with the terms of the instrument creating the fund, The money was distributed to the city "pursuant to the 28th provision of the last will and testament of said deceased," which, by its express terms, authorized and empowered "the mayor and board of trustees of said city to expend so much of said sum as may be necessary for the purchase of ground suitable for a public park, and to expend the balance of said fund in properly fixing up said grounds as a public park." We think it plain that the city commission, which under the present charter of the city of Sacramento is the successor of the mayor and board of trustees under the form of city government in existence when the will was made, is charged with the duty of the administration of the William Land park fund. Their acts in this regard were, and are, only incidental to the execution of the legislative policy and purpose implied from the acceptance of the trust fund, and were not proper subjects of referendum. This seems the only logical conclusion to reach in the matter. Any other deduction would render possible an entire omission to carry out the real purpose of the trust. That may well be illustrated in the present case. It is hardly to be conceived that William Land contemplated that the money he provided for the express purpose of purchasing and equipping a public park for the use of the people of Sacramento, to be and remain a monument to his name and public spirit, should be completely diverted from that purpose to reimbursing the city for money spent in the purchase and improvement of a park it already had. Had he so intended, he would have said so in his will. The contemplated action on the part of the commission amounted, in our opinion, to a clear violation of the terms of the trust. That a city may accept a trust such as that created by William Land, and may act as trustee and execute the trust, does not admit of doubt. It is equally well settled that when the trust is accepted the city assumes the same obligations, and becomes amenable to the same regulations as apply to other trustees of such trust. Among them is the obligation to administer the funds in accordance with the expressed wish of the testator. Maxcy v. Oshkosh, 144 Wis. 238, 250, 128 N. W. 899, 905, 1136, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 787; Higginson v. Turner, 171 Mass. 586, 591, 51 N. E. 172; 3 Dillon on Munic. Corp. (5th Ed.) par. 982; Estate of Robinson, 63 Cal. 620, 623. For these reasons we believe the city commission was well within the exercise of its administrative powers when it attempted to purchase a site for the William Land park, and may not be hampered, in the absence of fraud and abuse of its powers, in the execution of the trust, and then only in the manner usual for the prevention of an abuse of the trust. For like reasons we deem it inexpedient to consider further the alleged illegality of the referendum proceedings. The conclusion we have reached, that the question of the acceptance of the park site offered by the respondents was not a matter subject to referendum, renders further discussion of the question unnecessary.

We have examined the provisions of the charter of the city of Sacramento dealing with the power of the city to accept gifts and bequests for the acquisition of public parks, the disposition to be made of such funds, and the relation of the board of park directors of the city thereto. We are satisfied that they bear no relation to the facts of the present case. We express no opinion as to their general application to gifts and bequests not coupled with the imposition of an express trust.

[7-10] This brings us to a consideration of the question: Was there a contract capable of reformation and specific performance? Neither the writing by which the respondents offered the various tracts of land to the city, nor the resolution of the city commission accepting the same, contained an adequate description of the various parcels of land comprising the park site. Appellants argue, therefore, that the transaction between the respondents and the city did not ripen into an enforceable contract, because not containing a proper description of the subject-matter of the agreement. They contend: First, that there is no contract for the sale of real property (Civ. Code, § 1624, sub. 5); and, second, that the terms of the agreement are not sufficiently certain to make the precise act which is to be done clearly ascertainable

(Civ. Code, § 3390, sub. 6). The description in the communication to the commission reads:

> "The property embraced in this offer lies immediately north of the Sutterville road and extends from Freeport road, or the extension of Twenty-First street, on the east, to Tenth street on the west, a portion of it lying immediately east of the property now owned by the city, upon which the pumping plant stands, and comprising 238.26 acres, more or less, in the entire offering."

This is followed by a statement of the names of the owners of each of the respective tracts comprising the proposed site, and the number of acres in each tract. The resolution of the commission, which formally accepted the tender of the respondents, in its preamble refers to "the site offered by George Swanston and F. B. McKevitt, lying between the Freeport road and Twenty-First street on the east, and Tenth street on the west, and being easterly of the property now owned by the city of Sacramento at Sump No. 2, and being 238.26 acres." These descriptions of the land offered and accepted for park purposes give three boundaries, and the aggregate acreage of the land. The owners of and the acreage in the various parcels making up the tract are also given. The property might be readily identified by a competent surveyor, with reasonable certainty. When that is possible, either with or without the aid of extrinsic evidence, the description is sufficient. Best v. Wohlford, 144 Cal. 733, 738, 78 Pac. 293; Thompson v. McKenna, 22 Cal. App. 129, 132, 133 Pac. 512; Hall v. Shotwell, 66 Cal. 379, 381, 5 Pac. 683; Mann v. Taylor, 49 N. C. 127, 69 Am. Dec. 750. If it ever became necessary to establish the sufficiency of the description it might be shown by extrinsic evidence, not for the purpose of adding to or varying the description contained in the contract, but for applying the description to that part of the surface of the earth which is the subject matter of the agreement. In such cases, whether or not such evidence is sufficient to show that the land can be identified with reasonable certainty, is a question of fact for the trial court. Houghton v. Kern Valley Bank, 157 Cal. 289, 292, 107 Pac. 113; Thompson v. McKenna, supra.

[11] The body of the description of the land fails to locate the property in any particular state or county. The communication offering the park site to the city is dated "Sacramento, California, December 15, 1917." It is addressed to "The Honorable City Commissioners, Sacramento, California," and tenders to them, "as the legal representatives of the city of Sacramento," the land in question, to be devoted to park purposes. These facts, with the references in the description to roads, a street, and property owned by the city, manifestly indicate that the description deals with property in the state of California, in or adjacent to the city of Sacramento. Horton v. Murden, 117 Ga. 72, 43 S. E. 786, 787; Morris v. McKee, 96 Ga. 611, 24 S. E. 142; Butler v. Davis. 5 Neb. 521.

[12] The appellants apparently take the position that no contract between the parties in the instant case, or memorandum thereof, was signed by the parties sought to be charged. In that contention they are mistaken. The respondents made a proposition in writing, signed by them, to sell the land described. The city, through it commission, by resolution duly adopted and spread upon the minutes signed by the president of the commission, and attested by the city clerk, accepted the offer. A counter proposition, which provided for payment for the land with United States Victory Bonds, instead of cash, was accepted by the respondents in a writing filed with the commission, a contract made in such manner as fully satisfies the statute of frauds as if it had been executed by the officers or agents of the municipality, duly authorized. People v. Board of Supervisors, 27 Cal. 655, 678; Polk v. Board of Education, 74 Pac. 47;[1] Argus Co. v. Albany, 55 N. Y. 495, 14 Am. Rep. 296, 300; McManus v. Boston, 171 Mass. 152, 50 N. E. 607, 609; 2 Dillon on Munc. Corpor. (5th Ed.) par. 783; Gosport v. Pritchard, 156 Ind. 400, 403, 59 N. E. 1058.

[13, 14] Contracts by, or with a city may be reformed for mutual mistake, the same as contracts between individuals. McManus v. Philadelphia, 211 Pa. 394, 400, 60 Atl. 1001; 2 Dillon Munc. Corpor. (5th Ed.) par. 780. By apt amendment to the complaint it was alleged, and the court found, that the agreed selling price for the land is adequate, and that the contract is, as to the defendants, reasonable, fair, and equitable, and was fairly entered into between the parties. We therefore conclude that there was a contract in the instant case sufficient to satisfy the statute of frauds and one capable of being enforced. Consequently, when it appeared to the satisfaction of the trial court, as found by it, that the description of the real property contained in a contract between the respondents and the city of Sacramento, did not properly describe the property intended to be conveyed to the city, and that such description was inserted in the contract by the mutual mistake of the parties, and under the common belief that it correctly described the entire property and lands, which constituted the subject-matter of the agreement, it was within its province to revise the contract, and make the instrument express what it was intended to mean, and what were intended to be its legal consequences. 376–377, 97 Pac. 885; McMee v. Henry, 163 Ky. 729, 174 S. W. 746, 748. It was also proper for the court, when it determined that a contract existed which was capable of being specifically performed, to prevent the breach of the agreement by injunction. Farnum v. Clarke, 148 Cal. 610, 619–620, 84 Pac. 166.

[15, 16] The trial court by its interlocutory decree reformed the contract between the plaintiffs and the city by inserting a correct description of the real property offered by plaintiffs as a park site, and enjoined and restrained the defendants from reimbursing the city out of the William Land fund for the purchase price and costs of improvements of Del Paso Park, and from using or diverting any of the funds of the trust in any other manner than under the contract with plaintiffs as reformed. The court went further and included in its judgment several provisions prescribing what should be done by the respective parties in order to render the decree effective. In effect the decree is one specifically enforcing the contract. When the final decree shall be entered the whole matter will be concluded. The court expressly retains jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action and parties thereto, for the purpose of carrying out its interlocutory judgment. Among other things it directed that the plaintiffs should furnish the defendants with abstracts of title to the property contracted for within 10 days after the interlocutory decree became final, the defendants to have 30 days after receipt of the abstracts within which to examine the same and report any defects in title or objections thereto. If no defects be reported to plaintiffs in writing within the time limited, plaintiffs must within 10 days thereafter tender good and sufficient deeds granting the property to the city of Sacramento. If any defects in title were reported, plaintiffs were to have six months within which to remove the defects or objections. If any controversy shall arise by reason of its validity or reasonableness, or any objection concerning the title to the property, the court reserved to itself the right to determine the dispute, and the time for removing the defects in title was extended so that the six-month period shall not expire until final settlement of the controversy. Appellants object to these provisions in the decree as not being supported, and not being within the terms of the contract between the parties. Where time is not of the essence of the contract, and there is a positive agreement to buy and not a mere option depending upon the sufficiency of the showing of title, it is enough if the vendor is in fact the owner in fee, unincumbered, at the time of the performance, or at the time of the decree. Dore v. Southern Pacific Co., 163 Cal. 182, 195, 124 Pac. 817; Allstead v. Nicol, 123 Cal. 594, 597, 56 Pac. 452. It also seems to be the general rule that it is within the jurisdiction of the court to allow the vendor in a suit for specific performance a reasonable time within which to perfect his title where time is not of the essence of the contract, as is the fact in this case, and to do so will not work an injustice to the vendee. Van Riper v. Wickersham, 77 N. J. Eq. 232, 76 Atl. 1020. See, also, cases cited in 30 L. R. A. (N. S.) 25, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 319, under this case. In the instant case the time for the final decree has not yet arrived; the present judgment being only interlocutory in its nature and effect.

[17] The court found that the respondents had already expended large sums in securing the options for the property sold to the city, for surveying fees, and other expenses in connection with the matter. It included in its decree a provision that the plaintiffs should receive the purchase price amounting to $146,236.45 in United States Victory Bonds, together with the interest collected by the defendants on the bonds from the 19th day of February, 1918, until the transaction be closed, and that in addition the city of Sacramento pay to plaintiffs all taxes and special assessments of every kind accruing against the land during the same period. The appellants object to these provisions in the decree, but we think the court was right in seeking to determine the whole controversy between the parties. When a court of equity has once obtained jurisdiction, it will do complete justice by deciding the whole case and determining the whole controversy. Vierra v. Fontes, 135 Cal. 126, 129, 66 Pac. 241; Watson v. Sutro, 86 Cal. 500, 528, 24 Pac. 172, 25 Pac. 64.

For the foregoing reasons we are of the opinion that the action of the trial court in overruling the demurrer to the amended complaint was proper, and that judgment should be affirmed. It is so ordered.

MOORE et al. v. CALIFORNIA-MICHIGAN LAND & WATER CO. (Civ. 3722.)

1. Stipulations 🔑14(7)—Agreement as to title held modified by conditions of contract also stipulated to be correct.

Where the parties stipulated that plaintiffs were the owners of certain lots, but also stipulated that both parties traced their titles to a certain contract, and that its recitals were correct, and the contract showed plaintiffs' title was subject to an easement, the stipulation as to title should be taken as modified by the conditions shown by the contract.

2. Property 🔑9 — Ownership presumed to continue until change shown.

One shown to have had title to a lot will be presumed to have continued as such owner until a change of ownership is shown.

3. Waters and water courses 🔑156(6)—Deeds held to convey only specified part of water in existing well.

Where one not shown to have had any title to lot 8 conveyed other lots, together with eight fifty-fourths of the water in the well on lot 8, not exceeding 26,000 gallons each 24 hours, and the owner of lot 8 executed a confirmatory deed conveying "the water right described" in the earlier deed, such deed did not enlarge the right conveyed by the first deed, and the grantee acquired only the specified part of the water in the existing well on lot 8, and not such fractional part of all the water underlying lot 8.

4. Waters and water courses 🔑156(1)—Deed conveying water right described in earlier deed held sufficiently definite.

A deed purporting to convey "the water right described in deed from R. of date June, 1905, for lots 3 and 4" of a specified tract, was sufficiently definite in its reference to the right intended to be conveyed where only one deed transferring title to the designated parties to lots 3 and 4 had been made, and it was acknowledged on June 1, 1905, though dated May 31st.

5. Waters and water courses 🔑156(6)—Deed purporting to convey greater water right than grantors had could transfer only what they owned.

Where owners of lots owned only eight fifty-fourths of the water in an existing well on another lot, their conveyance could transfer only what they possessed, although describing the water as eight fifty-fourths of the water on such lot.

6. Waters and water courses 🔑156(6)—Mortgage to owner of lot by person having water right could not extend right though misdescribing it.

Where the grantor of lots 3 and 4 in a certain tract not shown to have any title to lot 8 conveyed with lots 3 and 4 eight fifty-fourths of the water in a well on lot 8, and the owner of lot 8 executed a confirmatory deed, the fact that a mortgage given the owner of lot 8 by persons holding under the conveyance described the water right as eight fifty-fourths of the water on lot 8 did not enlarge the right.

7. Waters and water courses 🔑158½(1) — Evidence held to support finding of agreement as to operating charges, etc., between owners of water of well

In a suit to establish water rights, evidence held sufficient to support a finding of an agreement between the owners of the water of a well apportioning the operating charges in consideration of one party's consent to the substitution of an electric motor for a gasoline engine.

8. Waters and water courses 🔑158(1) — Agreement apportioning charges for operating a pumping plant held supported by sufficient consideration.

Where plaintiffs, as appurtenant to lots owned by them, owned eight fifty-fourths of the water of a well on another lot owned by defendant, and were conceded to have the right to use an engine and pump to the extent necessary to secure such water, an agreement apportioning the operating charges between the parties was supported by a sufficient consideration, consisting of plaintiffs' consent to the substitution of an electric motor for a gasoline engine.

9. Waters and water courses 🔑158(3)—One succeeding to right of parties under contract held entitled to waive provision that water should not be conveyed to points outside tract.

Where an agreement between the owners of a tract of land and persons owning water rights therein provided that the owners of the tract and their heirs and assigns should not convey any water obtained on the tract to any place outside the tract, and thereafter defendant acquired all of such tract except two lots owned by plaintiff, and also acquired the rights of the other parties to the contract, it was in a position to waive the condition against delivery of water outside the tract, and plaintiffs could not insist on such condition.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Grant Jackson, Judge.

Action by George A. Moore and others against the California-Michigan Land & Water Company. From a decree for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Goodspeed & Pendell, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Daniel M. Hunsaker and Hunsaker, Britt & Cosgrove, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

JAMES, J. Plaintiffs' action was for equitable relief. They alleged that they were the owners of two certain lots of land, and the owners of the right to eight fifty-fourths of the water on and under another lot (lot 8) in the same tract; that the defendant was the owner of other water which had its source on this third lot, and that, under conditions of this ownership, defendant was not permitted to take water to points outside of the tract; that defendant had made with plaintiffs a certain agreement respecting the apportionment of operating charges of a pumping plant used to furnish water to the plaintiffs and the defendant, and had afterwards refused to abide by such agreement and had interfered with the plaintiffs in their attempt to make use of the water to which they were entitled; that water was being taken by defendant from the tract to places outside of it and sold. The prayer of the complaint was for a decree determining that the plaintiffs were the owners of eight fifty-fourths of any and all waters in or under lot 8 in the tract of land described and the owners of a proportionate interest in the pumping plant. Further relief asked for was that defendant be restrained from taking any water from the lot referred to and selling to any point outside of the tract, and be further restrained from acting otherwise than to observe the conditions of its agreement respecting the apportionment of charges incurred in the operation of the pumping plant. The decree of the trial judge was in accordance with the prayer of the complaint, and the defendant has appealed.

The facts were established in part by stipulation and in part by the introduction of evidence oral and documentary. The parties at the trial first agreed that defendant was, and had been since 1910, a corporation engaged in the business of loaning, selling, and leasing real property, and in selling, as a public utility corporation, water for domestic use and irrigation purposes to the inhabitants of certain territory, some residing in Chapman's Homestead tract and some outside the limits of said tract; that plaintiffs were, and had been since January 5, 1910, the owners of lots 3 and 4 of Chapman homestead tract, and that the defendant, since March 1, 1912, had been the owner of all of the remaining lots in said homestead tract and the owner of whatever rights Richard B. Chapman, Ruth Chapman, and Louisa Chapman had by reason of a certain contract dated March 2, 1905. It was further stipulated that the recitals in the contract of March 2, 1905, were correct as to the facts therein stated, and that both plaintiffs and defendant traced their record titles to said contract; that the facts stated in said agreement were true. The contract referred to as that of date March 2, 1905, and which, under the stipulation of the parties, determines the origin of the title to the lands of plaintiffs and defendant and defines certain water rights and restrictions attendng their enjoyment, was made between three parties, to wit: Richard B. Chapman, Ruth Chapman, and Louisa Evelyn Chapman, parties of the first part, Alfred B. Chapman, party of the second part, Catherine C. Chapman, Lettice Chapman, M. L. Wicks, A. A. Rice, W. P. Cayley, Mary Webster and Mary G. Criswell, parties of the third part. This agreement first declared that the parties of the third part owned the Chapman homestead tract consisting of 31 acres; that Catherine C. Chapman owned all of the tract except lots 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 12, and 9; that Lettice Chapman owned lots 1, 2, 3, and 4, subject to a contract to sell the same to M. L. Wicks; that Cayley owned lots 5 and 12, and Mary G. Criswell lot 9. It was declared that parties of the first part owned in common certain rights to the water that could be developed in the Chapman homestead tract, and the party of the second part owned a certain interest in a reservoir on lot 8 called the "brick reservoir"; further, that there was appurtenant to the homestead tract a one-half interest in a well on the land of the parties of the first part, together with rights of way to reach the same.

The agreement declared that Catherine and Lettice Chapman (parties of the third part) were desirous of procuring a release of the general right of development and of way on the whole of the homestead tract, and that they desired to locate such rights on particular portions of the tract to better advantage, and that Cayley and Criswell were desirous of having such rights released as to their lands; that therefore, in view of the mutual considerations, the third parties granted to the first parties the exclusive and perpetual right to bore, dig, and construct wells for the purpose of obtaining water upon two rectangular parcels of land 40 feet square, one to be located upon lot 2 and the other upon lot 4, and the further right to erect, maintain, and operate pumping plants in connection therewith; also right of way for private road 15 feet wide extending from each of the two parcels for the purpose of ingress and egress and the perpetual right to take and extract from the wells which might be constructed upon either parcel of land all of the waters that would flow, or might be lifted, therefrom, and to convey such waters to any and all places as the parties of the first part, their heirs or assigns, might desire. By the agreement other necessary incidental rights were provided to be vested in parties of the first part. The parties of the third part, in view of the said considerations, by the agreement released all rights which they had in the well first referred to, which was located on land other than that comprised within the Chapman homestead tract. The agreement further recited that parties of the third part, in order to secure to the parties of the first part the "privileges and servitudes" granted, and to protect the parties of the first and second parts from a diminution of flow of underground waters, agreed as a covenant "running with and for the benefit of said land of said parties of the first part," and as binding on all portions of the homestead tract owned by said parties of the third part, that neither they, their heirs nor assigns, nor subsequent occupants of those portions of the homestead tract owned by them, would at any time thereafter convey any water which might be obtained from any well or wells on said homestead tract to any place outside of said homestead tract, or permit any other person or persons or corporations "other than said parties of the first part hereto, or their heirs or assigns," to convey such waters so obtained from wells on said homestead tract. The agreement further declared that it was the intention to restrict the use of water developed on the homestead tract to the land composing that tract by persons other than parties of the first part, and that parties of the first part would have the right to take and appropriate any water that should be conveyed from or should flow off from the homestead tract from any well or wells located thereon, whether such wells were constructed by the parties of the first part or not. Parties of the first and second parts, by reason of the considerations referred to in the agreement, released to the parties of the third part all rights, privileges, easements, and servitudes held, owned or possessed by them in or to the land composing the homestead tract, except as otherwise provided in said agreement.

[1, 2] It will be noted first that the agreement declared the ownership of lots 3 and 4 to be in Lettice Chapman, subject to the contract to sell the same to M. L. Wicks. It may be added that the agreement of 1905 imposed an easement upon lot 4 to the extent of giving to the first parties the right to place a well on a portion thereof 40 feet square, and this condition remains to affect the title held by plaintiffs. The stipulations of the parties, made as to the evidence, brought all of the terms of that contract before the court. The stipulation that plaintiffs were the owner of the two lots 3 and 4 should be taken as modified by such conditions as the contract referred to shows. Under the facts recited in that agreement, Catherine C. Chapman was the owner of lot 8 in said tract. A deed was introduced in evidence dated May 31, 1905, acknowledged on the 1st of June, 1905, recorded November 14, 1905. This deed was made on the part of Lettice C. Rawlinson, née Chapman, M. L. Wicks, and Douglas Rawlinson, as grantors, and August C. Fimmen and Freda Fimmen, grantees. This deed purported to convey title to lots 3 and 4 of the Chapman homestead tract, and contained the following words:

> "Together with eight fifty-fourths of the water in the well on lot eight of this tract to the extent of thirteen thousand gallons each twenty-four hours subject to a reasonable charge for pumping said water. This limit is raised to twenty-six thousand gallons each 24 hours."

Up to this point no interest is disclosed in the grantors mentioned in that deed to any part of lot 8 or any well or water thereon. As before mentioned, title to this lot was shown by the agreement first referred to to have been in Catherine C. Chapman, who will be presumed to have continued as such owner until a change of ownership is shown. On the 14th of March, 1907, it not appearing that Catherine Chapman had divested herself of ownership of lot 8, she executed an instrument of conveyance in favor of the two Fimmens, husband and wife, which, after the usual declarations as to consideration, etc., purported to convey to the grantees "the water right described in deed from Lettice C. Rawlinson, née Chapman, of date June, 1905, for lots 3 and 4 of the C. L. Chapman homestead tract as per map recorded, * * * said deed being made to these grantees subject to mortgage lien," etc. By deed dated January 5, 1910, the Fimmens transferred their interest in lots 3 and 4 to the plaintiffs. The deed was in usual form, and contained this clause:

> "Together with eight fifty-fourths of the water on lot eight of this tract."

[3-6] It will have been already noted that the deed which conveyed title to the Fimmens to lots 3 and 4 pretended also to convey "eight fifty-fourths of the water in the well on lot 8 of this tract to the extent of * * * 26,000 gallons each twenty-four hours." When Catherine C. Chapman confirmed to the Fimmens this water right by her deed of March 14, 1907, she referred to it as being "the water right described in deed from Lettice C. Rawlinson, née Chapman, of date June, 1905, for lots 3 and 4 of the C. L. Chapman homestead tract." To the terms of these conveyances we must look for the entire measure of the right acquired by the plaintiffs to any water to be taken from lot 8. Catherine Chapman, by her instrument of conveyance, confirmed to the Fimmens nothing more than the right described in the deed which they had received, which was a right to eight fifty-fourths of the water in an existing well. We attach no importance to the claim that Catherine Chapman's deed was insufficient because it referred to the conveyance to the Fimmens of lots 3 and 4, and the accompanying water right, as being evidenced by a deed "of date June, 1905." This claim is made because it appeared that that deed was in reality dated May 31, 1905. It was acknowledged on the 1st of June, 1905, and was made by the parties described in the Catherine Chapman conveyance, and was the only deed shown to have theretofore been made transferring title to the designated parties to lots 3 and 4 of the homestead tract. It was sufficiently definite in its reference to the right intended to be conveyed. However, it did not in any wise enlarge the right given to the Fimmens, and we are unable to find anything in the record showing that the Fimmens (plaintiffs' grantors) ever acquired any greater interest than that indicated by the deed above referred to. To be sure, in the deed which they gave to the plaintiffs they described the water right as being "eight fifty-fourths of the water on lot 8 of this tract," but that conveyance could operate to transfer nothing more than the Fimmens already possessed. Nor does the fact that a mortgage given to Catherine Chapman by the plaintiffs herein, which was in lieu of a mortgage executed by the Fimmens, described the water right in the larger terms extend the right. The plaintiffs may be said then to have shown a clear title by chain of conveyances to a right to eight fifty-fourths of the water in the well which was located on lot 8 in 1905, such right to be limited to the use of a maximum quantity of 26,000 gallons each 24 hours. This is quite a different thing from the possession of a right to that proportion of all the waters underlying lot 8, which the trial judge determined was the right to which plaintiffs were entitled.

[7-9] The trial judge also determined that plaintiffs were the owners of a proportionate interest in the pumping plant and machinery used in connection therewith for the purpose of raising water from the well on lot 8. It appeared in testimony that when the Fimmens began to occupy lots 3 and 4 in 1905 there was at the well on lot 8 a pump and a gasoline engine, together with the necessary connections for operating the pump; that the Fimmens made use of the water in the well for their domestic purposes, and furnished gasoline and oil with which to operate the engine and pump when required. This practice continued during the whole of the time they were on the property, and the pumping plant there existed when the plaintiffs came into possession of lots 3 and 4. As to who originally paid for the engine and pump does not appear. It does appear, however, that the apparatus was made use of for the mutual benefit of the parties interested in the well, including plaintiffs' predecessors, and that the right to so use the engine and pump was conceded to be in the owners of lots 3 and 4, to the extent, at least that such use was necessary in order to entitle them to secure the water conveyed to them. The evidence showed that in 1917 the plaintiffs here being then in possession of lots 3 and 4, and having continued to make use of some of the water from the well on lot 8, made an agreement with defendant's superintendent which not only recognized to the plaintiffs a right in the well and the pumping outfit, but proceeded to fix definite terms with respect to the apportioning of further operating charges. The deposition of defendant's superintendent recited that the manager of the defendant corporation requested him to secure the consent of plaintiff George Moore to have substituted an electric motor in place of the the gasoline engine to be used in pumping the water from the well; that such consent was obtained, on certain specified conditions, all of which defendant's manager approved; that the gasoline engine was taken away and sold by the defendant and the electric motor installed, but that defendant's manager failed and refused to furnish a statement of operating charges to plaintiff George Moore, as it had been agreed should be done. Defendant offered no testimony to contradict the statement of its superintendent, and we think that this testimony prima facie established a valid contract against the defendant corporation. Plaintiffs possessed the undoubted right to use the pumping plant, as it had existed on the well on lot 8 for so many years, and a consent to change from the gasoline engine to the electric motor was sufficient consideration for the making of the agreement as the record shows its terms. The matter of apportioning the operating charges, repair or replacement bills, seems never to have been settled prior to the date of this last agreement, and, as it was not a subject determined by any term of the water right conveyance, necessarily it was left an open question, dependent upon agreements to be later arrived at. The evidence is sufficient to sustain the court's finding that the agreement was made as alleged respecting the removal of the gasoline engine and the substitution of the electric motor therefor, and as to the apportionment between the parties of the operating charge which might thereafter be incurred. The water right itself, under the evidence, cannot be enlarged from that proportion and quantity fixed in the early conveyance to the Fimmens; in other words, the interest is an interest in the water in the particular well, and not the water underlying lot 8.

Furthermore, the evidence does not sustain the judgment in so far as it is determined that defendant has not the right to sell water which it may be entitled to take from the well on lot 8 outside the Chapman homestead tract. The contract of March 2, 1905, made between the several Chapmans and others as principals, in its restrictive feature affecting the taking of water beyond the limits of that tract, expressed a condition in favor of the owners of the outside property, and not the owners of the homestead tract. The defendant here has succeeded to all of the rights of the parties in whose interest that condition was made, and hence is in a position to waive the benefit of it. In no event that occurs to our mind may the owners of any of the lots in the homestead tract, because of that ownership alone, insist that water originating thereon shall not be sold and delivered outside the confines of the tract.

MOISE v. CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (Civ. 4017.)

1. Injunction 🔑85(1)—Not granted to restrain enforcement of invalid ordinance imposing license tax.

Even though a municipal ordinance imposing a license tax on brokers, and requiring police officers to examine all places of business and persons liable to pay the license and see that they are taken out and make arrests for violations, etc., is invalid, an injunction will not be granted restraining its enforcement and restraining police officers from visiting a broker's place of business, causing him to be arrested, etc., where it does not appear that the broker is the owner of any real estate, or that the officers or agents of the city are trespassing on his real property or injuring his property rights.

2. Injunction 🔑105(1)—Police officers not enjoined from visiting broker's premises.

There being several penal statutes which may be violated by a broker engaged in selling stocks and bonds, the police as to all such offenses, as well as offenses provided for in an ordinance imposing a license tax, are within their rights in visiting the broker's premises, and will not be enjoined from so doing.

Action by W. H. Moise against the City and County of San Francisco. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. G. Deal, of San Francisco (Frank J. Mahoney, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

George Lull, City Atty., and Maurice T. Dooling, Jr., Asst. City Atty., both of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. Plaintiff commenced an action to obtain a decree perpetually enjoining the defendant, its tax collector, agents, and employees, from collecting a license tax provided in a purported ordinance, and from enforcing the provisions of said ordinance, and to declare said ordinance null and void. The defendant city appeared and answered. Judgment went for the defendant, and the plaintiff has appealed. To support his appeal, the plaintiff has brought up the judgment roll including an agreed statement of facts in lieu of findings of fact. The agreed statement sets forth everything that is set forth in the complaint and answer and some additional matters. From the statement we are informed that the defendant is a municipal corporation; that the plaintiff is a broker engaged in selling stocks and bonds; that on July 1, 1920, an ordinance became effective under and by virtue of the terms of which a license tax is imposed upon brokers engaged in such a business as is the plaintiff; that by the terms of the ordinance all police officers are appointed inspectors of licenses and as such required to examine all places of business and persons on their respective beats liable to pay a license, and to see that such licenses are taken out, and to make arrests for the violation of the provisions of the ordinance. The police officers are further commanded to enter any place of business for which a license is required, and to demand the exhibition of such a license. It is further provided that the police officers shall cause complaints to be filed against all persons violating any of the provisions of the ordinance, and the chief of police is directed to carry into effect its provisions. The statement recites that the police officers of the city and county of San Francisco have been instructed thereupon to enter the place of business of plaintiff for the purpose of making the inspection provided for in said ordinance, and for no other purpose. It will be noted that the statement of facts does not contain any information as to whether by the terms of the ordinance, or by the terms of the charter, or otherwise, it is provided that moneys collected pursuant to an invalid ordinance may be recovered back; neither does the statement of facts directly aver that it is a misdemeanor for such persons as the plaintiff to transact business without first procuring a license. However, there are some intimations in the provisions of the ordinance which have been quoted that lead us to believe that the ordinance does contain such a provision. The appellant contends that the ordinance is invalid; the respondent replies that whether the ordinance is valid or invalid, plaintiffs were not entitled to an injunction. As this reply seems to us to be well founded, we will not attempt to discuss any other matters.

[1] It does not appear from the record before us that the plaintiff is the owner of any real estate, or that the officers or agents of the defendant city are in any manner trespassing upon the plaintiff's real property, or that they are in any manner injuring the plaintiff's property rights. Conceding, without deciding, that the ordinance in question is invalid, such invalidity, standing alone, does not entitle the plaintiff to a writ of injunction. Dodge v. Osborn, 240 U. S. 118, 121, 36 Sup. Ct. 275, 60 L. Ed. 557. If the ordinance in question is valid, of course, it is the absolute duty of the police officers to enforce the same. If it is invalid and they attempt to enforce it, doing nothing more than is set forth in the foregoing statement of facts, they should not be enjoined. In 25 Cyc. 632, it is said:

> "Even though the act or ordinance imposing a license tax be alleged to be invalid or unconstitutional, injunction will not lie to restrain its collection where an adequate remedy at law exists, where irreparable injury or other ground for equitable interposition is not shown to exist, or where judgment has been taken for a license tax imposed by a void act or ordinance."

Williams v. County Court, 26 W. Va. 488, 53 Am. Rep. 94, involved a license tax. On page 497 of 26 W. Va., 53 Am. Rep. 94, the court says:

> "The bill in this case was filed to restrain the collection from the several complainants of a tax assessed against them separately in respect to the business in which each is engaged. It is a personal tax purely. It was decided at an early day in this state that equity has no jurisdiction to restrain the collection of a personal tax, even conceding it to be illegal; the ordinary legal remedies being ample for the parties' protection. Williams v. Detroit, 2 Mich. 560. The principle has ever since been regarded as not open to controversy in this state, and it was applied without its soundness being contested in Henry v. Gregory, 29 Mich. 68, decided last year. In other states it is supported by a strong preponderance of authority."

And thereupon the court cites a long list of authorities. Pacific Whaling Co. v. United States, 187 U. S. 447, 23 Sup. Ct. 154, 47 L. Ed. 253, was a case involving the collection, etc., of a license tax. There, as here, it was contended that the tax was invalid. On page 452 of 187 U. S., at page 156 of 23 Sup. Ct. (47 L. Ed. 253), the court said:

> "Something more than mere illegality is necessary to justify the interference of a court of equity. But it does not appear that the tax if unpaid would cast a cloud upon the title to any real estate, or work irreparable injury. While it may be that the failure to pay the tax would expose the petitioner to a multiplicity of prosecutions for misdemeanor, yet neither the District Court, nor the judge, nor the clerk initiates criminal proceedings, and the district attorney—the prosecuting officer—was not made a party to the suit. True, an order was entered that he be notified of the pendency of the application and he appeared as amicus curiæ. Even had he been made a party, would equity entertain a bill to restrain criminal prosecutions? In re Sawyer, 124 U. S. 200; Harkrader v. Wadley, 172 U. S. 148; Fitts v. McGhee, 172 U. S. 516."

[2] It will be observed from the statement of facts that the plaintiff would have the officers enjoined from visiting his place, from causing him to be arrested, etc. As the plaintiff is engaged in selling stocks and bonds, there are several penal statutes which may possibly be violated. As to all such offenses, as well as to offenses provided for in the ordinance in question, the police officers are within their rights in visiting the premises of the plaintiff. In Pon v. Wittman, 147 Cal. 280, 81 Pac. 984, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 683, a similar claim was set up as against the visits of the police department. On page 293 of 147 Cal., at page 989 of 81 Pac. (2 L. R. A. [N. S.] 683), the court said:

> "And these premises being public the police officers had the same right to enter upon and traverse the passageways within the main court, and the entrance thereto, as had any other member of the public. In fact, in the enforcement of the law, which was being persistently violated through the existence of these houses of prostitution, these officers had the legal right to be there. It would be preposterous to say that where the public may freely enter to violate the law a police officer is excluded from entering to prevent it. He may patrol these passageways to deter by his presence the commission of crime as he may patrol any other public thoroughfare, and while he does so peaceably and quietly, and in the discharge of his duty, no exception can be taken."

In the case of Sullivan v. San Francisco Gas, etc., Co., 148 Cal. 368, 371, 83 Pac. 156, 157, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 401, 7 Ann. Cas. 574, the court said:

> "Courts of equity will, in proper cases, enjoin the attempt to enforce a law or ordinance making certain acts a criminal offense and imposing a punishment therefor, where the law or ordinance is invalid and its enforcement will *injure or destroy the plaintiff's * * * property rights.*" (Italics ours.)

In that case the court continues by citing the case Crighton v. Dahmer, 70 Miss. 602, 13 South. 237, 21 L. R. A. 84, 35 Am. St. Rep. 666, and the note attached to that case. We cannot do better than repeat the citation. See, also, Fritz v. Sims, 122 Tenn. 137, 119 S. W. 63, 135 Am. St. Rep. 867, 19 Ann. Cas. 458. Bearing in mind that a superior court in California may exercise either law powers or equity powers, a further quotation from the Sullivan Case is pertinent. On page 373 of 148 Cal., at page 157 of 83 Pac. (3 L. R. A. [N. S.] 401, 7 Ann. Cas. 574), the court says:

> "The object apparently sought by the suit is a judicial determination of these questions in a court of equity, to be used as a precedent in the criminal courts upon the trial of prosecutions under section 593, or which would have the effect of deterring the defendants from beginning such prosecutions. The superior court is as competent to decide such questions when sitting as a criminal court in the trial of a criminal cause as it would be upon the trial > of a suit in equity, and there is no reason why the plaintiffs should not be restricted to the criminal courts for the preservation of their rights and the maintenance of their defenses. However desirable and beneficial such a predetermination by a court of equity would be, it gives no right to invoke equity jurisdiction."

In Fitts v. McGhee, 172 U. S. 516, 19 Sup. Ct. 269, 43 L. Ed. 535, the court cites several cases on the point and among these, 172 U. S. at page 531, 19 Sup. Ct. 275, 43 L. Ed. 535, quotes as follows:

> "The office and jurisdiction of a court of equity, unless enlarged by express statute, are limited to the protection of rights of property. It has no jurisdiction over the prosecution, the punishment or the pardon of crimes and misdemeanors, or over the appointment and removal of public officers. To assume such a jurisdiction, or to sustain a bill in equity to restrain or relieve against proceedings for the punishment of offenses, or for the removal of public officers, is to invade the domain of the courts of common law, or of the executive and administrative departments of the government."

And indeed, in California, the rule is statutory. Section 526 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides:

> "* * * An injunction cannot be granted: * * * (4) To prevent the execution of a public statute by officers of the law for the public benefit. * * *"

At an early date, Mr. Justice Field, writing the opinion of the court in Dows v. City of Chicago, 11 Wall. 110, 20 L. Ed. 65, said:

> "No court of equity will, therefore, allow its injunction to issue to restrain their action, except where it may be necessary to protect the rights of the citizen whose property is taxed, and he has no adequate remedy by the ordinary processes of the law. It must appear that the enforcement of the tax would lead to a multiplicity of suits, or produce irreparable injury, or where the property is real estate, throw a cloud upon the title of the complainant, before the aid of a court of equity can be invoked."

That case has been cited and followed in California from the earliest times. Crocker v. Scott, 149 Cal. 575, 594, 87 Pac. 102.

It is patent, therefore, that in this case the plaintiff was not entitled to any relief as from a court of equity.

PEOPLE v. WEBB. (Cr. 574.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 10, 1921.)

Criminal law 🔑1178—Appeal assumed abandoned in absence of brief or appearance.

Where no brief has been filed and counsel for appellant does not appear on the day set for the oral argument, it must be assumed that the appeal has been abandoned.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tuolumne County; G. W. Nicol, Judge.

J. E. Webb was convicted of forgery, and appeals. Affirmed.

J. C. Webster, of Sonora, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINCH, P. J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of forgery. He duly moved for a new trial, and his motion was denied. This appeal is from the judgment and from the order denying such motion.

The transcript on appeal was filed herein June 4, 1921. Appellant's time to file his opening brief was extended to July 9, 1921. The cause was regularly placed on the November calendar for argument. No brief has been filed, and counsel for appellant did not appear on the day set for the oral argument. At the time set for argument, on motion of the Attorney General, the cause was submitted on the record. It must be assumed that the appeal has been abandoned. People v. Martinez, 185 Pac. 482.

An examination of the record discloses no error, and the evidence is sufficient to support the verdict.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

ABBOTT v. CORONADO BEACH CO. et al. (Civ. 3737.)

1. Trial 🔑29(3) — Intimation by court that witness was not impeached error.

In an action for assault, where defendant attempted to impeach the testimony of plaintiff by showing that it was inconsistent with statements made by her in a criminal prosecution for the assault, the action of the trial judge in stating that there was not such a conflict as to impeach the testimony was error, Code Civ. Proc. §§ 2051, 2052, providing for the submission of questions of conflict of testimony, and the extent to which the credibility of witnesses was affected was for the jury.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1066—Prejudicial error to instruct on special damages not justified by proof.

In an action for assault an instruction that in estimating damages the necessary results to plaintiff in seeking recovery for her injuries and the time and expense should be taken into consideration was prejudicial, there being an absence of allegation and proof as to special damages and determination of the question by the jury was conjecture.

3. Appeal and error ⚷1032(1)—Party claiming error harmless must supply the record to show it.

On appeal appellee may not complain that appellant's brief did not print portion of the record showing that error was harmless, as it was his duty to point out that portion of the record.

4. Trial ⚷295(1)—Instructions examined as a whole in considering prejudicial effect of erroneous instruction.

In determining whether the prejudicial effect of an erroneous instruction is mitigated or lessened by other instructions, the instructions are examined as a whole.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action by Rose Abbott against the Coronado Beach Company and another. From judgment for plaintiff after corporation had its motion for nonsuit sustained, defendant F. C. Williams appeals. Reversed.

V. F. Bennett, of San Diego, for appellant.
Durelle F. Glidden, of San Diego, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Action to recover damages for an assault committed upon plaintiff by defendant Williams, who is alleged to have acted under the direction of Coronado Beach Company, a corporation. At the close of plaintiff's evidence the court sustained a motion for a nonsuit against the corporation, and after evidence adduced on the part of Williams the jury rendered a verdict in favor of plaintiff for damages in the sum of $2,000, from which he has appealed.

Appellant specifies a number of errors upon which he claims the judgment should be reversed. The complaint was unverified and based upon the alleged fact that after plaintiff, who was a waitress at the Coronado Hotel, had severed her employment therewith, and while she was preparing to leave, defendant Williams, who was house detective, called upon her at the dormitory assigned to the use of such employees, at which time there was an altercation between them as to why she continued to stay, and, acting under the direction of the defendant Coronado Beach Company, he with force and violence attacked her and dragged her along the hall of said dormitory and otherwise violently maltreated her. In his answer Williams denied the making of the assault and each and every allegation of the complaint, and as a separate defense alleged that on the date of the alleged attack he called upon plaintiff at the dormitory to inquire why she had not vacated her room therein and when she would do so, at which time plaintiff, who was a strong and able-bodied woman, without any cause or provocation on the part of defendant, became excited and angry and raised a bottle, which she had in her hand, with which to strike him, whereupon he grappled with plaintiff, and, using no more force than was necessary so to do, took from plaintiff the bottle with which she was armed. It thus appears that two issues were presented to the jury for determination, the first of which was whether there was an assault made by defendant upon plaintiff, the burden of establishing which devolved upon her; and the second, assuming that he did, whether he was justified in doing so in self-defense, the burden of showing which devolved upon defendant.

[1] In the cross-examination of plaintiff, defendant's counsel, for the purpose of impeaching her testimony by showing that it was inconsistent with statements theretofore made by her, used a transcript of her testimony given in a criminal prosecution of defendant for the assault, and wherein it is claimed her statements made at the trial were materially different from her former testimony. During this examination the trial judge from the bench, and referring to the testimony which she had formerly given, stated, in the presence and hearing of the jury:

> "I hardly think there is such a conflict as to impeach the testimony given here."

That this was gross error admits of no controversy. Defendant sought to impeach the witness in the method prescribed by sections 2051 and 2052, Code of Civil Procedure, and the question as to whether there was a conflict, and, if there was, the extent to which the credibility of the witness was affected, was one solely and alone for the jury. People v. Wallace, 89 Cal. 158, 26 Pac. 650; Schneider v. Market St. Ry. Co., 134 Cal. 482, 66 Pac. 734. In People v. Vogel, 36 Cal. App. 216, 171 Pac. 978, the trial judge was guilty of a like act of misconduct by stating in the presence of the jury:

> "The evidence in the transcript which has been produced I do not consider as impeachment."

In referring to such statement so made by the judge, this court said:

> "His action in that regard was uncalled for. * * * His statement was distinctly prejudicial to the rights of the appellant."

Nevertheless, counsel for respondent argues that the rights of defendant were not prejudiced thereby, for the reason that, disregarding the testimony of plaintiff altogether, the facts of the assault made upon her by defendant are fully established by the testimony of other witnesses for plaintiff, citing McMinn v. Whelan, 27 Cal. 320. The record, however, does not support his contention. Other than the conflicting testimony of plaintiff and defendant, there was little or no evidence touching the question as to which of the parties was the aggressor. While other witnesses testified to what they saw after the commencement of the scuffle in which plaintiff was injured, none of them, except one whose testimony is vague and meager, was present at its inception; hence such issue for its determination was made to depend upon the weight given by the jury to the conflicting statements of plaintiff and defendant. The remark of the judge, by reason of the authoritative position occupied by him, was well calculated to impress the jury with the fact that the inconsistencies brought out upon the cross-examination of plaintiff were trivial, and should not be considered by them as affecting the credibility of plaintiff as a witness.

[2] It appears that the complaint stated a cause of action for general damages only, as to which the court instructed the jury that—

> "In estimating the compensatory damages you will take into consideration all the circumstances of the case, the position of the parties, the pain and suffering occasioned by the assault; the humiliation and shame put upon the plaintiff; the necessary results to the plaintiff in seeking recovery from her injuries; the time and expense; the nervous shock or condition produced by the act. You may take into consideration the public place in which the assault was committed. If you shall find that the assault was unwarranted and unjustified, it is your duty to render your verdict for such sum as will fully compensate the plaintiff for the assault, taking into consideration all the circumstances above mentioned."

The giving of the instruction was prejudicial error. Not only was there an absence of allegation as to the special damages referred to in that part of the instruction which we have italicized, and without which plaintiff was not entitled to recover therefor. (Lewiston T. Co. v. S. & W. W. R. Co., 41 Cal. 562), but there was no testimony as to what were "the necessary results to the plaintiff in seeking recovery from her injuries," expense incurred in so doing, or loss of time, other than that of herself, to the effect that she had, due to the injuries, consulted three physicians, and had for short periods of time on three or four occasions been unable to perform her duties as a waitress. This testimony, in the absence of any evidence tending to show the amount of the expense incurred in seeking recovery or the duration and value of the time lost, furnished the jury no basis for estimating the amount of money which would compensate for such loss. Duke v. Mo. Pac. Ry. Co., 99 Mo. 347, 12 S. W. 636. The determination of the question by the jury was therefore one of mere conjecture and guess. "The necessary results to the plaintiff in seeking recovery from her injuries, the time and expense," were in the nature of special damages, and, in the absence of proof, not elements to be considered by the jury in estimating the compensatory damage to plaintiff, which presumably they, as advised by the court, took into consideration in estimating the damage awarded by their verdict.

[3, 4] There is no merit in respondent's contention that appellant has failed to print in his brief such portions of the typewritten record as are necessary to illustrate the errors complained of. The facts constituting the errors which we have discussed appear from the appellant's brief, and if there is anything in the record not therein printed which would render the errors harmless, then it devolves upon respondent to direct attention to the same. While respondent makes no reference thereto, we have examined the instructions, as a whole, given by the court, and find nothing which would mitigate or lessen the prejudicial effect of the instruction which we have held to be erroneous.

Since the judgment must be reversed for the reasons assigned herein, we deem it unnecessary to discuss other alleged errors presented by appellant.

The judgment is reversed.

ANTELOPE VALLEY UNION HIGH SCHOOL DIST. OF LOS ANGELES COUNTY v. McCLELLAN. (Civ. 3717.)

1. Municipal corporations ⚷1 — Legislature can create or abolish at will.

Municipal corporations are subordinate subdivisions of the state government over which the state has plenary power, and they may be created, altered, or abolished at the will of the Legislature acting directly or under general laws through local board or council.

2. Constitutional law ⚷278(2)—Due process does not require notice before annexation of territory to high school district.

Due process of law does not require notice of the creation or alteration of a school district, and, since Pol. Code, § 1734, authorizing annexation of school districts to a high school district, does not require notice to be given, such notice is not necessary to a valid annexation.

3. Schools and school districts ⚷97(4)—Publication of notice of bond election held sufficient.

Publication of a notice of a bond election held on April 16 which was first made on March 26 and thereafter on each succeeding day up to and including April 15, complied with Pol. Code, § 1745, requiring publication not less than once a week for 3 successive weeks and first publication not less than 21 days before the election.

4. Schools and school districts 🔑97(4)—Notice of bond election held not objectionable specifying a dual purpose.

A notice of a bond election, which stated the purposes for which the bonds were to be voted in the language of Pol. Code, § 1745, which also provides that the bonds for the purposes stated may "be united and voted upon as one single proposition," is not objectionable as specifying a dual purpose.

5. Evidence 🔑83(2)—Bonds presumed to be within district debt limit.

In mandamus to compel the chairman of the county supervisors to sign bonds regularly authorized by a high school district, the court will not assume, in the absence of any showing of such fact, that the bonds so authorized exceed the legal amount which may be issued; the presumption being to the contrary.

Original application for writ of mandamus by the Antelope Valley Union High School District of Los Angeles County against R. F. McClellan, chairman of the Board of Supervisors of the County of Los Angeles. Writ granted.

A. J. Hill, Co. Counsel, and Jerry H. Powell, Deputy Co. Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

O'Melveny, Millikin & Tuller and Sayre Macneil, all of Los Angeles, and Paul E. Schwab, of Ontario, for respondent.

Jas. McLachlan, of Los Angeles, and Frank H. Snyder, of Glendale, amici curiæ.

SHAW, J. This proceeding is one in mandate to compel the respondent, as chairman of the board of supervisors of Los Angeles county, to sign certain bonds which petitioner proposes to issue for high school purposes. An alternative writ was issued, the return to which is made by demurrer to the petition.

The chief ground of opposition to granting the relief sought is the alleged irregularity in the procedure for the annexation of certain intermediate school districts to petitioner high school district, and without which, as constituent parts of said high school district, it is conceded the bonds could not be legally issued. These intermediate school districts, the annexation of which is attacked, are those of Leona, Palmdale, and Alpine school districts, all of which were annexed by orders of the board of supervisors made long prior to the election at which the bonds were voted and upon proceedings had and taken in all respects as provided by section 1734 of the Political Code. This section provides that—

"Whenever a majority of the heads of families or a majority of the electors residing in any school district contiguous to a high school district, in the same or in adjoining counties, as shown by the affidavit of one or more of the petitioners, shall present to the superintendent of schools who has jurisdiction over said high school district, a petition for the annexation of such school district to such high school district, accompanied by an agreement signed by a majority of the members of the high school board of the high school district to which annexation is desired, and by a majority of the trustees of such school district, consenting to such annexation and setting forth the terms thereof, such superintendent of schools shall, after verifying the signatures thereon and finding them sufficient, transmit such petition and agreement to the board of supervisors of his county with his recommendations thereon. Such board may thereupon, in their discretion, make an order annexing such school district to such high school district upon the terms agreed on."

As stated, the order of the board of supervisors was made after a full compliance with the statute, which, however, contains no provision requiring that, as a condition of making the order of annexation, notice must be given to the owners of land within or residents of such districts which it is proposed to annex. In the instant case none was given at any stage of the proceedings. By reason of such omission, respondent insists that the orders annexing the territory of Leona, Palmdale and Alpine school districts to the high school district were ineffectual for the purpose and the same never became part of the high school district; and further insists that if section 1734 be construed as not requiring notice, then it is unconstitutional in that it contemplates the taking of private property without due process of law.

[1] Municipal corporations are subordinate subdivisions of the state government over which the state has plenary power, and they may be created, altered, or abolished at the will of the legislature acting directly or under general laws through a local board or council to which the exercise of such power is granted. People v. Town of Ontario, 148 Cal. 625, 84 Pac. 205; People v. Los Angeles, 154 Cal. 220, 97 Pac. 311. "A school district, when organized as provided by the Political Code, is a public corporation of a quasi municipal character, possessing such authority as has been conferred by the Legislature, to be exercised in the mode and within the limits prescribed by the statute. The power to change the boundaries of a district, as well as to define them in the first instance, is of legislative origin, and, whether exercised immediately by the legislature or mediately by the board of supervisors—the local Legislature—is * * * a legislative act." Hughes v. Ewing, 93 Cal. 414, 28 Pac. 1067; Worthington School Dist. v. Eureka School Dist., 173 Cal. 154, 159 Pac. 437; Pass School District v. Hollywood, etc., School Dist., 156

[2] In discussing the establishment of permanent road districts, which in character are not unlike school districts, the court, in Potter v. County of Santa Barbara, 160 Cal. 349, 116 Pac. 1101, said:

> "The Legislature can create them, or cause them to be created, without giving any person a voice or hearing upon the matter."

The establishment of a system of public instruction throughout the state is a governmental function, as to which the state reserves to itself the means of giving it complete effect and full efficiency without regard to the wishes of the people "deficient in proper appreciation of its advantages." Cooley on Taxation (3d Ed.) vol. 2, p. 1299. Possessing such power to create, alter, or abolish districts, the function, governmental in its nature, may be exercised immediately by the Legislature or by subordinate bodies to whom the matter is delegated, subject to such conditions, and without notice, as it may impose. In the absence of constitutional restrictions, and there are none affecting this case, the question as to whether boards of supervisors may exercise such delegated power without notice is a question solely for the determination of the Legislature, and in its wisdom it has not required the giving of notice. Indeed, our attention is directed to no authority wherein it is held that the inhabitants of an intermediate school district are entitled to notice of a hearing upon the proposition as to whether the territory thereof shall be annexed to a high school district. In Fallbrook Irrigation District v. Bradley, 164 U. S. 112, 17 Sup. Ct. 56, 41 L. Ed. 369, it is said:

> "There is nothing in the essential nature of such a corporation (irrigation district), so far as its creation only is concerned, which requires notice to or a hearing of the parties included therein before it can be formed. It is created for a public purpose, and it rests in the discretion of the Legislature when to create it, and with what powers to endow it."

While the language quoted was used in discussing the creation of an irrigation district, it is equally applicable to the creation of or annexation of territory to a high school district.

While counsel for respondent concedes the principles enunciated in the authorities cited, he insists the decisions of the Supreme Court in Brookes v. City of Oakland, 160 Cal. 423, 117 Pac. 433, and People v. Van Nuys Lighting District, 173 Cal. 792, 162 Pac. 97, Ann. Cas. 1918D, 255, are inconsistent therewith. Conceding that in discussing the questions before the court in those cases language was employed which may afford some justification for respondent's contention, nevertheless what was said therein must be taken as applicable to the facts there involved and which was the subject considered. In the Brookes Case the question discussed was the power of the city council, under an act in which there was no provision for notice and hearing to persons whose lands were affected, to create a sewer district and construct sewers therein from the proceeds of bonds issued upon the lands in the district. It was held that, under the constitutional provision that no person shall be deprived of his property without due process of law, the Legislature could not confer upon the city council authority to create local assessment districts for taxation to pay for local improvements without some provision for notice to persons interested and a hearing upon the question of the limits of the district and as to whether their property would be benefited by the improvement. The case of People v. Van Nuys Lighting District was an action in quo warranto to determine the validity of the organization of a lighting district under the act of March 20, 1909 (Stats. 1909, p. 551), which authorized unincorporated towns and villages to establish and maintain systems of street lighting on public highways. The district as organized comprised about 50,000 acres of land within which were two unincorporated towns: That of Van Nuys, occupying about 640 acres and having 350 inhabitants, and the other the town of Owensmouth, covering 320 acres and having a population of 100 inhabitants; the balance of the territory consisting of farming and grazing lands and unproductive mountain land. The court construed the act as authorizing the formation of lighting districts only within the limits of an unincorporated town or village, and excluded from the district a tract of 4500 acres of land owned by the relator and devoted to farming and not inhabited as a village. In discussing the curative act of May 29, 1915 (Stats. 1915, p. 939), it held the same could not operate to validate previous proceedings of the district for the reason that no provision was made in the act for notice and hearing as to benefits to be derived from including lands in such local improvement district, without which the proposed tax would constitute a taking of property without due process of law. Neither case involves the determination of questions the decisions of which support respondent's contention. While in both cases it is true the acts contemplated the levy of a tax upon all the property in the district, nevertheless such tax was for local improvement and upon the theory that the property in the district would be benefited by the local improvement, and as to which, supported by all the authorities, the owners were entitled to a hearing. In neither case was the question of benefits considered as a basis for taxation, nor was there any discussion had of the question as to the power of the board or council in such cases to levy a general tax upon all the property in the district.

In our opinion, the power of the board of supervisors to annex the territory of an intermediate school district to a high school district is measured by section 1734, above quoted; that since it requires no notice to be given residents or owners of property in the district annexed, none is necessary; and that the board of supervisors has discretionary power to act whenever it appears that the provisions therein contained have been fully complied with.

[3] In the issuance of high school bonds, section 1745, Political Code, provides that the notice shall be published not less than once a week for 3 successive weeks; that the first publication of said notice shall be not less than 21 days before said election. In the instant case it appears that the bond election was held on April 16, 1920. The first publication of notice thereof was made on March 26, 1920, and it was published on each succeeding day thereafter up to and including April 15th. The notice was therefore published not less than once a week for 3 successive weeks, and the first publication made on March 26th was 21 days before the day of such election. The language of the statute is almost identical with that construed in the case of Cosgriff v. Board of Election Commissioners, 151 Cal. 407, 91 Pac. 98. We regard the decision in that case as determinative of the question.

It appears that bonds numbered 1 to 8 matured on June 1, 1921, and, since that date has passed, respondent insists that such bonds constituting overdue paper may not now be issued. We cannot assume that such bonds will be included in the proposed sale, nor that, if so included, other than the principal and interest accrued at maturity will be paid.

[4] The notice of election, in the language of section 1745, Political Code, specifies the purposes for which the bonds, $200,000 in amount, were to be voted, which statute also provides that the bonds for the purposes stated may "be united and voted upon as one single proposition." There is no merit in the contention that the notice specified a dual purpose for which the bonds were to be issued, since the whole sum voted was for the purposes named in the notice. Moreover, were this not the case, the alleged irregularity is cured by the validating act designated chapter 336 and found in Statutes of 1921, p. 456.

[5] Neither can we assume, in the absence of any showing of such fact, that the amount of the bonds voted is in excess of the amount of 5 per cent. upon the preceding equalized assessment of the district. On the contrary, the presumption is that the bonded indebtedness of the high school district, including that of the bonds proposed to be issued, is, as required by law, not in excess of 5 per cent. of the total assessed valuation of all taxable, nonoperative property therein.

Our conclusion upon the points discussed renders it unnecessary to consider other questions presented.

The alternative writ of mandate heretofore issued is made peremptory.

CYPRESS LAWN CEMETERY ASS'N v. LIEVRE et al. (Civ. 3933.)

Municipal corporations ⚷671(7) — One may maintain suit to abate nuisance on street interfering with passage to his grounds.

Defendants' maintenance on the sidewalk near the entrance to plaintiff's cemetery of a flower stand resulting in interruption of traffic and interference with passage to and from plaintiff's grounds, while partaking of the nature of a public nuisance, also inflicting on plaintiff a peculiar injury different in kind and not merely in degree from that suffered by the general public, it may maintain an action for abatement of the nuisance.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Action by the Cypress Lawn Cemetery Association against Gaston Lievre and others for injunction. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Swart & Lyon, of Redwood City, for appellants.

Joseph J. Bullock, of Redwood City, for respondent.

WASTE, P. J. The plaintiff brought this action to enjoin the defendants from maintaining along the state highway in front of and adjacent to its cemetery in San Mateo county, portable stands for the sale of flowers and floral decorations, and from obstructing the entrances to the cemetery grounds. The lower court determined that the maintenance of these stands and the selling of flowers therefrom created a nuisance by interrupting traffic and interfering with plaintiff's ingress and egress, and with the passage of its patrons to and from the highway, and in and out of the cemetery. It granted a perpetual injunction, from which judgment the defendants appeal.

The respondent owns land on both sides of the Mission road, a public highway in San Mateo county, for a distance of some 2,500 feet. Part of it is occupied as a cemetery, which extends far back on both sides of the road. On a portion of the property adjacent to the highway, and about 100 feet from it, respondent erected a building containing its business offices and a flower store, which was conducted in the premises. It has constructed and maintained an entrance in front of this building from the highway, which connects with and joins the main entrance to the cemetery, which, in turn, is the main and only public entrance to the cemetery on both sides of the roadway.

Until and prior to about six months before the filing of this action the appellant Marie Lievre had for a period of 17 years maintained a movable flower stand on the side of the highway at a point directly in front of the present location of the recently erected office building. When that structure was completed Mrs. Lievre was ordered away from that point. She thereupon moved her stand to a point on the roadway about nine feet away from the northerly entrance to that structure, where she continued to maintain her stand for the sale of flowers. The lower court found that the appellants, who it appears are all members of one family, on each morning placed on the sidewalk of the public highway, immediately in front of the cemetery of respondent, and in close proximity to the entrance thereto, large portable stands with projecting shelves, large and unsightly boxes and baskets in which were great quantities of greens, ferns, cut flowers, wreaths, wire holders, and other like materials, and also brought bottles, tin tubs, glass and crockery, jars, and other like receptacles which they filled with water, and from which, from time to time, they splashed water upon their wares and upon the highway, causing the road to become slippery, dangerous, and unsafe for pedestrians, and that the selling of the flowers by the appellants from their stands created a nuisance, by causing the stopping of automobiles, interrupting traffic and interfering with the plaintiff's ingress and egress, and with the passage of its patrons to and from the highway and in and out of the cemetery, to such an extent at times that funeral processions cannot enter the main entrance or driveway to the cemetery, but are obliged to use another roadway, and that the action of the appellants prevents plaintiff from carrying on its business of burying the dead with proper regulation, and from having unobstructed use of its premises. It was further found that the appellants throw large quantities of greens, withered plants, and flowers upon the highway in front of the entrance, and make and cause great noise and confusion in and about the place, and impede, obstruct, annoy, and frequently insult persons who enter the grounds.

On the foregoing complete and comprehensive findings, which are amply supported by the evidence, the trial court rested its judgment. We think its conclusion was correct. The acts of the appellants, while partaking of the nature of a public nuisance, undoubtedly inflict upon the respondent a peculiar injury, different in kind, and not merely in degree, from that suffered by the general public. Under such circumstances the party thus injured may maintain an action for the abatement of the nuisance. Cushing-Wetmore v. Gray, 152 Cal. 118, 121, 92 Pac. 70, 125 Am. St. Rep. 47; Brown v. Rea, 150 Cal. 171, 174, 88 Pac. 713; Hargro v. Hodgdon, 89 Cal. 623, 628, 26 Pac. 1106; Helm v. McClure, 107 Cal. 199, 205, 40 Pac. 437.

The judgment is affirmed.

UNITED STATES FIDELITY & GUARANTY CO. v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES et al. (Civ. 3198, 3199.)

1. Subrogation 🔑33(1)—Surety on contractor's bond cannot claim benefit of assigned assessment.

A surety on contractor's labor and material bond given pursuant to Vrooman Act, § 6½, as added by St. 1899, p. 23, has no right to claim the benefit of the diagram, warrant, and assessment issued under that act to reimburse itself for the amount of claims paid by it, as against assignees of the contractor for value, and before it sought to compel payment, in the absence of bad faith in the assignment.

2. Assignments 🔑87—Proof of bad faith of contractor and assignee of assessment.

An assignment given by a contractor of diagram, warrant, and assessment issued under the Vrooman Act, § 6½, as added by St. 1899, p. 23, to a company financing him, was not shown to have been made in bad faith as against surety on contractor's bond, which was required to pay claims for labor and material, by proof that assignee had knowledge of the contractor's obligations and of the surety's rights, and continued to advance money to the contractor with knowledge that small claims had not been paid, applied money from one contract to the other, deducted 5 per cent. from the face of the warrant in purchasing it, and permitted contractor to use $420.86 for his own living expenses and to pay alimony to a former wife.

3. Subrogation 🔑33(2)—Provision in contractor's bond held not to change surety's rights.

Surety on bond of municipal contractor under the Vrooman Act, § 6½, as added by St. 1899, p. 23, possessed no greater right than he otherwise possessed as against an assignee of warrant and assessment by reason of a provision in the contract between the city and the contractor, whereby the contractor agreed "that he will at his own cost and expense furnish all necessary materials and labor for said work, and that the material used therein shall comply with the said specifications, and be to the satisfaction of the said board of public works, and that he will within the time hereinafter fixed turn the said work over to the said board of public works complete and ready for use as a public street, and free and discharged of all claims and demands whatever, for or on account of any and all labor and materials used or furnished to be used in said improvement."

4. Assignments ⚷131—Pleading of surety held not to allege bad faith of contractor or his assignee.

Complaint of surety on contractor's labor and material bond under Vrooman Act, § 6½, as added by St. 1899, p. 23, to restrain issuance of warrant to assignee of the contractor, held to show no sufficient allegation of fraud or fraudulent intent on the part of the contractor or the assignee.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Action by the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company against the City of Los Angeles and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and certain defendants appeal. Reversed.

Albert J. Sherer and Robert Young, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Bowen & Bailie and Jas. E. Degnan, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. These two actions between the same parties, and involving the same issues, were tried together. Pursuant to stipulation, the appeals from the two judgments in favor of the plaintiff are being taken and heard together. There is but little controversy concerning the facts, which, in so far as they are material to this decision, except as they concern findings bearing upon the good faith of defendant, are as follow:

One H. V. Gentry entered into two separate contracts with the board of public works of the city of Los Angeles for street improvement work. This was done pursuant to the Vrooman Act. One contract concerned Sunset drive and the other Marathon street in Los Angeles. They were executed on the 29th day of June, 1916, and the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company, a corporation, on the same date became surety thereon. Also, contemporaneously with this transaction, the Municipal Securities Company entered into an agreement to finance the contractor Gentry in the carrying out of each contract, and to receive an assignment from him as security therefor of his rights to the diagrams, warrants, and assessments issuable under section 7 of the Vrooman Act (St. 1885, p. 152), as amended by St. 1911, p. 627. At the same time that this last-mentioned contract was made, Gentry, by a separate instrument, assigned said diagrams, warrants, and assessments to the Municipal Securities Company. Thereafter this company advanced to Gentry $4,778.74 in the Sunset drive case and $7,325.51 in the Marathon street contract. Gentry eventually completed both contracts, this being accomplished on Sunset drive December 20, 1916, and on Marathon street February 20, 1917. After completion the Municipal Securities Company assigned all its right, title, and interest in the warrant, assessment, and diagram issuable on the Sunset drive contract to the Pacific Bond & Mortgage Company. This was done at the request of Gentry, and the assignee paid 95 per cent. of the amount of the warrant for the same. The warrant, assessment, and diagram evidencing the contract price for the Marathon street improvement had not been issued at the time of the filing of this action.

Gentry left unpaid claims for labor and material on the Marathon street contract amounting to $924.72 and on the Sunset drive contract aggregating $1,587.29. He is conceded to have been practically insolvent when performance of the contract was completed. It appears that the surety did not know of the principal's financial condition until January 22, 1919, and at that date caused notice to be served on the city of the contractor's default in payment for labor and materials, and directing the city to withhold the delivery of the warrant, assessment, and diagram in connection with each contract until the city should have proof filed with it of the payment by the contractor of his obligations incurred in the carrying out of the contracts. Nevertheless, as heretofore stated, the city delivered one warrant, etc., as to the Sunset drive improvement, which was subsequently withdrawn, and had issued and was about to deliver a new warrant thereon, and also one for the Marathon street contract, when this suit was instituted by the surety.

The purpose of the action is to restrain the payment of the proceeds of the contracts to the contractor or his assignees, and to compel their application to the satisfaction of the labor and material claims incurred in the performance of the work. Certain of those to whom Gentry owed claims were made defendants, and during the trial, when their claims were established, plaintiff surety company paid the amounts thereof.

Pursuant to stipulation entered into after the actions were begun, the Municipal Securities Company was appointed receiver to take over the warrants and to hold $2,500 in the Sunset drive case and $2,300 in the Marathon street case of the proceeds collected thereunder until the issues in the proceedings were finally determined. The court gave judgment for plaintiff, and directed the receiver to pay the plaintiff sufficient to reimburse it for the payments which it had made as surety for the contractor to discharge the obligations of the latter for labor and material. It is from this judgment that the defendants appeal.

[1] The principal question involved is this: Has the plaintiff, as a surety on the contractor's labor and material bond, given, pursuant to section 6½ of the Vrooman Act, as added by St. 1899, p. 23, a right to claim the benefit of the diagram, warrant, and assessment issued under that act to reimburse itself by reason of it having been called upon to pay claims for labor and material furnished under the contract, as against defendants, who are assignees of the contractor for value, and before the plaintiff sought to compel payment? This question and principles affecting it, as applied to the facts of this case, have been passed upon partly in Adamson v. Paonessa, 180 Cal. 157, 179 Pac. 880, and partly in Los Angeles Rock & Gravel Co. v. Coast Construction Co., 197 Pac. 941.

Adamson v. Paonessa established the law to be that the surety on such a contract as the one here involved possesses no right of subrogation to the lien or claims of materialmen and laborers. Plaintiff asserts that it does not base its cause upon the theory of subrogation, but that the suit is to enforce an equitable exoneration. The first fact necessary to the maintenance of such a cause of action is the existence of funds or property belonging to the principal. If the principal has such an estate the surety may, in a proper case, subject it to the payment of the debt. Pomeroy, Eq. Juris., § 1419. In the instant case, the contractor had assigned his right to the proceeds of the contracts before these actions were instituted. In so far as the surety might have a claim to exoneration against such proceeds, they are not distinguishable from any other property which the principal might have formerly owned, but have sold before action was begun. The assessments to be collected under the Vrooman Act "are the property of the contractor, free from claims arising in connection with work called for by the contract." Los Angeles Rock & Gravel Co. v. Coast Construction Co., supra.

> "There is no provision [of the Vrooman Act] which gives such claimant any right or lien, equitable or otherwise, upon money or bonds coming to the contractor." Adamson v. Paonessa, supra.

Where the contractor has assigned before the surety sues to require the application of the debt, the surety cannot succeed as against the assignee. Los Angeles Rock & Gravel Co. v. Coast Construction Co., supra. But the respondent calls attention to the fact that in the case just cited the court said:

> "There is nothing to indicate that the assignee had any knowledge that any claim would not be paid by the contractor."

From this it is argued that, had the assignee in that case possessed such knowledge, the proceeds in its hands might have been followed by the surety for the purpose of exoneration. The language quoted mentions such lack of knowledge as incidental only to the statement made previously that "the bona fides of the assignment is not attacked." Further, the decision says:

> "The mere fact that the assignee knew of the existence of plaintiff's claim at the time of the assignment does not in itself indicate lack of good faith in the making of the assignment."

[2] In order that the surety may succeed in the instant case, it must attack the bona fides of the assignment. Bad faith must be shown. To meet this burden it is said that, while not a party to the suretyship, the assignee was not a total stranger thereto; that it had knowledge of the principal's obligations and of the surety's rights. But the court, in Los Angeles Rock & Gravel Co. v. Coast Construction Co., supra, holds that such information does not constitute a basis for a claim of bad faith.

It is further pointed out that the officers of the Municipal Securities Company knew of some bills that were not paid as early as October, 1916, and yet continued to advance money to the contractor. Our attention is not called to any evidence showing bills contracted after that time, and which were not paid. But, even though the securities company had information that the contractor had failed to pay one bill, or even two or three comparatively small claims, it does not follow that knowledge will be imputed that any other bill to thereafter become due would not be paid.

It is said that Municipal Securities Company appropriated $420.86 from the Sunset drive contract, and applied it to the Marathon street contract. Such a transfer was provided for in the financing contracts executed June 29, 1916. The application made was of money belonging to Gentry. He raised no objection. It was the payment of a debt owing by him. No action for exoneration had then been instituted.

The fact that the Pacific Bond & Mortgage Company deducted 5 per cent. from the face of the warrant in purchasing it is not evidence of bad faith. That company must collect the assessments as provided by the Vrooman Act, and there would be no object in their making the purchase except to make a profit. The record shows that the contractor arranged the assignment to the Pacific Bond & Mortgage Company, and there is nothing to indicate that the Municipal Securities Company participated in this transaction except to execute the formal assignment at Gentry's request.

It is asserted that the contractor was permitted by the defendant, Municipal Securities Company, to use $420.86 for his own living expenses, and paying alimony to his former wife, and other private purposes. The fact is not disputed that Gentry used valuable equipment of machinery and horses in the work, and devoted his own time for a period of about 8 months to directing these improvements. Respondent avers that the contractor was short of funds, at least from October, 1916, until the completion of the work. Without living expenses of as moderate amount as appears to have sufficed him, it is difficult to understand how he could have carried out the contract at all. Surely it was not unfair for him to use $420.86 during the period in question for personal purposes, or for his assignee not to have deprived him of such use. Of course, there is no question but that Gentry and the Municipal Securities Company acted entirely within their legal rights in this behalf.

[3] Respondent repeatedly urges upon our attention the fact that the Municipal Securities Company must be charged with knowledge of the provision in the contract that—

> "The party of the first part further agrees * * * that he will at his own cost and expense furnish all necessary materials and labor for said work, and that the material used therein shall comply with the said specifications, and be to the satisfaction of the said board of public works, and that he will within the time hereinafter fixed turn the said work over to the said board of public works complete and ready for use as a public street, and free and discharged of all claims and demands whatever, for or on account of any and all labor and materials used or furnished to be used in said improvement."

The law is established beyond argument that such a provision in the contract adds nothing to the obligation of the contractor, and therefore can give the surety no greater rights than he possessed without it. Adamson v. Paonessa, 180 Cal. 157, 179 Pac. 880.

But the court, in finding 8 of the Sunset drive case and finding 8 of the Marathon street case, concluded in substance that the assignments executed by Gentry to the "Municipal Securities Company," June 29, 1916, were at the time of their execution a part or a plan or scheme by which "the entire proceeds of said contract might be applied to the benefit of the defendant, Municipal Securities Company, and imposing upon the plaintiff the duty of paying all labor and material claims which said contractor might leave unpaid upon the completion of said work without recourse to the proceeds of said contract," and by finding 10 of the Sunset drive case and 9 in the Marathon street case that "on the 7th day of March, 1917, said Municipal Securities Company demanded of said board of public works, and of the members thereof, the delivery to it of the new warrant, assessment, and diagram, so directed to be issued, * * * and without the intent of appropriating to its own use the amount remaining due upon said warrant, and that said board of public works, with full knowledge of the failure of said contractor to comply with the provision in said contract requiring him to turn over said work freed and discharged of all claims and demands of every nature and kind whatsoever, for labor performed or material furnished in connection with said improvement, and notwithstanding the notice so served by plaintiff as aforesaid stated that it would deliver to said Municipal Securities Company, or upon its order, said warrant, assessment, and diagram unless restrained by order of this court," and finding 15 in the Sunset drive case and finding 14 in the Marathon street case that, while it is true that in the first case the Municipal Securities Company had paid subsequent to the 29th day of June, 1916, and up to about the 13th day of January, 1917, the sum of $4,778.74, and in the Marathon street case between the 29th day of June, 1916, and up to or about the 15th day of August, 1917, the sum of $7,325.51, that at the time said company "paid said money and every part thereof it knew that the plaintiff was surety upon the labor and material bond so given by it as aforesaid, and it paid said money under the plan and with the intent in paragraph VIII herein found. * * * It is not true that the moneys so advanced by said Municipal Securities Company to or for the account of said contractor was expended by said contractor or by said company for labor or material furnished to or used by said contractor in the performance of the work of said public improvement, but, on the contrary, a part thereof in excess of the claims of materialmen hereinbefore found to be unpaid was applied by said Gentry to the knowledge of said Municipal Securities Company to the payment of his own personal living expenses and to the performance of said contract."

Respondent asserts that these findings establish facts which remove the instant case from the control of the principles announced in Los Angeles Rock & Gravel Co. v. Coast Construction Co., supra. Appellant claims that the evidence is insufficient to justify such findings in so far as they determine the attempted perpetration of fraud upon the surety, and that if the element of fraud be eliminated, the decision of the case at bar must be controlled by the case of Los Angeles Rock & Gravel Co. v. Coast Construction Company, supra.

[4] The complaint contains no allegation of fraud or of fraudulent intent upon the part of Gentry or the Municipal Securities Company in the making of the assignments. Paragraph XIV of complaint in the Sunset drive case alleges in part as follows:

> "That on or about the 29th day of June, 1916, said H. V. Gentry filed with the board of public works of the city of Los Angeles an assignment of said contract to the Municipal Securities Company, a corporation, defendant herein."

In addition to this, paragraph XXVI reads:

> "But plaintiff alleges that such assignment, if any, is void as against plaintiff in that it was accepted by said Municipal Securities Company with full knowledge of the terms and conditions of said contract and of the right of plaintiff to have any funds or credits in the hands of said city or of any of its officers, arising out of the contract aforesaid, applied to the payment of the claims of laborers and materialmen before resort could be had to the bonds so given by plaintiff."

The complaint thus limits its attack upon the assignment to the single ground of knowledge upon the part of the assignee of the rights of the surety under the contract and bond. This Los Angeles Rock & Gravel Co. v. Coast Construction Co., supra, holds is not sufficient to defeat the assignment of the contractor's interest in such a transaction as the one here involved. During the progress of the trial, counsel for the surety company replied, "No, your honor," to the court's question, "I do not think the good faith is questioned in the matter, is it? You do not question the good faith, do you, Mr. Degnan?" The "matter" being discussed was the entire financing agreement.

The Municipal Securities Company agreed with the contractor to provide funds up to a maximum amount named in each instrument necessary to carry out the contracts. It took the assignments in question from him as security until it had advanced, from time to time, $4,778.74 on the Sunset drive contract and $7,325.51 on the Marathon street contract. The terms upon which the money was supplied were openly and clearly set forth in written instruments. Subsequently the Municipal Securities Company proceeded to use the assignments for the purpose for which they had been taken, namely, to reimburse itself for the money thus advanced, with the ordinary rate of interest as provided in the contracts. It used such reasonable precautions as were necessary for its own protection to see that the debts incurred by the contractor were paid; in this behalf it owed no duty to the surety based upon the suretyship or the financing contract, because the surety was a stranger to the latter agreement and the Municipal Securities Company had no part in the execution of the bond. There was no contractual relationship existing between them. The assignments which were taken were contemplated by the Vrooman Act, for it provides that to said assessment there shall be attached a warrant and that the said assessment, warrant and diagram shall be recorded in the office of said superintendent and thereafter shall be delivered to the contractor or his agent or assigns on demand, upon the payment of the incidental expenses not previously paid. The contractor arranged with the Pacific Bond & Mortgage Company to supply him enough money to finish the contract, and in carrying out that arrangement, it took an assignment from the Municipal Securities Company. The transactions between the contractor and his assignee were of a purely business character, each party safeguarding his own interests; neither company charged an exorbitant rate of interest for the use of their money, and Gentry substantially applied the funds which they advanced to the completion of the street improvements, so that his assignees were fully protected. There is nothing in the record to indicate a conspiracy on the part of these parties to defraud the surety, and nothing in their conduct which measures up to fraud as against the surety. Of course the surety took some risk when it executed the bonds. Presumably it received compensation for such hazards and investigated the financial standing and character of the man whose fulfillment of his contracts they guaranteed before becoming sureties on his bonds. This is not a case where the surety is asking the court to require the principal to pay the labor and material claims from funds belonging to him. It is an attempt to follow such funds after they have ceased to be the principal's property and have passed into the hands of assignees who paid value and received the property in good faith.

With no pleading alleging fraud or facts from which fraud must be inferred, and the plaintiff's distinct disavowal of any claim that the Municipal Securities Company had acted in bad faith, and without an application for the amendment of pleadings having been made or the defendant having been in any way enlightened so that it could defend itself against a charge of bad faith, it would be eminently unfair to construe the findings complained of as findings of fraud unless such a meaning were clearly expressed.

If such construction were to be placed upon them, they must be treated as surplusage, because they do not bear upon any issue presented by the complaint. Yet without them the plaintiff can have no right to a claim upon the proceeds of the warrant, diagram, and assessment in an action for exoneration begun after assignment for value.

However, the evidence to support a possible finding of fraud as summarized by respondent is that the Municipal Securities Company took the assignments with knowledge of the security's obligation, of the necessity of the contractor to employ labor and proper material, of the contractor's financial limitations, and of the provision in the contract requiring the work to be taken over free and clear of claims.

As we have previously pointed out, such knowledge as shown by evidence in this case does not make the acceptance of an assignment fraudulent.

The judgment is reversed and the superior court directed to dissolve the injunction.

ANDREWS v. FIRST NAT. BANK OF LOS ANGELES. (Civ. 3732.)

1. Bills and notes ⚷430—Renewal note does not extinguish debt.

A renewal does not extinguish a debt represented by a note for which it is given in lieu, unless there is a distinct and unqualified agreement that it shall so operate.

2. Limitation of actions ⚷167(1)—Passage of time does not require return of security pledged.

Neither a pledgor nor his representative possesses the right to require the return of pledged property until the debt for which it was given as security is paid and satisfied, regardless of the length of time that has elapsed since the debt was created.

3. Corporations ⚷123(6)—Agreement as to holding for future advances becomes inoperative on death of one joint debtor.

Where two persons each deposited corporate stock to secure past indebtedness and indebtedness that might be incurred in the future, upon the death of one of such pledgors the agreement that the security should be holden for future advances became inoperative, and stock of the deceased person could not be held to secure indebtedness created subsequent to his death.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Lewis R. Works, Judge.

Action by Florence A. Andrews, as executrix of the estate of Joseph E. Marsh, deceased, against the First National Bank of Los Angeles. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Willedd Andrews and Tanner, Odell & Taft, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher and H. F. Prince, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. By this action plaintiff in her representative capacity sought to secure a judgment requiring the defendant to deliver to her a certificate for 150 shares of stock in a California corporation, alleged to be of the value of $15,000. Incidental relief, that pending the determination of the action defendant be restrained from converting said stock or disposing of the same in any way, was prayed for. Defendant had judgment. Plaintiff appeals.

The stock in question had been deposited with the defendant, along with other securities of Robert Marsh and J. E. Marsh, prior to the death of J. E. Marsh, plaintiff's testator, which occurred on April 1, 1917. On November 11, 1914, J. E. Marsh and Robert Marsh, being then indebted to the defendant in various amounts, deposited with the latter six certificates representing the ownership of shares in various corporations, together with six promissory notes of third persons, altogether and on their face representing in value a large amount of money. Among the stock was a certificate for 300 shares of California Delta Farms, Inc., which was in the names of J. E. Marsh and Robert Marsh. This stock was afterwards divided and, in lieu of the one certificate, two certificates were made a part of the deposit; each representing 150 shares and being issued in the names respectively of J. E. Marsh and Robert Marsh. All of the securities mentioned were deposited subject to the terms of a written pledge agreement which was at the date last mentioned executed by J. E. Marsh and Robert Marsh. This agreement recited that—

> Whereas the parties were indebted to the defendant bank "in sundry amounts, real and contingent, due and to become due, and expect from time to time to incur further indebtedness to the said bank, now, therefore, we the undersigned, Robert Marsh and J. E. Marsh, pledge and deposit with the First National Bank of Los Angeles as collateral security for the payment of each and every liability, or liabilities, of the undersigned Robert Marsh and J. E. Marsh, or either of them, to the said First National Bank of Los Angeles, due or to become due, or that may be hereafter contracted, whether represented by notes, drafts, acceptances, or in open account, whether real or contingent, the following property."

An enumeration of the securities followed the provision quoted, and the agreement proceeded with this recital:

> "With this condition that the First National Bank of Los Angeles has the right to call at any time for such additional security as it may deem proper, and on the nonpayment of any liability or liabilities as above mentioned according to the terms and conditions thereof, the First National Bank of Los Angeles, its successors or assigns, is given full power and authority to collect or sell, assign or deliver the whole or any part of the above-named securities, or any substitute therefor, or any addition thereto, at public or private sale, at any time or times hereafter, without demand, advertisement or notice, such demand, advertisement or notice being hereby expressly waived, and upon such sale the said First National Bank of Los Angeles, or the holder thereof, may become the purchaser of the whole or any part of such personal property, discharged from any right of redemption; and after deducting all legal or other costs and expenses for collection, sale and delivery may apply the residue of the proceeds of such collection, sale or sales, to pay any, either or all of said liabilities, as said First National Bank of Los Angeles, its successors or assigns, shall deem proper, returning the overplus to the undersigned. And the undersigned agrees to pay the holder thereof any deficiency upon demand."

At the time of the death of J. E. Marsh there was apparently due to the defendant amounts represented by two promissory notes which were secured by the pledged property, to wit, one note for the principal sum of $11,937.50, dated March 7, 1917, signed by Robert Marsh & Company and Robert Marsh; also indorsed by Robert Marsh. The second note was for the principal sum of $8,000, dated March 20, 1917. From the transcript of the testimony we are unable to determine definitely by whom the latter note was signed, although it is stated in the briefs of appellant that it was made by Robert Marsh & Company. Subsequent to the death of J. E. Marsh, there was collected and credited on the $8,000 note the sum of $4,000, and several renewal notes were taken covering the amounts remaining unpaid on the two notes. These renewal notes were signed variously by Robert Marsh & Company, Inc., Robert Marsh & Company and Robert Marsh. It is stated in the briefs that there existed the corporation known as Robert Marsh & Company and also the individual business name of Robert Marsh & Company not incorporated. The testimony does not fully disclose the distinction between the two. However, we think it is immaterial to any of the questions presented as to whether the renewal notes were by the alleged corporation or by the fictitiously designated "company." The fact remains undisputed that at the time of the death of J. E. Marsh there was an apparent undischarged indebtedness on account of the two notes for which the shares of stock sought to be recovered had been given in security. Appellant's first contention rests upon the assumption that the renewal notes taken after the death of J. E. Marsh discharged the indebtedness existing at the date of his death and became new engagements.

[1, 2] Conceding that the pledge agreement hereinbefore referred to would not be binding upon the estate of J. E. Marsh for any obligation of Robert Marsh incurred subsequent to the former's death (a question which is further referred to in connection with appellant's second contention), and that the only claim of the bank against the security sought to be recovered is on account of such new obligation, then the defendant is without right to the possession of the stock. But it is fully established that a renewal note does not extinguish the debt represented by a note for which it is given in lieu, unless there is a distinct and unqualified agreement that it shall so operate. In its evidence this case is like that considered in Savings Bank v. Central Market Co., 122 Cal. 28, 54 Pac. 273, where the court says:

> "There is no evidence which tends to show an express, or any, agreement that the new note should be received as payment. * * * 'Unless received by express agreement as payment, it did not extinguish the debt'"—citing Griffith v. Grogan, 12 Cal. 317.

In Sather Banking Co. v. Briggs Co., 138 Cal. 724, 72 Pac. 352, discussing the effect of a renewal note, the court there said:

> "It was the same indebtedness, and the renewal of it was simply a prolongation of the original contract for its payment. The general rule is that the renewal of notes does not amount to payment. Savings Bank v. Central Market Co., 122 Cal. 35. The presumption is that they were not so taken."

Decisions which treat of the release of sureties and guarantors whose obligations are strictly limited are not applicable in this case. Both of the Marshes entered into the pledge agreement with the bank as principals; presumptively they were engaged in a joint enterprise attended by considerations mutual as between themselves. The entire agreement is so characterized by its terms, and the defendant had the right to rely upon the conditions thereof. Assuming that the plea of the statute of limitation might have some place under the facts of the case as is suggested by appellant, still the pledgor, or his representative, would possess no right to require the return of pledged property until the debt for which it was given as security is paid and satisfied, regardless of the length of time which may have elapsed since such debt was created. This proposition is settled beyond the reach of dispute by California decisions. Puckhaber v. Henry et al., 152 Cal. 419, 93 Pac. 114, 125 Am. St. Rep. 75, 14 Ann. Cas. 844; Savings Union Bank, etc., Co. v. Crowley, 176 Cal. 543, 169 Pac. 67.

[3] That the terms of the pledge agreement cannot be extended so as to bind the estate of J. E. Marsh for advances made by defendant bank to Robert Marsh or on his behalf subsequent to the death of said J. E. Marsh seems not to be a matter seriously disputed by the argument presented. Indeed, it must be admitted as an unanswerable legal proposition that, upon the death of J. E. Marsh, that term of the pledge agreement providing that the security should be holden for future advances became then inoperative. It is in view of this situation that counsel for appellant make their second contention against the validity of the judgment. It is by them insisted that the evidence shows that portions of the securities deposited under the pledge agreement were converted into cash and applied upon new indebtedness of Robert Marsh or Robert Marsh & Co. created after the death of J. E. Marsh. If it is a fact that the notes bearing date subsequent to the death of J. E. Marsh were in fact renewals, the evidence disclosed by the record does not so establish. The testimony of the bank officer was clear enough to the point that the notes, for which the stock sued for was being held, were in fact renewal notes of indebtedness accruing prior to the death of J. E. Marsh; but the same testimony was not given as to the indebtedness which the bank discharged by the sale of securities subsequent to the death of said Marsh. For instance, in a written memorandum admitted in evidence as "Exhibit A," an executive officer of the bank set forth that 175 shares of mortgage guaranty stock standing in the name of Robert Marsh were sold on dates in 1918, 1919, and 1920 and proceeds applied on notes of Robert Marsh dated variously in July, 1917, April and May, 1919. The aggregate sum of money collected upon the sale of this stock exceeded $17,000. There was also noted the sale of 150 shares of Delta Farms stock, for which $8,997 was received, which money was applied on a $20,000 note of Robert Marsh & Co. dated April 13, 1919. It appeared by the testimony of the same witness that J. E. Marsh had, after the pledge agreement was made, executed both individual notes and notes in other form, but that these notes had all been paid. Upon the face of the testimony of the bank official, we think that it was established prima facie that application of pledge security money was made in discharge of indebtedness of Robert Marsh or Robert Marsh & Co. created subsequent to the death of J. E. Marsh, and that the amount realized on such securities was in a sum in excess of that still claimed to be due the bank on the unpaid notes before mentioned. If that evidence represents the true situation, then the bank must be deemed to have in its hands money realized upon the sale of pledge securities more than sufficient to satisfy all of the remaining debt which arose under the pledge agreement. Hence it would follow that the stock, to recover which this action is brought, would be freed from any charge arising on account of the contract of J. E. Marsh, deceased. From the conclusions expressed it follows that plaintiff is entitled to a new trial.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; SHAW, J.

CALDWELL v. WESTERN DEVELOPMENT CO. et al. (Civ. 3774.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Oct. 31, 1921. Rehearing Denied Nov. 30, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 29, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑194(2)—Sufficiency of denials of answer not questionable for first time.

The sufficiency of denials in an answer not questioned in the trial court cannot be raised on appeal.

2. Partnership 🔑225—Partnership agreement properly silent as to termination or continuance of lease to firm on retirement of partner.

Whether either partner could terminate a lease to the firm any time by withdrawing from the firm, or whether the other partner could continue it, are matters concerning the lessor, to be provided for in the lease, if at all, and as to which the partnership agreement is properly silent.

3. Landlord and tenant 🔑24(1) — Lease of business definite as to what lessees were to receive therefrom.

Provision of lease of ranch with a business of raising, buying, and fattening stock, and then selling it, that the lessees "for a full and final remuneration for their services and investment were to receive one-half of the gross proceeds," is not ambiguous and void under Civ. Code, § 1598.

4. Landlord and tenant 🔑24(1)—Under lease of business lessees to return an equal number in kind.

Under such lease, it is clear that the lessees are not to retain the specific stock and return it to the lessors at termination of lease, but return an equal number in kind.

5. Landlord and tenant 🔑24(1)—Termination of lease by one of the parties authorized.

The provision of such lease that, if any of the parties shall wish to terminate it, the retiring party shall recompense the others for any loss sustained by such retirement, authorizes one of them to terminate it, and so was not uncertain in that respect.

6. Landlord and tenant 🔑24(1)—Lease properly silent as to partnership matter of one of the parties.

Such lease was properly silent as to how, if it is terminated, the members of a partnership, constituting one of the parties, should settle between themselves; this being a partnership matter.

7. Landlord and tenant 🔑24(1)—Under lease, lessor held to have right to direct that alfalfa be not planted.

Under the provision of such lease that the lessees are to sow 10 acres of alfalfa each year, and that the welfare of the operations of the ranch shall be under the personal supervision of the lessor, it has the right to direct, in any one year, that the alfalfa need not be sown.

8. Landlord and tenant 🔑24(1)—Under general covenant to return articles in good condition, no excuse.

Under lease of buildings and personal property providing, without any exception, for return of everything in as good condition as at time of leasing, there is no excuse for not doing so.

9. Contracts 🔑9(1)—Enough that intention can be ascertained.

A contract is not void for ambiguity if so framed that one can readily ascertain the parties' intention by following the well-established rules governing the interpretation of contracts stated in Civ. Code, §§ 1635–1661.

10. Contracts 🔑9(1)—Not wholly void where vague only as to some of its objects.

A contract which has several objects, and is not "so vaguely expressed" as to all those objects "as to be wholly unascertainable," is not wholly void, as, under Civ. Code, § 1598, is a contract having but a single object so vaguely expressed.

11. Appeal and error 🔑843(2)—Clauses as to which contract has become an executed contract not to be questioned.

After a contract has become an executed contract as to all the clauses except the one as to division of the "gross proceeds," the other clauses cannot be questioned, since they present only moot questions.

12. Trusts 🔑33, 359(1)—Delivery of personalty for management or liquidation created a trust; trustee acting within rights in selling liable only to account and not for conversion.

Where the lessees of a stock-raising business with consent of the lessor turned it over to a third person to look after for the benefit of all, he became a trustee of the lessees to manage, or liquidate, as the necessities might demand, so that in selling the personal property he was acting within his rights, and not guilty of conversion, though, in a proper case, accountable to the lessees for matters during his trusteeship.

13. Judgment 🔑249—In action for conversion, judgment held properly for defendants where any right was only for accounting by trustee.

Where, though any liability of defendant was to account as trustee to plaintiff and his partner, plaintiff sued for conversion, successfully met demurrers and motions based on the necessity of the partner being a party, made no motion to make him a party, and produced no evidence that defendant had received any money for which it should account, there was no error in not ordering an accounting, instead of rendering judgment for defendants.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Pat R. Parker, Judge.

Action by Orville R. Caldwell against the Western Development Company and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

F. H. Dam, of San Francisco, for appellant.

C. W. Humphrey and E. F. Conlin, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J. Plaintiff commenced an action to recover a money judgment against the defendants; a trial was had, the court sitting without a jury; the defendants had judgment; and the plaintiff appealed under the new method.

In his complaint the plaintiff alleged that the Western Development Company was a corporation; that defendant W. S. Gray owned all of the stock of the corporation and was executive officer and manager; that in May, 1917, acting on the suggestion of the defendant W. S. Gray, the plaintiff and John C. Gray (son of W. S. Gray) as partners, and the corporation, executed a lease or agreement; that at the same time plaintiff and John C. Gray executed a partnership agreement; that thereafter the corporation turned over to the partnership live stock estimated at $1,446.50 and purchased other stock which, added thereto, aggregated $3,253.31; that plaintiff paid $1,084.40; that he devoted his time from May 21 until December 22, 1917, of the reasonable value of $510; that he expended $240 on feed and supplies; that on the 26th day of December, 1917, the plaintiff discussed with "the defendant W. S. Gray the question whether plaintiff would be subject to conscription in the United States Army; that thereupon and on said day, the defendant W. S. Gray stated to the plaintiff that both plaintiff and the said John C. Gray probably would be subject to such conscription and that it would be better for the plaintiff and said John C. Gray to enlist at once in such branch of the service as they respectively preferred; that said defendant further stated to plaintiff, as an inducement to such enlistment on the part of plaintiff, that said defendant would make a fair and just settlement with plaintiff of all that would be coming to plaintiff out of said farming enterprise in which the said parties were then, as aforesaid, engaged; and that said defendant then and there further stated, as an additional inducement for plaintiff's enlistment in the military service of the United States, that if necessary, the said defendant, himself, would go up to said ranch and actively manage and operate the same for the benefit and advantage of the said several parties interested therein." It is further alleged that on the 2d day of January, 1918, plaintiff did enlist and subsequently remained in the said service; that thereafter the said W. S. Gray "sold all of the cattle, hogs, and other live stock, and all of the personal property of whatsoever kind hereinabove mentioned and has converted the money and the whole thereof received therefór"; that defendants have failed and refused to account to plaintiff. Thereupon plaintiff prays judgment for $1,834.40, being the amount of the moneys by him invested, and the value of his labor. The defendants each answered separately; no demurrer was interposed to the answer of either one. In one answer the pleading is:

"Denies that defendant W. S. Gray did, or now does, or at any time mentioned in the complaint on file herein, own all of the stock of the Western Development Company, a corporation, and in this connection defendant alleges that he only owned five per cent. of stock in said company."

The other answer is worded:

> "Denies that at any time mentioned in said complaint that W. S. Gray owned more than above five (5) per cent. of stock of the Western Development Company."

[1] During the trial no question as to the sufficiency of such denials was presented to the trial court. Such denials must now be considered as sufficient. Grogan & Lent v. Ruckle, 1 Cal. 193, 196; 2 Hayne New Trial and Appeal, § 280. With the exception of the allegation as to ownership of stock, the trial court found in the language of plaintiff's complaint in plaintiff's favor on every allegation which we have mentioned above, but gave judgment in favor of the defendants. Both in the trial court and in this court the defendants have contended that the plaintiff may not maintain this action, or any action, regarding the subject-matter except that he make John C. Gray a party, and then, and in that event, the only proper action for the plaintiff to maintain is an action for an accounting. The plaintiff has contended that such would ordinarily be the rule, but that both of the instruments, the lease and the partnership agreement, are void as being wholly ambiguous. Civ. Code, § 1598. If this contention on the part of the plaintiff is well founded, then it may be assumed, without going into the matter, that the judgment should be reversed; but, if the plaintiff is mistaken in such contention, then the judgment must be affirmed.

[2] We shall take up first the consideration of the attack made on the partnership agreement. It is: You cannot tell from the partnership agreement (1) whether either partner could terminate said lease at any time, by withdrawing from it, or (2) whether the other partner could continue the lease by settling with the one withdrawing. As to the first item, the instrument is, very properly, silent. Such subject should be provided for in the lease, if at all. The lessor would be entitled to be heard before the lease could be terminated. As to the second item, the instrument is, very properly, silent. If one partner retires from the contract it is a matter concerning the lessor and the remaining lessee what the future terms are to be—not a subject to be inserted in a dissolved contract. The instrument provides, in the event the lease is terminated, how the partners may settle between themselves. The passage is reasonably clear and is not attacked by the plaintiff.

In elucidating his contention that the lease is void for ambiguity the plaintiff enumerates: That it cannot be ascertained whether the lessees were to divide the gross returns, gross receipts, profits, or receipts; whether the lessees were to retain and later return the specific stock or whether certain portions were to be sold from time to time; whether any one of the three parties had the right to terminate the lease; whether, upon the termination of the lease, the parties were entitled to share in the profits or only in losses; and whether it was the duty of the lessees to check and sow ten acres of alfalfa each year in any event, or, only by direction of the lessor. The plaintiff also enumerates: That it cannot be ascertained whether damage by fire is to be borne by the lessees in the first instance, and thereafter shared by the lessor; whether the duty of restoring burned buildings applies to all fires or merely fires caused by the fault or negligence of the lessees; whether the lessees are to make good all stock that dies from any cause or only stock that dies by the fault or negligence of the lessees; and whether it is the duty of the lessees to furnish necessary feed even though feed must be purchased at great cost.

[3-9] The foregoing attacks, in the order stated, we shall now consider. The lease provided that the lessees "for a full and final remuneration for their services and investments were to receive one-half of the gross proceeds." That passage clearly answers the first attack. The evidence showed that the lessor had been engaged in the business of raising, buying, and fattening stock and then selling the same, and that it was such business which he leased to the lessees and which they were to conduct. Therefore it is clear that the lessees were not to retain and return the specific stock, but were to return an equal number in kind. It is provided:

> "This lease shall terminate on the first day of March, 1920, and if for any reason, any or either party to this lease shall, for any reason, wish to terminate the same, the retiring party shall suitably recompense the remaining party for any loss that they may sustain by reason of such retirement."

In the event of a termination of the lease the instrument is silent as to the manner in which the partners should settle between themselves. This is as it should be. Such a matter was a concern of the two partners and not a concern between the lessor and the lessees. It is provided in the lease that the lessees are "to properly check and sow ten acres of alfalfa each year," and it is also provided in legal effect that the welfare of the operations of the ranch shall be under the personal supervision of the defendant corporation. Therefore the defendant corporation had the right to direct, in any one year, that the alfalfa need not be planted. The lease covered certain lands and buildings, and certain personal property thereon and to be added thereto, and it further provided:

> "To return all stock, tools, buildings, equipments, horses, and everything in as good condition as they received it, at the expiration of this lease * * * to abandon and give peaceable possession of the premises, stock and tools, in as good a condition, and the same kind, as there now are on these premises."

No exception whatever was written into the contract. It follows that the meaning of the contract is exactly what is written on the face thereof. A similar question was presented in Polack v. Pioche, 35 Cal. 416, and at page 422 (95 Am. Dec. 115), the court said:

> "A general covenant to repair is binding upon the tenant under all circumstances. If the injury proceeds from the act of a stranger, from storms, floods, lightning, accidental fire, or public enemies, he is as much bound to repair as if it came from his own voluntary act. Such has been the settled rule since the time of Edward III. (2 Platt on Leases, 186, 187, and cases there cited.) If the tenant desires to relieve himself from liability for injuries resulting from any of the causes above enumerated, or from any other cause whatever, he must take care to except them from the operation of his covenant."

The principle is applicable alike to covenants regarding personal property as well as to real property. That case was cited with approval in Ahlgren v. Walsh, 173 Cal. 27, 32, 158 Pac. 748, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 751. In support of his contention concerning ambiguous instruments, the appellant cites to us a number of cases; some of them do not deal with so-called ambiguous instruments, but do deal with and consider inchoate instruments. Donnelly v. Adams, 115 Cal. 129, 46 Pac. 916; Talmadge v. Arrowhead R. Co., 101 Cal. 367, 35 Pac. 1000; Harvey v. Duffey, 99 Cal. 401, 33 Pac. 897; Durst v. Jolly, 35 Cal. App. 184, 169 Pac. 449. The case of Peerless Glass Co. v. Pacific, etc., Co., 121 Cal. 641, 54 Pac. 101, does deal with an ambiguous instrument but is not otherwise helpful. Van Slyke v. Broadway Ins. Co., 115 Cal. 644, 47 Pac. 689, 928, is more nearly in point. But in that case the Supreme Court remanded the case to the trial court to enable the plaintiff to plead and prove the omitted parts of the contract, if any had been omitted. In the instant case, the instrument is not so frail; on the other hand, each instrument is so framed that one can readily ascertain the intention of the parties by merely following the well-established rules governing the interpretation of contracts. Civ. Code, §§ 1635–1661; Sutliff v. Seidenberg, Stiefel & Co., 132 Cal. 63, 64 Pac. 131, 469.

[10] Again, each instrument contained several objects. Neither instrument was "so vaguely expressed" as to each and all of those several objects "as to be wholly unascertainable." Neither instrument then, was wholly void. Civ. Code, § 1598.

[11] Moreover, when on December 26, 1917, the defendant W. S. Gray took over the management of the business, each of the instruments became executed contracts as to every clause except the division of the "gross proceeds." The time then expired during which any of the other clauses could be questioned. To discuss them now is to discuss moot questions.

[12] The plaintiff and John C. Gray were partners. As such partners they were the lessees down to the date in December when they enlisted. In taking the step of leaving the ranch and turning the same over to W. S. Gray, as alleged and found by the trial court, they did not act wrongfully, but all parties acted by agreement. Thereupon W. S. Gray became the trustee of the partners to manage, or liquidate, as the necessities might demand. When thereafter he sold the personal property he was acting within his rights as such trustee and was not guilty of conversion. Bragg v. Martenstein, 25 Cal. App. 199, 143 Pac. 79. However, in a proper case, he could have been required to account to the two partners for matters arising during his trusteeship.

[13] The plaintiff complains because the trial court did not order an accounting instead of the judgment which it did order. The attack is wholly without merit. When the defendants appeared they presented long demurrers. It was the very gist of each and all of the demurrers that plaintiff's complaint showed the existence of a copartnership, that John C. Gray was a partner and a necessary party, and that the plaintiff's rights could not be ascertained until John C. Gray was made a party and an accounting was had. The plaintiff resisted those attacks and induced the trial court to overrule the demurrers. During the course of the trial the defendants made objections to various questions, the force of the objection being that the subject-matter was immaterial if John C. Gray was not a party. All of such objections were countered by the plaintiff. Finally the defendants made a motion for a nonsuit and in the motion they included the same attack. That motion was opposed by the plaintiff and later it was withdrawn, and the case was submitted. It is patent that John C. Gray was a partner. However, before it can be adjudged that he was a partner, and that an accounting should be had, he is entitled to be made a party and to be heard on that very issue. At the end of the plaintiff's case the trial court did not have the jurisdiction to order amendments, and to order John C. Gray to be brought in and made a party except that the proceedings, theretofore had and taken, be had anew. No such motion by the plaintiff was ever made in the trial court, but, on the other hand, such procedure was by him at all times opposed. At this time he may not change his position. Again, it does not appear that a fund exists for which an accounting should be had. The plaintiff asserts the fact was admitted by the pleadings. In this assertion we think he is in error. In the trial court he treated the pleadings as making an issue as in conversion, but he never produced any evidence that the defendants received any moneys for which they should account.

It follows that the judgment should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

We concur: LANGDON, P. J.; WASTE, Justice pro tem.

On Petition for Rehearing.

LANGDON, P. J. In petitioning for a rehearing, the appellant has earnestly contended that the statement of facts contained in the opinion heretofore filed precludes him from properly presenting the matter to the supreme court of this state upon application for a hearing there. The following portions of the pleadings are asked to be made a part of the opinion of this court:

The complaint alleges that—

> "W. S. Gray, without obtaining or asking the consent of the plaintiff, and without notice to plaintiff, has sold all of the cattle, hogs and other live stock and all the other personal property of whatsoever kind hereinabove mentioned and has converted the money and the whole thereof received therefor to the use of the said defendants; that defendants have failed and refused and do now fail and refuse to account to plaintiff therefor; * * * but said defendants have appropriated and do now appropriate the same and the whole thereof to their own benefit and advantage."

The defendant corporation answered the foregoing allegation as follows:

> "Denies that this defendant without obtaining or asking the consent of plaintiff or without notice to plaintiff sold all of the cattle and hogs and live stock and all other personal property whatsoever on said ranch; * * * denies that this defendant has appropriated the whole or any part of any money or thing of value which belongs to or in which plaintiff is interested to its own use and benefit or advantage."

Defendant W. S. Gray answers the foregoing allegations of the complaint as follows:

> "Denies that this defendant converted the money and the whole thereof obtained from the sale of said cattle and the personal property to his own use."

The foregoing extracts from the pleadings are hereby made a part of the opinion heretofore filed herein, for the benefit of the appellant.

BENNETT v. BENNETT. (Civ. 4001.)

1. Divorce ⚷27(18)—Intoxication and loose habits may be cruelty.

Frequent intoxication in public places and at home and loose habits of the husband with other women, even though they are insufficient as grounds for divorce as habitual intemperance or infidelity, may entitle the wife to divorce for cruelty, where the evidence shows they caused her great mental anguish and serious physical and nervous disorder.

2. Appeal and error ⚷994(3) — Attack on credibility of testimony accepted by trial court not sustained.

On appeal from a judgment an attack on the testimony of witnesses, who corroborated the testimony of the plaintiff, and whose testimony was accepted by the trial court, can have no influence.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

Action for divorce by Susie H. Bennett against George E. Bennett. Judgment for the plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

L. L. James, Jr., and C. A. S. Frost, both of San Francisco (Francis V. Keesling, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Scrivner & Hettman, of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. [1] This appeal is from an interlocutory decree in an action for divorce. The complaint alleged and the trial court found extreme cruelty on the part of the defendant as the basis of the action and decree. The appellant attacks the findings of the trial court upon this issue as not sufficiently supported by the evidence, and also upon the ground of insufficient corroboration to satisfy the requirements of the Code. We have examined the record with respect to both of these contentions, and we do not find that either of them can be sustained. The parties to this action intermarried in San Francisco on April 11, 1889. At the time of their marriage the defendant was employed in a stevedore and ballasting business, then chiefly owned by a man named Hazeltine, at a salary of $90 a month. He continued in this employment for about two years, when his wife, the plaintiff herein, by mortgaging some property of her own was enabled to assist him in forming a partnership with his employer. From this on the defendant appears to have prospered financially until at the time of the final separation between the parties hereto in 1919 he had acquired valuable interests in several corporations, and was in receipt of a salary from these aggregating about $400 a month, besides being possessed of several pieces of real estate. With this increasing prosperity came convivial habits, which grew into intemperance with frequent intoxication, often in public places, and at home, causing his wife much humiliation and distress of mind. While thus intoxicated upon one occasion he undertook to drive an automobile upon a public highway in Marin county, with the result that it was overturned, a lady guest of himself and wife was killed, and both his wife and himself severely injured. He also took to loose habits of living, remaining often away from his home overnight and being seen with other women in restaurants and places of resort. These lapses, while they may not have furnished ground for divorce either upon the ground of habitual intemperance or of infidelity, were alleged and shown to have caused his wife great mental anguish and serious physical and nervous disorder. They thus furnished sufficient basis for an action for divorce upon the ground of extreme cruelty. Geierson v. Geierson, 156 Cal. 434, 105 Pac. 120, 134 Am. St. Rep. 137.

[2] Upon the question of corroboration of the evidence of witnesses other than the plaintiff herself, it was we think ample to satisfy the section of the Code requiring additional evidence in divorce cases. The attack which the appellant makes upon certain of these witnesses might possibly have served its purpose in the trial court, but it could have no influence here, since the trial court accepted the testimony of these witnesses and found the facts to be in accord with it. Taking the record as a whole, we think that the findings of the trial court were justified by the evidence, and that its interlocutory decree was correct.

Judgment affirmed.

AUTOMOBILE, TRUCK, TRACTOR & IMPLEMENT CO. et al. v. SALLADAY.

1. Replevin 🔑8(4), 68—Plaintiff must show present right, and may not amend to show right subsequently accruing.

A plaintiff in replevin on commencing his action must show a present right of recovery, consequently lessor of automobile, suing to recover possession by reason of an alleged default in payment of installments of rent, was not entitled to file a supplemental complaint and set up failure to pay installments due after the taking of the car by the sheriff.

2. Bailment 🔑18(1)—Lessor cannot withhold chattel and collect rent money.

Lessor cannot collect rent for the use of a chattel after he has repossessed himself thereof and elected to terminate the lease by reason of an alleged default in payment of an installment, at least in the absence of an express covenant to that effect, and nonpayment of installments due after the retaking of the chattel cannot be assigned as a basis for forfeiture.

3. Master and servant 🔑72½—Salesman held entitled to traveling expenses.

Where a letter employing salesman at a certain salary and commission to sell trucks, tractors, and other goods did not intimate that the salesman was to travel or discharge his duties at any place other than the one indicated in the caption of the letter, the salesman was entitled to show that he was entitled to payment of certain expenses incurred by reason of his being sent to various counties to sell goods.

4. Evidence 🔑210 — Defendant in replevin held entitled to prove statement of plaintiff in deposition.

In replevin by lessor of automobile based on an alleged default, wherein defendant claimed certain credits by reason of expenses incurred in his employment with plaintiffs when traveling, the defendant was entitled to prove as an independent statement or admission, and wholly without reference to impeachment, a statement of one of the plaintiffs in a deposition that plaintiffs had agreed that defendant was to have "any expenses of going out of town, hotel bills, or anything incidental to the business."

5. Payments 🔑25—Credits applied on obligations without agreement.

Where automobile was leased by one employed as salesman by lessor, the salesman had the right to credit on rent installments any items or credits to which he was entitled, arising in the course of his employment with the lessor; the law supplying the contract that they should so apply, in view of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 437, 438, 440.

6. Bailment 🔑33—Charge that jury might find alleged lease was absolute sale properly refused, where contract was clear.

In replevin by lessor of automobile under a writing, which was plain, clear, and wholly free from ambiguity, and provided for a lease and not a sale, court did not err in refusing to charge the jury that they might find that the alleged lease was in fact an absolute sale.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; J. Q. White, Judge.

Action by the Automobile, Truck, Tractor & Implement Company and others against L. O. Salladay. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Weldon & Wessels, of Ukiah, for appellant.

Charles Kasch, of Ukiah, and W. F. Cowan, of Santa Rosa, for respondents.

PREWETT, Justice pro tem. This case involves an alleged forfeiture of a lease of a Nash touring car. The respondents, by an instrument in writing, on March 18, 1919, leased to appellant the car in question for an agreed rental of $1,720 payable as follows: $270 in cash, $700 in two months, and the balance in monthly installments of $62.50. It is provided in the lease that there should be a monthly payment of $62.50 on May 18th, making the payment for that date $762.50; but both the complaint and answer show that this provision is a mistake, and that only $700 was to be paid on that date. It is expressly provided that the lease shall terminate on May 18, 1920. An important provision of the lease reads:

> "Lessee acquires no interest or title to said property, it being distinctly understood that this is a lease." (The italics are ours.)

A further provision reads:

> "If the lessee fails to make any payments herein provided * * * then this lease shall ipso facto become immediately terminated, without any notice whatsoever to the lessee, and the lessors may take immediate possession of said property without legal proceedings," etc.

Time is declared to be of the essence of the contract.

The respondents received from the appellant a certain Grant car on the $700 payment, and credited appellant with about $475 on account thereof. A further credit for gasoline used by appellant in his work for the respondents, and a further sum of $100 due him as salary, brought the entire credits up to $624.87, leaving due, according to the claims of the respondents, a balance of $75.13 on the $700 payment, which, as above set out, became due on May 18, 1919. The action was commenced on June 8, 1919, and before any other or further defaults had accrued. Hence the entire cause of action turns upon the existence of this alleged default. It is admitted that the appellant has never paid this balance of $75.13 in cash. He claims, however, that it was fully and more than compensated by certain counter demands for salary, gasoline, hotel bills, use of his car, and extra commissions earned by the sale by him of certain pleasure cars, all aggregating several hundred dollars in excess of the amount due at the time of the alleged default. The court, on motion, struck out his defense founded thereon, and the alleged error of the court in so doing will be noticed further along.

On June 10, 1919, two days after the commencement of this action the respondents caused the property in question to be seized by the sheriff and delivered to them, and thence hitherto have held and possessed the same. On May 8, 1920, about 11 months after filing the original complaint, the respondents filed a supplemental complaint, wherein they allege a succession of defaults covering all the 11 payments that were provided to be made in the interval from June 18, 1919, to April 18, 1920, both dates inclusive, and aggregating $687.50. Upon these 11 alleged defaults, the respondents base additional claims of forfeiture. It is expressly averred in the supplemental complaint that these additional sums became due "as rental for the use of the automobile." The appellant moved the court to strike out the supplemental complaint on the grounds that the complaint showed that the lease had been terminated on June 8, 1919, and that he was not liable for rent while deprived by the owners of the use of the car. The court denied the motion and overruled a demurrer urging the same grounds. The court, over objection admitted evidence to sustain the allegations of the supplemental complaint, and instructed the jury, in its third and seventh instructions, that they must find for the respondents if said sum of $687.50, or any part thereof, was unpaid at the time of trial.

[1] In these rulings and instructions prejudicial error was committed. It is settled law in this state that a plaintiff in replevin on commencing his action must show a present right of recovery. Of a large number of authorities in support of this principle, attention may be directed to Afferbach v. McGovern, 79 Cal. 268, 21 Pac. 837, Fredericks v. Tracy, 98 Cal. 658, 33 Pac. 750, and Holly v. Heiskell, 112 Cal. 174, 44 Pac. 466. If the original complaint in this action did not show in respondents a present right of possession, the action was premature, and there was nothing to supplement. On the other hand, if the complaint did show such right of possession by reason of the alleged default, no subsequent defaults could show that fact in any greater degree. If their right to the property had then vested, it was because of the election by them, under the terms of the lease, to terminate the right of the appellant and, in fact, to terminate the lease itself. The lease is especially strong in its provisions that a default by the appellant terminates both his right and the lease itself.

It is thus seen that, although the respondents by their own act deprived the appellant of the use of the property, they nevertheless attempt, by this supplemental complaint, to charge him for the use of the auto for the many months during which they withheld such use from him. And they have sought to predicate still further forfeitures upon his default in failing to pay for such deprived use. The trial court in its instructions has gone even further, and has, in effect, charged the jury that, although they may find that the original default as to the $75.13 never occurred, still, if they find that some or any of these 11 later defaults occurred, they must find for the respondents.

[2] It needs no citation of authorities to show that a lessor cannot collect rent for the use of a chattel after he has repossessed himself of the chattel and terminated the lease. He cannot, at least in the absence of an express covenant to the contrary, withhold the chattel and still collect rent money for its use. If the respondents were not entitled to collect rent for this 11 months' period, it follows that they cannot assign the nonpayment thereof as a basis for a forfeiture. Our attention has not been drawn to any California case wherein personal property was involved which fully covers this principle. No difference, however, in this regard can be discovered between leases involving real property and those involving chattels. Each party is estopped to claim both the possession of the leased property and compensation for its use. Each, when he voluntarily terminates the lease, and, by regaining the property places it out of the power of the lessee to use it, terminates the lease for all purposes.

In Morse v. Tochterman, 21 Cal. App. 726, 132 Pac. 1055, this court uses the following language:

> "The neglect of the landlord to keep the premises in a condition suitable for the purpose for which they were rented may be treated as an eviction by the tenant and he may refuse to pay rent."

Skaggs v. Emerson, 50 Cal. 3, is referred to with approval in many of the later cases. On page 6 thereof the court says:

> "But if the averments of the answer, which were stricken out by the court below, are true, no recovery could be had upon the covenant to pay rent, since defendant had been evicted by the plaintiff from a substantial part of the demised premises. * * * As he was not liable to pay rent if the averments of the answer are true, the lease was not forfeited by reason of the nonpayment, whatever notice or demand was given or made."

Brandt v. Phillippi, 82 Cal. 640, 23 Pac. 122, Dengler v. Michelssen, 76 Cal. 125, 18 Pac. 138, and Kelley v. Long, 18 Cal. App. 159, 122 Pac. 832, are to like effect. The respondents had an election of remedies, and, having elected to repossess themselves of the property and terminate the lease, they cannot collect rent that was never earned, nor assign its nonpayment as a ground of forfeiture. This rule heaps no hardship upon respondents, since they had the use of their property during this entire period of 11 months. The contrary rule would deprive the appellant of the property and still hold him for unearned rentals. We conclude that the respondents were not entitled to rent after they took possession of the property, nor to avail themselves of alleged defaults occurring after that event. It is impossible to determine whether the jury found for the respondents by reason of these subsequent defaults or on account of the original default in failing to pay the aforesaid balance of $75.13. It seems probable, if we may be permitted to conjecture, that the verdict was based upon some of the subsequent defaults. The acts of the court in sustaining the supplemental complaint, in admitting evidence in support thereof, and in instructing the jury that it might found its verdict thereon, constitute fatal errors, for which the judgment must be reversed.

In instruction numbered 7B the court instructed the jury as follows:

> "In the letter from Mr. Weldon to Mr. Held the defendant claims a credit of $83.80 for tires for the Grant and Nash cars. When a witness in his own behalf, defendant stated that he no longer claimed such a credit. Therefore in determining the indebtedness of Mr. Salladay to the plaintiffs you should charge him with $83.80 for said tires."

The appellant insistently claimed that he was not to be charged with these tires, and at no time did he testify to the contrary. Not only is the charge erroneous for this reason, but it implies the existence of an indebtedness from the appellant to the respondents—one of the very facts in issue.

The court in one of its instructions (7D) instructed the jury as follows:

> "The defendant when on the witness stand admitted that the statement in one of his verified answers that he is now indebted to the plaintiffs in the sum of $165.12 is true," etc.

These alleged admissions are mere affirmative answers to certain questions propounded to the appellant by the attorney for the respondents in the course of the cross-examination. A careful reading of pages 90 to 94 and of page 113 of the transcript shows clearly that the appellant did not intend to be so understood. In the light of his vehement insistence that he owed nothing at all, it was an invasion of the province of the jury to charge that he owed that sum. Moreover, the charge advises the jury that this admission was made in a verified answer. The record before us does not justify this statement.

Since the case must go back for a new trial, it is proper that we notice some other points, which will probably arise in the course of the subsequent proceedings. About six weeks prior to the date of the lease the respondents hired the appellant as a salesman. The respondents insist and the court instructed that the terms of this hiring are fully shown by the following letter:

> "Santa Rosa, Cal., January 30, 1919.
> "L. O. Salladay, Ukiah, Cal.—Dear Sir: Confirming our conversation of a few days ago, please be advised that you are hereby engaged as of Feb. 1, 1919, by this company to sell trucks, tractors and such other articles as we now handle, on the following basis: Salary, $200 per month, semimonthly, with a commission of 7 per cent. on net factory price on all sales over $3,500 per month. This applies to trucks and tractors only. Other arrangements regarding pleasure cars will be made at some future date. Yours very truly, Automobile Truck, Tractor and Imp. Co., by B. M. Levy, Trustee."

[3, 4] That portion of the controversy that revolves around this contract of employment concerns certain items incurred by the appellant while in the discharge of his assigned duties for the respondents. These other items do not involve the services rendered by appellant, but are incidental thereto, such as hotel bills while traveling for respondents, use of auto, bills for gas, oil bills, and tires. It will be noticed that there is no provision or intimation in above letter that the appellant is to travel or, in fact, to discharge his duties at any place other than the one indicated in the caption of the letter. When, therefore, the respondents sent the appellant into various counties to sell goods such directions were over and above and independent of the terms contained in the letter itself. It is immaterial whether these directions involved express or implied contracts for reimbursement. In either event they constituted legitimate demands against the respondents. The respondents implied as much when they gave the appellant credit for part of the bill for gasoline and a balance of $100 due on monthly salary. The appellant sought to show that one of the respondents had testified in his deposition that they had agreed with appellant that he was to have "any expenses of going out of town, hotel bills or anything incidental to the business." The court sustained an objection to proof of this admission on the ground that no basis for impeachment had been laid. The appellant was entitled to prove this as an independent statement or admission made by a party to the suit and against his own interest, and wholly without reference to impeachment.

Another and a very important item of offset is the claim of appellant to $120 commission on the sale of one pleasure car and $175 on another. These commissions, it will be observed, are expressly reserved in the letter of employment above quoted. There seems to be no possible cavil that the appellant was entitled to offset this demand against the alleged deficit of $75.13 on the $700 payment. The appellant turned in a Grant car at $700 on the rental for the Nash car in suit. There is no dispute that he was to receive this credit, and that it was to go on the $700 payment that became due on May 18, 1919. However, the respondents claim that, while they nominally allowed him credit for the full sum of $700, they were entitled to deduct, and did deduct, therefrom various items of repairs expended on the Grant car by them. In this way, the actual credit was reduced to less than $500. The appellant filed an answer wherein he set up these various items as cross-demands or set-offs to the demand of the respondent for rent. He set up also an alleged agreement that he was to have credit for the Grant car in the full sum of $700. These defenses were all stricken out on motion of the respondents. We are at a loss to understand upon what theory this order can be sustained, and we receive no aid thereon from the respondent's brief. These various demands are sufficient in amount, if sustained by evidence, to meet and far more than compensate the demands of respondents for rent. The court repeatedly struck out or excluded evidence offered by the appellant for the purpose of proving these demands. This was in line with its policy in striking out the allegations of the answer concerning them.

[5] In this answer it is averred that some of the demands were to constitute payment on the rent, while, as to others, it is merely averred that they were contracted in favor of appellant. It is manifestly immaterial, save as to the method of proof, whether the parties expressly contracted that they were to constitute payment pro tanto, or whether they were mere contract obligations existing in favor of appellant, since in the one event they extinguish and in the other they compensate and thus extinguish the demand of respondents. The law supplies the contract that they should be so applied. There can be no dissent from the doctrine that one who owes money to another on a written or other contract may meet its demands by setting off counter obligations arising on contract and existing in his own favor. In the face of the express provisions of sections 437 and 438 of the Code of Civil Procedure allowing such counterclaims it would be idle to discuss the point. Section 440 of the same Code provides that such demands shall be deemed compensated so far as they equal each other. This in turn implies that the facts showing such compensation may be pleaded in defense. If allowed and proved, the appellant would not have been in default on his payment of $700 due before June 8, 1919, on which day this action was commenced. The order of the court in striking out these defenses was based upon the ground that they were "redundant, immaterial, repetition, and irrelevant." It may be gathered from the many rulings of the court excluding evidence offered in support of these defenses that the chief factor in the mind of the court was the contention of respondents that these defenses sought by parol to modify the terms of a written contract. But the answer did not show that the agreements set up therein were oral, nor did it, as to nearly all of them, show that they were a part of the contract of lease. So far as appears from the answer itself, these agreements were quite independent of the contract of lease. It is said, however, that the answer to the supplemental complaint contains these defenses, and that any error of the court in striking them from the answer to the complaint was thereby cured. The appellant was entitled to plead these defenses as against the cause of action set out in the complaint, which was that he had made default, in that he had not paid the deficit of $75.13 claimed as due on the $700 payment. Nor can it be said that the case was tried on the assumption or theory that these defenses were properly before the court. It is true that some testimony of the appellant himself got before the jury as to some of the defenses, but much was stricken out or otherwise excluded, and the little that was produced was uncorroborated, because the court refused to permit other witnesses to testify concerning these matters. That the trial court understood that these defenses were not before the jury is shown by the fact that it refused instructions, offered by appellant, advising the jury that they might consider them.

[6] The court committed no error in refusing to charge the jury that they might find that the alleged lease was in fact an absolute sale. The writing is plain, clear, and wholly free from ambiguity. Its terms provide for a lease and not a sale, and it is distinctly stated in the writing itself that the lessee acquired no interest in or title to the property, and that the transaction constituted a lease. In the absence of an imperfection in the writing this is conclusive.

The appellant is entitled to amend his answer to show that these counter demands exist, and that they compensated the demands of the respondent.

HOLMBERG v. CITY OF OAKLAND.
(Civ. 3907.)

1. Statutes 🔑263 — Not retrospective unless such intention clearly appears.

Statutes are not construed to be retrospective unless the intention to make them so clearly appears from their terms.

2. Municipal corporations 🔑176(3)—Charter provision for surgical aid to policemen held not retrospective.

The provision of a city charter that any policeman injured while in the performance of his duty shall be entitled to recover expenditures for medical, surgical, and hospital treatment, and that the council shall allow such officer full pay during disability, not only fails to show an intention to make it retrospective, but by the use of the future tense indicates an intention it shall be prospective only, and therefore it does not entitle a policeman to surgical expenses incurred after the provision was adopted for treatment of an injury received before such adoption.

3. Master and servant 🔑349—Compensation law in force at time of injury governs.

The general rule of construction applied to compensation laws is that the law at the time of the injury is to be taken as the measure of the right of recovery.

4. Municipal corporations 🔑187 — Aggravation since charter of injury previously received does not entitle policeman to surgical fees.

A policeman cannot recover surgical expenditures for treatment of an injury received by him before the charter provision allowing such expenditures was adopted, even though he continued to perform his duties and the injury was thereby aggravated after the adoption of the charter provision so as to render the operation necessary if such aggravation would have been caused by any walking, and did not arise peculiarly out of the performance of his duty.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Dudley Kinsell, Judge.

Action by Ernest Holmberg against the City of Oakland. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Ostrander & Carey, of Oakland, for appellant.

Leon E. Gray, City Atty., and Markell C. Baer, Deputy City Atty., both of Oakland (T. J. Ledwich, of Oakland, of counsel), for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is from a judgment in favor of the defendant in an action brought by the plaintiff to recover the sum of $358.75 alleged to be due for surgical services, hospital bills, etc., incurred and paid by the plaintiff while under treatment for injuries suffered by him while a patrolman on the police force of said city.

The date of the plaintiff's said injuries was October 3, 1914, and he continued to suffer therefrom up to and including March 16, 1920, at which date the operation was performed and the hospital and other medical bills contracted which form the basis of the present action.

The plaintiff rests his right of recovery upon the provisions of section 92½ of the city charter which reads as follows:

"Any officer or member of the police department sustaining an injury while in the performance of his duty shall be entitled to receive in addition to the benefits otherwise provided in article 14 of this charter such medical, surgical and hospital treatment, including nursing, medicines, medical and surgical supplies, crutches and apparatus, including artificial members, as may be required during the continuance of his disability, the same to be provided by the city; and the council shall allow such officer or member so injured full pay during the continuance of his disability, or until such time as he may be retired on a pension."

The defendant resists the plaintiff's claim upon the sole ground that the foregoing section of the city charter was enacted and went into effect on January 18, 1919, and that said section of the charter is not retroactive so as to be given application to injuries sustained prior to the said date when it became effective.

[1] We are entirely satisfied that this contention must be sustained. It is a well-settled rule of this and many other states that legislative acts are not to be considered retrospective unless the intention to make them so clearly appears from their terms. Willcox v. Edwards, 162 Cal. 460, 123 Pac. 276, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 1392; Vanderbilt v. All Persons, 163 Cal. 507, 126 Pac. 158; Gurnee v. Superior Court, 58 Cal. 88. The authorities on this subject are thus summed up in the Encyclopedia of Law and Procedure:

> "It is a rule of statutory construction that all statutes are to be construed as having only a prospective operation, unless the purpose and intent of the Legislature to give them a retrospective effect is expressly declared, or is necessarily implied from the language used. In every case of doubt the doubt must be solved against the retrospective effect." 36 Cyc. 1205.

[2, 3] When we look to the terms of the foregoing section of the charter upon which appellant relies we find, not only that retrospection is not expressed in its terms, but, on the contrary, its use of the future tense imports that it was only intended to apply to conditions and remedies arising after the date of its adoption. This conclusion is further enforced by the construction which has been quite uniformly applied to compensation laws, which is to the effect that the state of the law at the time of the injury is to be taken as the measure of the right of recovery of the injured person. It was so held by our Supreme Court in the case of Hyman Bros. B. & L. Co. v. Industrial Accident Comm., 180 Cal. 423, 181 Pac. 784, and the rule therein stated follows in the line of the general authority in other jurisdictions (Arizona, etc., Co. v. Clark, 207 Fed. 817, 125 C. C. A. 305; Soderstrom v. Curry, 143 Minn. 154, 173 N. W. 649; Schmidt v. O. K. Bak. Co., 90 Conn. 217, 96 Atl. 963; Baur v. Court of Com. Pleas, 88 N. J. Law, 128, 95 Atl. 627; Diebeikis v. Link Belt Co., 104 N. E. 211).

[4] The appellant further contends that while his original injury was admittedly sustained prior to the enactment of the section in question, his injuries thus suffered, and by which his right knee was affected, were aggravated by the use of his injured limb in the continued performance of his duties as a patrolman, and that the operation for the recovery of the expense of which he brings this action was necessitated by this aggravation of his original injury, and that such operation was performed after the taking effect of the foregoing section of the charter. It must be conceded by the appellant that his affliction, however long continued and however aggravated by the ordinary use of his limb in walking, whether as a patrolman or otherwise, is referrable to the original injury to his knee, and is in no sense a new and independent injury—such an outcome and consequence as would have followed had the appellant not been a patrolman, but had been using his limb in the ordinary exercise of walking. It was therefore such an aggravation of his injury as did not arise peculiarly out of the performance of his official duty. This being so, the continuance and even increase of his disability with the resultant operation must be held to be referrable to the original injury sustained by him on October 3, 1914, over four years before the section of the charter in question went into effect. Such section not being retrospective, it follows that the appellant was not entitled to the relief which he seeks in this action by virtue of its terms.

GUMILLA et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF STATE OF CALIFORNIA et al. (S. F. 10090.)

1. Certiorari ⚷16—Only final adjudications reviewable.

A writ of certiorari does not lie to review an order made in a matter prior to the final adjudication thereof.

2. Master and servant ⚷417(3¼)—Certiorari will not lie to review order granting rehearing in compensation case.

In a proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act, where the Industrial Commission, after awarding compensation, made an order granting a rehearing on petition allowed to be filed nunc pro tunc, such order was not reviewable on certiorari until after final decision of the case on the rehearing.

In Bank.

Application for certiorari to review and annul an order of Industrial Accident Commission.

Proceedings under Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 831) by Elias Gumilla and others for compensation for the death of Miguel Gumilla, opposed by California & Hawaiian Sugar Refining Company, employer, and others. Award made by the Industrial Accident Commission. Application by employer for rehearing granted, and petitioners bring certiorari. Writ denied.

Russell P. Tyler, of San Francisco, for petitioners.

A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

SHAW, C. J. On August 26, 1921, the Industrial Accident Commission made an award in favor of the petitioners herein allowing them compensation as dependents of one Miguel Gumilla, on account of the death of said Gumilla from an injury received by him while in the employment of the California & Hawaiian Sugar Refining Company. Notice of this award was served upon the adverse parties on the same day. The time for filing a petition for rehearing by the adverse parties expired on September 16, 1921. No petition was filed within that time, but on September 20, 1921, the said adverse parties filed with the industrial Accident Commission a petition for a rehearing of the award made on August 26th aforesaid. Thereafter, on November 16, 1921, an affidavit was filed on behalf of said parties in effect showing that the failure to file the said petition for rehearing in time was the result of the inadvertence or neglect of their attorney. Thereupon, on November 19, 1921, the Industrial Accident Commission made an order declaring that the failure to file the petition within the 20 days allowed by the law was the result of inadvertence, surprise, and excusable neglect sufficient to excuse the failure, and thereupon it made an order as follows:

> "It is ordered that the petition for rehearing be, and it is hereby, ordered filed nunc pro tunc as of September 16, 1921."

At the same time the Industrial Accident Commission made an order granting the application for a rehearing, and ordered the case to be submitted on the testimony already taken without further hearing. No decision of the matter on such submission has been made, and the matter is still pending. The matter now before the court is the petition of Elias Gumilla and Paulina Gumilla to review and annul the order of the Industrial Accident Commission granting a rehearing, and that this court thereupon order that the findings and award originally made are final.

[1, 2] A writ of certiorari does not lie to review an order made in a matter prior to the final adjudication thereof. The Industrial Accident Commission proposes to decide the case again after the order granting the rehearing, but it has not yet done so. Final action thereon has not yet been taken. Under these circumstances, the application for a writ of review of the order granting a rehearing is premature. Holabird v. R. R. Comm., 171 Cal. 691, 154 Pac. 831; Gauld v. Board, 122 Cal. 18, 54 Pac. 272. The petitioners' remedy in such a case is to await the final decision and ask for a rehearing of the matter. This, of course, will search the record for lack of jurisdiction, and, if there is such lack anywhere down the line which deprives the Industrial Accident Commission of jurisdiction to make the final decision, the proceedings will be annulled so far as may be necessary to give the petitioners appropriate relief. But until such final decision of the Commission we cannot consider the validity of the order granting the rehearing in this manner.

It may be that effectual relief could be given by this court or the District Court of Appeal under its general jurisdiction by means of a petition for a writ of prohibition. As the question is not before us, we express no opinion on that subject.

For the reasons above set forth, the petition for a writ of review is denied.

1. Licenses 🔑16(11)—Ordinance forbidding sale of secondhand "goods, wares, and merchandise" without a permit construed to apply to books.

Under a city ordinance forbidding the sale of secondhand goods, wares, and merchandise without a permit from the board of police commissioners, a sale of secondhand books without such permit is illegal, as they must be considered included in the terms "goods, wares, and merchandise," which mean the objects of commerce; whatever is usually bought and sold in trade or market, or by merchants; wares, goods, or commodities.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Goods.]

2. Licenses 🔑7(1)—Ordinance requiring dealer in secondhand books to get permit not an unreasonable exercise of police power.

Under Const. art. 11, § 11, granting power to municipalities to make and enforce all such local, police, sanitary, and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws, an ordinance requiring a dealer in secondhand books to get a permit from the board of police commissioners before engaging in business is not unconstitutional as an unreasonable and improper exercise of the police power.

3. Municipal corporations 🔑591—Ordinance giving board of police commissioners unqualified power to grant or refuse permits to trade in secondhand goods held constitutional.

An ordinance conferring on the board of police commissioners unqualified power to grant or refuse permits to trade in secondhand goods is not unconstitutional as an attempt to confer arbitrary power since it is not to be assumed that the board in the exercise of the power so granted will act arbitrarily or otherwise than in the exercise of a sound discretion.

Wilbur, J., dissenting in part.

In Bank.

Application for writ of habeas corpus by Harold Holmes to be directed to the sheriff of the City and County of San Francisco to secure the release of petitioner from custody. Writ dismissed.

F. D. Brandon and R. P. Henshall, both of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Matthew Brady, Dist. Atty., and I. M. Golden, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of San Francisco (Jos. A. Pritchard, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The petitioner herein applied for and was granted a writ of habeas corpus by which he sought to have determined the legality of his arrest and detention upon a complaint filed in the police court of the city and county of San Francisco charging him with having engaged in the business of buying, selling, and exchanging secondhand books in said city and county of San Francisco without having obtained a municipal license so to do, and in violation of the provisions of section 63 of Ordinance No. 5132 of said city and county, requiring such license, and of his conviction and imprisonment under said charge.

Upon the hearing of said application it was stipulated that the complaint upon which the petitioner was arrested and convicted sufficiently charged the commission of the act alleged therein as constituting said offense, thus leaving as the only matters for our determination the construction of the provisions of the charter of said municipality under the terms of which the ordinance under which the petitioner was convicted was drawn, and of the said ordinance for the alleged violation of which such conviction was had.

In article II, chapter II, section 15, of the charter of San Francisco, it is provided that the board of supervisors shall have power:

"15. To impose license taxes and to provide for the collection thereof; but no license taxes shall be imposed upon any person who, at any fixed place of business in the city and county, sells or manufactures goods, wares, or merchandise, except such as require permits from the board of police commissioners as provided in this charter."

In article VIII, chapter III, section 9, of said charter, it is provided that the board of police commissioners shall have power:

"9. To grant or refuse to grant permits to any person engaged or desiring to engage in business as pawnbroker, peddler, junkshop keeper, dealer in secondhand merchandise, * * * and such other characters of business or callings as may hereafter be required by ordinance enacted by the board of supervisors to obtain permits from this board."

In article VIII, chapter IV, section 7, of said charter, it is provided that:

"7. The chief of police shall possess powers of general police inspection, supervision and control over all pawnbrokers, peddlers, junkshop keepers, dealers in secondhand merchandise, auctioneers and intelligence office keepers. All persons engaged in said callings must first procure permits from the commissioners."

On July 1, 1920, the board of supervisors of said municipality adopted an ordinance entitled, "License Ordinance No. 5132, New Series," imposing license taxes on certain businesses, callings, trades, or employments within the city and county of San Francisco.

"Secondhand Goods.

"Sec. 63. Every person, firm or corporation engaged in the business of buying, selling or exchanging secondhand goods, such as provisions, goods, wares, merchandise, medicines, drugs, jewelry, precious metals or wares, shall (after securing a quarterly permit from the board of police commissioners to carry on the business), pay a license of twenty-five (25) dollars per quarter."

It was under the foregoing ordinance, and for the alleged violation thereof, that this petitioner was arrested, convicted and confined. It is his contention that as a person engaged in the business of dealing in secondhand books he does not come within the terms of said ordinance, and hence could not legally be made the subject of conviction thereunder. He makes the further contention that the business of a dealer in secondhand books is not such a business as requires regulation under the police power of the municipality, or the application for an issuance of permits as a condition precedent to the right to conduct such business; and, finally, the petitioner contends that the grant of power to the police commission to issue or deny permits to conduct such business is illegal as conferring arbitrary powers upon said board.

[1] The appellant's first above contention involves an inquiry as to the meaning of the words "goods, wares, and merchandise" as employed in the several sections of the charter of San Francisco above quoted, and as to the scope and meaning of the same term as found in the ordinance under the provisions of which the petitioner was convicted and confined. The appellant's first contention is that the words "goods, wares, and merchandise" as used in the sections of the charter and of the ordinance above set forth are not to be construed either singly or collectively as including books. This contention cannot be sustained. The word "goods" is defined in Webster's New International Dictionary as "movables; household furniture; personal or movable estate; wares; merchandise; commodities bought and sold by merchants and traders." The earliest definition of the word "goods" is to be found in Bailery's Large Dictionary, issued in 1732, which defines it as "merchandise." Samuel Johnson, the next English lexicographer, defined "goods" as "movables in a house; wares; freight; merchandise." The term "wares" is also defined in the dictionaries as a synonym of "merchandise," while the term "merchandise," is defined by Webster and the other lexicographers as "the objects of commerce; whatever is usually bought and sold in trade, or market, or by merchants; wares, goods, commodities." In the case of Blackwood v. Cutting Packing Co., 76 Cal. 212, 18 Pac. 248, 9 Am. St. Rep. 199, in construing the meaning of the word "merchandise," as used in section 1768 of the Civil Code, stated that it "covers all kinds of personal property which is bought and sold in the market." The term "merchandise" as used in acts and ordinances relating to taxation has been construed to cover all kinds of personal property. Loeber v. Leininger, 175 Ill. 487, 51 N. E. 703; Wynne v. City of Eastman, 105 Ga. 614, 31 S. E. 737; City of Pittsburg v. Kalchthaler, 114 Pa. 547, 7 Atl. 921. The phrase "goods, wares and merchandise" when thus used in conjunction have been given an even more inclusive meaning, since it is stated in Cyc. under that title that "these words are constantly used in legal and common parlance to distinguish whatever species of property is not embraced in the phrase lands, tenements and hereditaments." Cases almost without number might be cited as embracing and approving these general definitions of these words. The following may be referred to as bringing these definitions somewhat nearer to the particular form of personal property involved in this proceeding: In the case of Smith v. Wilcox, 24 N. Y. 353, 82 Am. Dec. 302, it was held that the words "goods, wares, and merchandise," as used in a statute prohibiting the sale of "goods, wares, and merchandise" on Sunday, included the sale of newspapers on that day, while in the case of Commonwealth v. Nax, 54 Va. 789, it was held that a dealer in published music was bound to obtain a license under a statute requiring merchants selling at any store or place "any goods, wares, and merchandise" to take out such license, the court saying that this phrase as used in the statute was "applicable to the kinds of merchandise to be found exhibited for sale in the store of every bookseller and stationer in the country." The case of Eastman v. City of Chicago, 79 Ill. 178, relied upon by the petitioner, does not militate against the foregoing cases, for the reason that in that case it appeared that the dealer was generally engaged in the business of selling legal blanks, stereoscopes, engravings, paintings, and children's toys and games, and, incidental thereto, had for sale a few rare and old imported books which were rather to be classed with paintings or works of art than as secondhand books, in the sense in which that term is usually understood; while in the case at bar it is stipulated that the petitioner is engaged in the business of buying, selling, and exchanging secondhand books, not as a mere incident to some other occupation, but as his principal business.

It is needless to pursue the subject further than to say that, if the construction to be placed upon the phrase "goods, wares, and merchandise" as contended by the petitioner were to be adopted, dealers in books would be generally exempted from taxation under the common form of assessment of "goods" or of "goods, wares, and merchandise" contained in their stores.

[2] Appellant's next contention is that the business of dealing in secondhand books is not such a business as requires or should be subjected to regulation under the police powers of the municipality, and hence that the requirement that such persons shall procure permits from the board of police commissioners before engaging in such business is an unwarranted and illegal regulation. This contention is also, in our opinion, without merit. Secondhand goods, wares, and merchandise have always been deemed the proper subjects of police regulation by municipalities. See "Constitutional Law," 8 Cyc. 875, and cases cited. And the grant by the Constitution in article 11, § 11, thereof, to municipalities "may make and enforce * * * all such local, police, sanitary, and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws," is very broad and liberal. The business of buying and selling secondhand books cannot be differentiated from the business of buying and selling other forms of secondhand personal property which, being movable, valuable, and passing easily from hand to hand, are often made the subject of purloining and petit larceny and of disposal in secondhand places of business. Such places of business have therefore been made the proper subjects of police inspection and regulation. It is a matter of common knowledge that public libraries all over the country are continually subjected to the depletion of their shelves through loss of books which find their destination in secondhand stores, and that precautions against such loss may be observed in the equipment and administration of every well-appointed public library in the land. It cannot be said, therefore, that the requirement in section 7 of the charter, above quoted, that "the chief of police shall possess powers of general inspection, supervision, and control over all * * * dealers in secondhand merchandise," and that "all persons engaged in said callings must first procure permits from the commission," is an unreasonable form of regulation. This subject might be pursued into the domain of health regulation, since it may be said to be also a matter of common knowledge that books, magazines, and like publications which pass through many hands, and perchance through many households, have frequently been found the prolific carriers of infectious diseases. For both of the foregoing reasons we hold that the subjection of dealers in secondhand books to police regulation to the extent of requiring such persons to procure permits as a prerequisite to engaging in the business of selling such secondhand merchandise is a proper and reasonable regulation.

[3] The petitioner's next contention is that the investment of the board of police commissioners with the general and unqualified power to grant or refuse permits to dealers in secondhand merchandise, as contained in the provisions of the charter above quoted, is unconstitutional as an attempt to confer arbitrary power upon that body to grant or refuse permits at their whim or pleasure. The best answer to that contention is to be found in Dillon on Municipal Corporations (5th Ed.) p. 937, wherein the learned author says:

> "Many cases are to be found sustaining ordinances prohibiting acts, or even the following of trades or occupations, without procuring permits which may be issued at the discretion of the council, mayor, or some other city officer or department, and the fact that the dispensing power was apparently conferred without restraint or qualification has been regarded as arising merely from the difficulty of defining in advance upon what conditions the permit shall be given or the dispensing power exercised. It has been said that it is not to be assumed that the council or officer, in exercising the dispensing power, will act arbitrarily, or otherwise than in the exercise of a sound discretion."

The appellant, however, insist that this court has decided in the case of In re Dart, 172 Cal. 47, 155 Pac. 63, L. R. A. 1916D, 905, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 1127, that the grant of arbitrary power to municipal boards or officials to grant or refuse permits is void. It is to be noted, however, that whatever was said in that case with respect to the grant of such powers had reference to the facts of that particular case, and that this court, in the case of Gaylord v. City of Pasadena, 175 Cal. 433, 166 Pac. 348, pointed out that the Dart Case dealt with the control of charitable institutions and charities, and that the decision in that case went not alone to the unreasonable and arbitrary grant of power conferred by ordinance upon a charity commission, but to the fundamental proposition that the city council of Los Angeles had empowered this board to do acts which the city council itself, the source of power, could not legally do. In both of the foregoing cases the earlier decisons of this court are cited and distinguished as having relation to things which in their nature are, or may be, injurious to public health, safety, comfort, or welfare. The cases of Ex parte Fiske, 72 Cal. 125, 13 Pac. 310, and In re Flaherty, 105 Cal. 558, 38 Pac. 981, 27 L. R. A. 529, are referred to particularly in the concurring opinion of Mr. Justice Shaw, as upholding the view that, as to those kinds of occupations or businesses which are the proper subjects of police surveillance and regulation, the delegation of power to municipal boards or officials to grant or refuse permits will be sustained. In Gaylord v. City of Pasadena, supra, the court quotes approvingly from the case of In re Flaherty, supra, these words:

> "Laws are not made upon the theory of the total depravity of those who are elected to administer them; and the presumption is that municipal officers will not use these small powers villainously or for purposes of oppression or mischief."

If this petitioner had applied for a permit under the requirement of the section of the charter above quoted, and been either whimsically or arbitrarily refused such permit, he might then, as is shown in Gaylord v. City of Pasadena, supra, have had recourse to the courts for relief from such unjust and arbitrary action.

The appellant's final contention, that secondhand book dealers ought not now to be required to obtain permits and pay licenses because they have not heretofore been required to do so during the years that have passed since the charter of San Francisco went into effect, is not worthy of serious consideration.

Writ dismissed, and petitioner remanded.

SHAW, C. J., and LENNON, WASTE, SHURTLEFF, and SLOANE, JJ., and RICHARDS, Judge pro tem., concur.

WILBUR, J. I concur in the judgment. The sole question in this case is the validity of the ordinance imposing a license tax upon the petitioner's business. It is conceded that under the general power of taxation this might be done. It is contended, however, that, under the provisions of the charter of San Francisco, that power is expressly taken away from the board of supervisors. This question turns upon the provisions of the charter concerning a permit. If the business is one requiring a permit, it is taxable; if not, it cannot be taxed. As shown in the main opinion, the business in question is one for which, under the provisions of the charter, a permit may be required. It follows that the business is properly subject to a license tax. Whether or not the provisions of the charter or ordinances passed in pursuance thereof requiring a permit are valid as an exercise of the regulatory power over such business vested by the Constitution and charter in the city government is not involved in this case. The use of the term "permit" in the charter is of no significance in the case at bar except in so far as it describes the character of business he is conducting. What is said in the main opinion concerning the propriety of requiring a permit and vesting the power to grant or withhold the same in the sound discretion of some municipal officer or body is immaterial. It is for that reason that I do not concur in the main opinion. The rules with reference to the authority of municipalities to grant or withhold permits are thoroughly established in this state and need not be discussed. I do not think that under these rules the arbitrary power to grant or withhold permits for the conduct of the business of a secondhand bookstore can exist. As the point is not involved in the case, and the law is well settled, I deem it unnecessary to say more upon this subject, and have only said this much in order to indicate my reason for not fully concurring in the main opinion.

UTAH CONST. CO. v. RICHARDSON, State Treasurer. (S. F. 9324.)

1. Constitutional law 🔑62—Taxation 🔑365—Power properly delegated to state board of equalization to value of franchise assessment of franchise tax not invalid for absence of legislative rule prescribing method of ascertaining value under mandate of Constitution.

Const. art. 13, § 14, providing that franchises shall be assessed at their actual cash value "in the manner to be provided by law," was complied with by St. 1911, pp. 530, 541, which provided for the furnishing to the state board of equalization of information enabling it to ascertain the value of franchises, and committed to the board the selection of the method of ascertaining the value of the total assets and tangible property of corporations.

2. Taxation 🔑319(2)—Evidence too indefinite to overcome presumption of proper assessment by board.

In an action to recover franchise taxes paid under protest, evidence held not to overcome presumption of Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 15, that the board had properly performed its official duty in assessing the tax.

3. Taxation 🔑319(2)—In absence of evidence that assessment of franchise was made by fraud or improper method, court will not consider complaint of excessiveness.

Where there is an absence of evidence that assessments of franchises were fraudulently or mistakenly made, or that an improper method of valuation was used, the court will not consider the complaint that the taxes were excessive.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Actions by the Utah Construction Company, a corporation, against Friend William Richardson, State Treasurer. From judgments for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

B. M. Aikins, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Frank L. Guerena, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

LENNON, J. The Utah Construction Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the state of Utah and transacting business in Utah, California, and elsewhere, appeals from judgments rendered against it in two actions instituted by the said corporation against the treasurer of the state of California for the recovery of taxes paid to the state under protest in the fiscal years 1914–1915 and 1915–1916. The taxes were paid pursuant to assessments made by the state board of equalization, and are, respectively, $4,000 and $2,268 in amount. With the exception of dates and figures, the pleadings, evidence, and findings in the two cases are practically the same, and by stipulation the evidence and judgment roll in both cases are before this court in a single transcript.

[1] Section 14 of article 13 of the state Constitution, pertaining to taxation, is a new section adopted in November, 1910. The pertinent portion of this section reads as follows:

> "(d) All franchises, other than those expressly provided for in this section, shall be assessed at their actual cash value, in the manner to be provided by law, and shall be taxed at the rate of one per centum each year, and the taxes collected thereon shall be exclusively for the benefit of the state." (Italics ours.)

The italicized words afford the basis for the attack in the instant case, for appellant contends that legislative regulation of the manner of making an assessment is a prerequisite to a valid assessment when the Constitution requires such legislation (McHenry v. Downer, 116 Cal. 20, 47 Pac. 779, 45 L. R. A. 737); that the Legislature failed to prescribe the manner in which franchises were to be assessed; and therefore that the state board of equalization was without authority to assess appellant's franchise. Whether or not there has been a compliance with the constitutional requirement in this respect is the first question for consideration.

In a statute expressly enacted for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of section 14, art. 13, of the state Constitution, the Legislature has, among other things, provided for the furnishing to the state board of equalization of information deemed important in ascertaining the value of franchises, that the board shall determine the value of the franchises from the information thus supplied, and that the apportionment of taxes shall be based upon the value obtained. Stats. 1911, pp. 530, 541. Consequently in so far as the prescribing of the "manner" in which assessments are to be made imports the regulation of details of administration, the Legislature has left little to be desired in its compliance with the constitutional mandate that such administrative machinery for making assessments be provided by law. Therefore appellant necessarily takes the position that the expression quoted from the Constitution refers not only to the general procedure for assessing franchises, but that the term "manner" also signifies the rule to be followed by the board in determining the value of the franchises, or, in other words, that the Constitution places upon the Legislature the duty of specifying the weight to be accorded the various facts required to be reported and the mathematical process to be adopted by the board in arriving at a valuation of a franchise from the information before it.

In this connection it must be noted that this court held, in the case of Miller & Lux v. Richardson, 182 Cal. 115, 127, 187 Pac. 411, 415, that—

> "When the Constitution, in article 13, § 14, subd. (d), provides for the assessment and taxation of corporate franchises, it means the so-called corporate excess, although such is not the usual, nor, strictly speaking, a proper, use of the word 'franchise.'"

"Corporate excess" is defined in the case cited as—

> "The difference between the value of its [the corporation's] outstanding stocks and bonds as determined by market quotations, the earnings of the company, or otherwise, and the value of its tangible or physical properties. The theory is that the value of the company's outstanding stocks and bonds represents the value of its total assets, so that the difference between this total and the value of the company's physical properties represents the value of the company's intangible assets, and an assessment of the corporate excess, that is, of this difference, is an assessment of all the company's so-called intangibles." Miller & Lux v. Richardson, 182 Cal. 115, 117, 187 Pac. 411.

It follows from this decision that, by the very use of the word "franchises," the Constitution itself dictates, in a measure, the process to be pursued by the board of equalization in estimating the value of the property to be taxed. The Constitution itself further provides that the franchises shall be taxed at their actual cash value. The scope of appellant's attack is therefore confined to the single point that the Legislature has failed to select and prescribe a particular rule for appraising the total assets and the tangible property of the corporations—items which must be considered in ascertaining the "corporate excess."

The Legislature has provided for the filing by the owner or holder of every taxable franchise of a written report containing detailed information concerning capital stock, bonds, debts, property, and other matters which the Legislature evidently regarded as essential to a proper assessment of the value of franchises. Stats. 1911, pp. 530, 541. No attempt was made to direct the board of equalization as to how it should employ such information in arriving at the value of the total assets and tangible property of the corporations; the selection of the method calculated to lead to the most accurate valuation was left to the discretion of the said board. As a general rule, it is not essential that the Legislature prescribe the method of valuation to be employed, but it may delegate to its taxing officers the power to adopt a suitable method, and, in the latter case, the assessors must value the property according to their best judgment and with honest purpose.

Western Union Tel. Co. v. Missouri, 190 U. S. 412, 425, 23 Sup. Ct. 730, 733, 47 L. Ed. 1116; Mexican Petroleum Corporation v. Bliss (R. I.) 110 Atl. 867, 871; 1 Cooley on Taxation (3d Ed.) p. 754. The general requirement in the state Constitution that the Legislature fix the "manner" in which the assessment is to be made does not limit the power of the Legislature to invest the taxing board with the right to choose a rule of valuation. This question was passed upon in State v. Wells Fargo & Co., 38 Nev. 505, 150 Pac. 836, where the state Constitution provided:

> "The Legislature shall provide by law for a uniform and equal rate of assessment and taxation, and shall prescribe such regulations as shall secure a just valuation for taxation of all property, real, personal, and possessory. * * *"

The court said:

> "It is further contended, however, that the Legislature has failed to adopt any rule or regulation governing the manner of determining the value of the intangible property of the appellant corporation, and without such rule or regulation having been prescribed by the Legislature, the revenue officers of the state are unauthorized to make an assessment. We think this objection sufficiently answered by the decision of this court in State v. Cent. Pacif. R. R. Co., 10 Nev. 47, 63. This court, speaking through Beatty, J., said: 'No principle of valuation of property for purposes of taxation is prescribed by the laws of this state. The statutes define the different species of property, and provide that every species shall be assessed at its "actual cash value." But, as to the mode of ascertaining the cash value, our law is silent. No subsidiary principles of valuation are laid down to guide the owner in making his statement in those cases where he is required to specify values; and the assessor is left equally unrestricted in making his estimates. It follows that owners and assessors must be guided by those general principles which everywhere determine the valuation of property, independently of statutory rules.'"

In Commercial Electric Light & Power Co. v. Judson, 21 Wash. 49, 56 Pac. 829, 57 L. R. A. 78, it was held that the taxing authorities had power to assess property in the absence of the adoption of any rule of valuation by the Legislature, although the Constitution required that property "shall be taxed in proportion to its value to be ascertained as provided by law." Bearing in mind that these holdings were under state Constitutions which required that the Legislature "shall prescribe such regulations as shall secure a just valuation," or that the "value" is "to be ascertained as provided by law," there can be no doubt that, under the less specific provision of our own Constitution to the effect that the assessment shall be made "in the manner to be provided by law," it was permissible for the Legislature to commit to the board of equalization the duty of selecting the mode of ascertaining the cash value of the different elements dealt with in determining corporate excess instead of requiring the board to compute assessments according to a value finding rule prescribed by the Legislature.

[2] Appellant next contends that the proceedings whereby the taxes in question were imposed were void, for the reason that there was no assessment, that is, no actual valuation, of appellant's franchise. It is claimed that, instead of ascertaining the cash value of the franchise from the data before it, the board of equalization first estimated the amount of the tax which the members considered the corporation should pay, and then some clerk figured out an assessment which would yield a tax equal to the desired amount. This contention is based upon the testimony of the secretary of the board of equalization to the effect that the members of the board determine the amount of the tax and indorse this on the back of the corporation's franchise tax return, and that afterwards some clerk "will figure the assessment, whatever it may be, from the tax." The secretary further testified, however, that he was seldom present when the members of the board were assessing franchises, and that he was not present when appellant's franchise was assessed in 1914. There was no evidence as to whether or not he was present at the 1915 assessment. Only one person who was present when the franchise was assessed was called as a witness. He was a member of the board, and not a single question was asked of him as to what method the board had followed in fixing the amount of the tax, or as to whether or not the franchise had been valued by the board and the amount of the tax determined in accordance with the value thus arrived at. He was questioned merely as to what evidence was before the board when the assessments were made, and he testified that the board had before it appellant's franchise tax returns. Nowhere in the record is there any evidence concerning the method followed by the board in arriving at the amount of the tax.

It is a rule applicable to assessors and to boards having assessing powers that it is presumed that the assessing officers have properly performed the duties intrusted to them, and, consequently, that their assessments are both regularly and correctly made. Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 15; Reclamation Dist. v. Wilcox, 75 Cal. 443, 17 Pac. 241; In re Oklahoma Gas & Electric Co. (Okl.) 171 Pac. 26. The secretary was not present when the 1914 assessment was made, and, in all probability, was absent when the franchise was assessed in 1915. Moreover, even conceding that he was qualified to testify as to what was done by the board, he did not testify as to the manner in which the board arrived at the "amount of the tax" which was indorsed on the franchise tax returns, and it must therefore be presumed that the board determined this amount in the only legitimate way, that is, by first ascertaining the value of the franchise. Nor does this interpretation of the testimony fail to account for the fact that it was customary for a clerk to figure the assessment from the amount of the tax, for the board may have adopted this means of verifying or checking up its own calculations in computing the amount of the tax upon the assessed value of the franchise. At any rate, the state was not required to prove that the board did, in fact, base the tax upon the value of the franchise; the burden of showing the contrary rested upon appellant, and the only evidence adduced in this connection, namely, the testimony of the secretary of the board, was too indefinite and unsubstantial to overcome the presumption that the board had properly performed its official duties.

[3] Inasmuch as there is not a particle of evidence that the assessments were fraudulently or mistakenly made, or that an improper method of valuation was pursued, we cannot consider appellant's complaint that the taxes were excessive. Miller & Lux v. Richardson, 182 Cal. 115, 128, 187 Pac. 411.

The judgments are affirmed.

JULIUS LEVIN CO. v. SHERWOOD & SHERWOOD. (Civ. 3752.)

New trial ⚷170—On retrial of issue of damages only court erred in reversing findings and judgment on every issue.

Since an order limiting the scope of a motion for new trial to a specified issue opens for examination only that issue, and the determination of the other issues remains in the record, and cannot be retried, the court, on resubmission of a cause on evidence confined, by its order, strictly to the question of damages, erred in finding against plaintiff on every issue it had formerly found in its favor, and in rendering judgment directly the reverse of that rendered in the first trial, even though the action itself was for damages; the trial court's power to change its findings at any time before the entry of judgment being inapplicable.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by the Julius Levin Company against Sherwood & Sherwood, a corporation. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Louis H. Brownstone, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Goodfellow, Eells, Moore & Orrick and Geo. K. Ford, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from the judgment in favor of the defendant.

The plaintiff commenced this action against the defendant to cover damages for a breach of contract. In its complaint, after setting forth the corporate character of the respective parties, it was alleged that on the 28th day of February, 1916, a contract was made between the plaintiff and the defendant whereby the defendant sold and the plaintiff purchased 750 cases of whisky, which the defendant failed to deliver, whereby the plaintiff was damaged in the sum of $2,179.50, the difference between the sale price of said whisky and the market value thereof when delivery should have been made. The defendant in its answer denied having made or entered into any such contract, and admitted that it had not delivered the whisky referred to in the plaintiff's complaint. The defendant then proceeded in a separate answer to set up a special defense, which was to the effect that it was the San Francisco agent of John Dewar & Sons, Limited, of Perth, Scotland, and that as such agent, and not otherwise, it had received an order from the plaintiffs for 750 cases of the whisky of said firm, which order was entirely subject to the approval and confirmation of said foreign firm; that previous to the receipt of such order the defendant had notified the plaintiff that said firm of Dewar & Sons had advanced the prices of all its liquors owing to unsettled war conditions, and that said plaintiff with such knowledge gave its said order; that shortly thereafter the said defendant had received a circular from said firm to the effect that it could only execute orders on the condition that the prices chargeable therefor would be those current at the date of the filling of the order; that said plaintiff was made aware of the contents of said circular, and had thereafter requested the postponement of the shipment of the goods in question to the month of November, 1916; that subsequently when the said goods arrived in San Francisco the defendant notified the plaintiff of their arrival and requested plaintiff to take delivery thereof and to pay therefor the advanced price of $4,581.50 required by said foreign firm. This the plaintiff refused to do, but offered to pay the defendant for said goods the former price of $4,105.50, claiming that this was the price agreed upon and was the only amount due as the purchase price of said goods; that defendant refused to deliver said goods at said last-named price. The defendant follows these averments with certain denials having reference to the market price of the goods in question at the time their delivery was to have been made. In a subsequent amendment to its answer the defendant amplifies somewhat its denials as to the market value of the goods in question by specifically denying that the market value of the goods at the time when delivery was to be made above the alleged purchase price thereof was the sum of $2,179.50, as alleged by the plaintiff, or was any sum in excess of the sum of $476.

The cause went to trial upon the pleadings as thus presented. Upon its submission the trial court made its findings of fact and conclusions of law. By its said findings of fact the court specifically found in favor of the plaintiff upon all of the allegations of its said complaint and found that by reason thereof the plaintiff had been damaged in the sum of $1,278.49. The court then proceeded to make certain findings upon the averments of the defendant's answer, but in respect thereto expressly found that at the time the plaintiff placed its order for the goods in question with the defendant the said defendant did not inform the plaintiff as to the uncertainty in prices of the goods ordered nor the attitude and action of Dewar & Sons as to the prices to be charged upon the filling of such orders. The court concluded its said findings with the express finding "that the transaction between the plaintiff and the defendant was one of purchase and sale, that the minds of the parties met in the contract, and that the plaintiff acted in perfect good faith in all things in connection with said order." As a conclusion of law from its aforesaid findings of fact the court found that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment against the defendant for the sum of $1,278.49, together with its costs. Judgment was accordingly entered in the plaintiff's favor for said sum. Thereafter the defendant moved for a new trial upon all of the grounds permitted by the Code, including the ground that the damages awarded by said judgment were excessive. Upon the submission of this motion the court made and entered the following order:

> "It is ordered that said defendant's motion be, and the same is hereby, granted on the issue of damages."

The case thereafter came on for trial, at the opening of which counsel for plaintiff made the following statement:

> "I call the court's attention to the fact that this is the second trial of this case, and that when a new trial is granted herein on the issue of damages the testimony will therefore be confined to that issue."

In this statement the court and counsel for the defendant evidently acquiesced. The plaintiff thereupon called one witness, who testified that the difference between the cost of the goods according to the plaintiff's claim and the market value at the time of delivery was $1,837.01. The plaintiff thereupon rested, whereupon the defendant called one witness, who testified that the difference between the cost of the goods according to the plaintiff's claim and the market value at the time of delivery was $476. The matter was thereupon submitted and taken under advisement by the court.

Some time later the court made and filed an entirely new set of findings, wherein every issue in the case formerly found in favor of the plaintiff was found in favor of the defendant, and as a conclusion of law therefrom the court found:

> "That the minds of the parties never met, and that there was no contract made between the parties in the above-entitled action. Let judgment be entered accordingly for the defendant."

The judgment was accordingly so entered, and from that judgment the plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

The sole question presented upon this appeal is as to the effect of the order of the trial court in granting the defendant's motion for a new trial "upon the issue of damages." Whatever of uncertainty there might have been in the form and as to the scope of this order would seem to have been entirely removed by the construction which the parties to the action and the trial court itself placed upon it by their action and conduct at the time of the second trial of the case. The order in question was treated as an order limiting the second trial of the cause to the single issue as to the amount which the plaintiff was entitled to recover in damages. The respondent herein still considers this to be the effect of said order, since in the opening sentence of his brief herein respondent's counsel says:

> "The facts of this case so far as are necessary for this appeal are substantially stated in appellant's brief. It is true that the new trial was granted on the one issue of damages, and the only evidence received on the new trial was on the question of the amount of damages."

The new trial herein having thus concededly and actually been confined to this single issue, there is no confusion in the authorities as to the effect of such an order, or as to the limited power and functions of the trial court upon the retrial of the cause. It has long been settled law that the trial court may by its order granting a new trial limit the issues to be considered upon a retrial of the cause. San Diego Land Co. v. Neale, 78 Cal. 64, 20 Pac. 372, 3 L. R. A. 83; Duff v. Duff, 101 Cal. 2, 35 Pac. 437; Cohen v. Canada Land Co., 151 Cal. 689, 91 Pac. 584; 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 752; Estate of Everts, 163 Cal. 451, 125 Pac. 1058.

In Estate of Everts, supra, the Supreme Court says:

"It is within the power of the trial court, where there is more than one issue of fact in a case and such issues are distinct and separable in their nature, to order a new trial of one issue and refuse it as to the others. [Citing the above-mentioned cases.] These cases declare also that when such new trial is granted, it opens for examination only the issue upon which it is ordered, that the determination of the other issues remains in the record and that they cannot be retried. The only remedy of the moving party as to those issues is to appeal from the part of the order denying the motion for a new trial as to them."

The respondent herein, however, contends that the rule above stated has been changed by the fact that the defendant has no longer under the Code the right of appeal from such an order in so far as it amounted to a denial of the motion for a new trial as to all of the other issues in the case save only the issue of damages. We do not think, however, that such a sweeping effect should be given to the change in the Code in respect to appeals from orders denying motions for a new trial, since to do so would entirely do away with the power of the trial court, and even of appellate courts, to order new trials upon limited issues. We therefore regard the last above cited case as authority for the proposition applicable to this case that when, upon motion for a new trial, an order is made limiting the scope of the motion to a certain specified issue, "it opens for examination only the issue upon which it is ordered; that the determination of the other issues remains in the record and that they cannot be retried."

It is the further contention of the respondent herein that, since this was an action for damages, the order of the trial court should be construed as opening for retrial every issue upon which the plaintiff's asserted right to recover damages depends. This construction, however, would not only render idle and meaningless the language of the order granting the new trial "upon the issue of damages," but it would also be a construction contrary to the interpretation which both the trial court and the parties placed upon said order upon the retrial of the cause. Had the parties understood that the order granting a new trial was a general order as to all of the issues in the case, they would doubtless have pursued the uniform practice of reproducing all of the evidence in the case, together with such new and additional evidence as might seem advisable in view of the court's action in generally reopening the case for retrial. That they did not do so, and that the trial court acquiesced in their interpretation of the limited scope of its order, leaves no room for the construction which the respondent now seeks to place upon it. To now adopt such a construction would be manifestly unfair to the plaintiff in the case, who, if such was to be its effect, was clearly misled as to the issues to be tried and the evidence to be presented upon the retrial of the cause. By direct sequence it follows that an even greater injustice was done to the plaintiff in the case when, without any opportunity being afforded to repeat, and, if need be, to strengthen its proofs, the trial court upon the resubmission of the cause on evidence confined strictly to the question of damages undertook to find against the plaintiff upon every issue in the case which it had formerly found in its favor, and upon such findings to render a judgment which was directly the reverse of that which it had rendered upon the first trial of the cause. We are entirely satisfied that the trial court was in error in so doing. The cases cited by the respondent touching the power of a trial court to change its findings at any time before the entry of judgment in a case have no application to the state of facts presented in the case at bar, as a careful reading of Estate of Everts, supra, will show.

FULLER v. MONTAFI et al. (Civ. 3947.)

1. Tenancy in common ⚷51 — Tenants not bound by contract of cotenant without ratification.

One tenant in common is not bound by a contract executed only by her cotenant, nor are her rights in the property affected by such contract unless she had by her acts ratified the contract.

2. Appeal and error ⚷1011(1)—Finding on conflicting evidence not disturbed.

The finding by the trial court on an issue as to which the evidence was sharply and substantially in conflict will not be disturbed.

3. Tenancy in common ⚷55(5)—Claim against plaintiff and cotenant for collusion to break contract held proper cross-complaint.

In a suit to restrain waste brought by one tenant in common against those cutting timber under a contract with the other tenant in common, a cross-complaint charging that the plaintiff and her cotenant were acting in collusion to defeat the rights of defendant under the contract and seeking damages presented a proper matter for cross-complaint under Code Civ. Proc. § 442.

4. Tenancy in common ⚷26—Cutting of tanbark on tenancy held waste of nonconsenting tenant's interest.

The cutting of tanbark oak trees, a large part of which were young second-growth trees, too immature for cutting, was waste as against the right and interest of the tenant in common not consenting to the contract of her cotenant permitting such cutting.

5. Tenancy in common 🔑26—Tenant cannot impair cotenant's rights.

A tenant in common of real estate cannot lawfully do any act which would impair the rights of his cotenant.

6. Tenancy in common 🔑39—Tenant cannot convey right to do what he cannot do.

A tenant in common of real estate cannot lawfully transfer to another a right to do with respect to the property held in common that which the tenant himself could not lawfully do.

7. Tenancy in common 🔑51—Contractor with one tenant cannot recover for injunction obtained by cotenant without collusion.

Parties who contracted with the tenant in common for permission to cut timber from the land, knowing it was held in common, and that the cotenant had not consented to such cutting, cannot recover damages from the tenant, who contracted with them for breach of contract after the cotenant had enjoined the cutting of the timber under the contract, in the absence of collusion or fraud by the contracting tenant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Thomas C. Denny, Judge.

Action by India M. Fuller against P. Montafi and others, in which Kneeland L. Fuller was brought in as cross-defendant by the original defendants' cross-complaint. Judgment for the plaintiff against the original defendants, and those defendants appeal. Affirmed.

L. G. Scott, of Sebastapol, for appellants.
Wallace L. Ware, of Santa Rosa, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff in an action brought by her to enjoin the defendants Montafi, Giudici, and Donati from committing waste, consisting in the cutting by them of tan oak timber upon certain lands and premises of which the plaintiff was the owner of an undivided interest as a tenant in common with one Kneeland L. Fuller, her son, who owned the other undivided interest therein. The said plaintiff did not join her said son as a party plaintiff in the action, but the defendants undertook to make him a party thereto through the filing of a cross-complaint in which he was named as a cross-defendant. In their answer herein the defendants denied generally and specifically the averments of the plaintiff's complaint as to her ownership of the premises in question and as to any damage caused by their acts in cutting the tan oak timber upon the same. In their cross-complaint the said defendants set forth affirmatively that they had gone into the possession of said premises, and had cut and carried away certain tan oak bark under and by virtue of a contract in writing between themselves and said Kneeland L. Fuller giving them the right so to do; and they further averred that, having entered upon said premises in pursuance of said contract and partly performed the same, they were prevented from further proceeding with the performance of said contract through the fraudulent coercion of said plaintiff with said Kneeland L. Fuller, to their damage in a large sum. They asked that said Kneeland L. Fuller be made a cross-defendant in the action, and they prayed that the plaintiff take nothing by her complaint but, that the defendants have judgment against her and against said cross-defendant for damages in the sum of $1,460.

Upon the trial and submission of the cause the trial court made and filed its findings of fact and conclusions of law, and in so doing found that the plaintiff was, and for several years prior to June 20, 1918, had been, the owner of an undivided one-half interest in the premises described in her complaint; that upon said 20th day of June, 1918, there were standing and growing thereon certain tan oak timber of the value of about $2,000, and that on or about said last-named date said defendants, without permission or authority from said plaintiff and in violation of her rights and interests in said premises, and without her will, wish or consent, entered upon said premises and proceeded to cut the said tan oak timber thereon; that between said date and the 1st day of September, 1918, they cut and removed from said property some 27 cords of tanbark, of the value of $810, and in so cutting and removing said tanbark they also cut and destroyed many young second-growth tan oak trees, to the great damage of said plaintiff. The court further found that on March 1, 1919, the said defendants again entered upon said premises and resumed the cutting of tan oak timber thereon, and were proceeding with their unauthorized activities in so doing, to the plaintiff's irreparable damage, when this action was instituted by her.

The court then proceeded to make findings upon the issues presented by defendants' cross-complaint, and in so doing found that the cross-defendant Kneeland L. Fuller had for some years prior to May 28, 1918, been, and was on said date, the owner of an undivided one-half interest in the premises described in the plaintiff's complaint; that on said date he entered into the following contract with the defendants Montafi, Giudici, and Donati, namely:

> "Know all men by these presents that I, K. L. Fuller, have this day sold to P. Montafi, Sperindio Giudici, and N. Donati, all the tanbark and wood belonging thereto on what is known as the C. E. Fuller ranch in Bodega township, county of Sonoma, Cal., for and in consideration of the sum of one hundred and fifty dollars, and ten cords of tanbark wood, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged as paid. I, the party of the first part hereby agree to extend the time for a period of three years to the said party of the second part as named above in which to cut and peel the wood and tanbark above referred to.

"We, the parties of the second part, viz. P. Montafi, Sperindio Giudici, and N. Donati, hereby agree to all the conditions and terms of this contract above set forth."

The court further found that the tanbark and wood referred to in said contract was the tanbark and wood growing upon the premises described in the plaintiff's complaint; that the sum of $150 named in said contract as a part consideration therefor was paid at the date thereof to the cross-defendant, but that no portion of the tanbark wood constituting the remaining portion of said consideration had been delivered; that said defendants had suffered no damage by reason of any fraudulent collusion of said cross-defendant with the plaintiff, his mother, in refusing to permit said defendants to remove any more tanbark or wood from said premises or to continue cutting the same; and that said cross-defendant and his said mother had not been guilty of any fraud or collusion in the premises.

As a conclusion of law from said findings of fact the trial court found that the plaintiff was entitled to the relief prayed for in her complaint, and that the defendants were entitled to no relief upon their cross-complaint.

The defendants have appealed from such judgment and urge the following points upon said appeal: First, that the evidence is insufficient to justify the findings of the trial court upon the plaintiff's alleged cause of action; and, second, that the defendants were entitled to a judgment for damages against the cross-defendant, Kneeland L. Fuller, upon the undisputed evidence in the case.

[1] As to the first of these points we are satisfied from a careful review of the evidence in the case that the appellants' contention cannot be sustained for the reason that the evidence is undisputed that the plaintiff was at all times the owner of an undivided one-half of the premises in question as a tenant in common with her son, Kneeland L. Fuller, and is also undisputed that she did not sign or execute the contract made with the defendants by her said cotenant; she could not therefore be bound by said contract, nor could her rights in the substance of said real estate be invaded through the making of the same with her cotenant, unless it could be shown that she had by her acts and conduct ratified and confirmed said contract and was thus estopped to maintain this action.

[2] The evidence on this branch of the case is sharply and substantially in conflict. The plaintiff herself testified that she never acceded to the making of said contract or accepted the same nor any of the fruits thereof, but had always disapproved the same, and that she had informed the defendants of her said disapproval and warned them off the premises. She is supported by other witnesses in so testifying; and the trial court evidently believed her story and made its findings in her favor upon this branch of the case accordingly. In this state of the record we shall not under the well-settled rule disturb the findings and judgment of the trial court upon this branch of the case.

The appellants' next contention is that the trial court was in error in its refusal to award the defendants judgment for damages against the cross-defendant, Kneeland L. Fuller.

This cross-defendant was not a party to the original action but was attempted to be brought in as a party thereto by the defendants' amended answer and cross-complaint, wherein it was asserted that the cross-defendant, Kneeland L. Fuller, had made the written contract above referred to with the defendants, and that the plaintiff had ratified, confirmed, and adopted the same. The proceedings attending the filing of this answer and cross-complaint and the bringing in of this cross-defendant as a party to the action were irregular for the reason that the procedure outlined in sections 389 and 442 of the Code of Civil Procedure was not followed. The plaintiff and the cross-defendant each filed separate demurrers to the defendants' amended answer and cross-complaint upon several specified grounds, but otherwise urged no objection to the same or the filing thereof upon the ground of noncompliance with the aforesaid sections of the Code of Civil Procedure. The court overruled these demurrers, and the cause proceeded to trial without further objection as to the irregularity of said cross-defendant's injection into the case.

[3] It may be noted in passing that one of the grounds specified in said demurrers was that the defendants were attempting by their cross-complaint to improperly inject an action at law for damages against the cross-defendant, Kneeland L. Fuller, into an action in equity for an injunction to prevent threatened waste. This objection would probably have been good if the defendants had cross-complained merely against cross-defendant, Kneeland L. Fuller, praying for damages for his breach of the contract in no way related to the plaintiff's action to enjoin waste; but this they did not do, since the gravamen of their cross-complaint was that the plaintiff in the action had confirmed and thus become a party to the contract which her cotenant had made. The prayer for relief in damages was therefore against both the plaintiff and the cross-defendant, and the cross-complaint thus set up a cause of action against both of said defendants for the breach of a contract the performance of which upon the part of the defendants plaintiff was seeking to enjoin. It therefore presented proper matter for a cross-complaint under section 442 of the Code of Civil Procedure. This being so, and the trial court having acquired jurisdiction over the whole subject in controversy, it had power to grant the cross-complainants whatever relief the law and the evidence showed them to be entitled to.

The evidence in the case shows practically without conflict that the cross-defendant by his written contract with the cross-complainants sold to the latter all of his interest in the tanbark and wood upon the Fuller ranch for a consideration of $150 in cash and 10 cords of tanbark wood, giving to said parties three years within which to cut and peel the said bark and wood. The cross-complainants paid the cash consideration, went upon the premises, cut approximately 200 cords of tanbark wood, and peeled therefrom about 62 cords of tanbark, of which they removed and sold 27 cords for approximately $800. The remaining tanbark and wood was not removed or sold because of the injunction issued herein, and the 10 cords of tanbark wood to be delivered to the cross-defendant under said contract were not delivered, probably for the same reason. It was testified that the tanbark wood upon the premises would, if sold, have realized to the cross-complainants a profit of approximately $800, and the remaining tanbark a profit of $700. From these undisputed facts it would seem to follow that if the cross-complainants were entitled as a matter of law to any relief against the cross-defendant, they will be entitled to substantial damages, which the trial court denied them. But were the cross-complainants entitled as a matter of law to any relief against the cross-defendant upon the whole facts of this case?

We think not. In entering into their contract with Kneeland L. Fuller the cross-complainants were knowingly dealing with a tenant in common of the real estate described therein, and were seeking to obtain from him the right to cut and carry away a large portion of the timber then growing upon said premises.

[4] The evidence sufficiently shows, and the court found, that a large part of said growing timber was of young and second-growth tanbark oak trees too immature for cutting, and the cutting and destruction of which would and in fact did work great and irreparable injury to the said real estate. That the cutting of such timber would constitute waste as against the right and interest of the cotenant not consenting thereto may be taken to be settled law. 2 Blackstone's Commentaries, 281; Buckelew v. Estell, 5 Cal. 108; Silva v. Garcia, 65 Cal. 591, 4 Pac. 628; Pardee v. Camden Lumber Co., 70 W. Va. 68, 73 S. E. 82, 43 L. R. A. [N. S.] 262.

[5] It is also well settled that a tenant in common of real estate cannot lawfully himself do any act which would impair the rights of his cotenant in real estate. Tiffany, Real Prop. § 993; Nevels v. Kentucky Lumber Co., 108 Ky. 550, 56 S. W. 969, 49 L. R. A. 416, 94 Am. St. Rep. 388.

[6] If this be true, it follows that a tenant in common of real estate cannot lawfully transfer to another a right to do that which he cannot lawfully do in respect to said real property. It has accordingly been held that a tenant in common of land has no power to convey to a stranger the right to divert water from the land (Pfeiffer v. Regents, etc., 74 Cal. 156, 15 Pac. 622), or create an easement in the common estate against his cotenant (Waterford Irr. Dist. v. Turlock Irr. Dist., 194 Pac. 757; Southern Investment Co. v. Postal Telegraph Co., 156 N. C. 259, 72 S. E. 361, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 224; Moore v. Moore, 4 Cal. Unrep. 190, 34 Pac. 90).

[7] It follows from these authorities that Kneeland L. Fuller, the cross-defendant herein, could not lawfully have granted to the cross-complainants herein the right to enter upon the premises in question and do acts thereon in the way of cutting and removing the aforesaid growing timber therefrom, which acts, if done without first obtaining the agreement or consent of his other cotenant, would constitute waste which the latter would be entitled to enjoin. The cross-complainants in taking such contract and in attempting to execute the same did so at their peril, and hence would have no right to complain nor to recover damages against the other party to said contract when, without any fraud or collusion on his part, his cotenant in common rightfully enjoined them from committing or continuing acts of waste upon said real estate in the course of the execution of the terms of said contract. The trial court expressly found that there was no fraud or collusion as between the cross-defendant and the plaintiff herein. We think, therefore, that the trial court was correct in holding that the cross-complainants herein were not entitled to recover damages against the cross-defendant herein.

Judgment affirmed.

FIVE STATES TIMBER CO. v. DWINNELL.
(Civ. 2332.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 30, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 24, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error ⚷712—Superior court rules not made a part of the record not considered.

Where rules of the superior court are not made a part of the record, they cannot be considered on appeal.

2. Appeal and error ⚷917(1)—Presumption that there was no court rule as to notice of hearing on demurrer.

In the absence of record showing the contrary, it is assumed in support of a judgment that there was no court rule requiring notice of hearing on demurrer, and the question of right to notice must be determined in accordance with Code Civ. Proc. § 594.

3. Pleading ⚷218(2)—Notice of hearing on demurrer not necessary.

Code Civ. Proc. § 594, authorizes the court to hear and decide the issue of law raised by the demurrer without notice to plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, Siskiyou County; Jas. F. Lodge, Judge.

Action by the Five States Timber Company against G. W. Dwinnell. From an order refusing to vacate judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Charles L. Gilmore, of Sacramento, for appellant.

Taylor & Tebbe, of Yreka, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. This is an appeal from an order refusing to vacate a judgment for defendant.

The original complaint was filed June 14, 1920, and demurrer thereto was sustained September 25th. On November 6, 1920, by leave of the court, an amended complaint was filed, and on the same day defendant interposed his demurrer thereto. Without notice to the plaintiff or its counsel, the demurrer was placed on the law calendar to be heard November 20th, and on that day, in the absence of plaintiff and its counsel, the demurrer was submitted without argument, and was sustained by the court without granting leave to amend, and judgment was thereupon entered in favor of defendant. On January 27, 1921, plaintiff filed notice of motion to vacate the judgment on the ground that the plaintiff had no notice of the hearing. Attached to the notice was the affidavit of plaintiff's counsel reciting the foregoing facts, and stating that affiant had no notice of the placing of the demurrer on the calendar or of the action of the court thereon prior to January 22, 1921; that affiant's office at all times mentioned was in the city of Sacramento; and "that affiant believes that plaintiff herein has a good and valid and sufficient cause of action as set forth in said amended complaint, and affiant avers he would have appeared to defend said amended complaint if he had notice that said demurrer was set down for argument." No counter showing was made by the defendant. The court denied the motion.

[1-3] Counsel for appellant argues that he was entitled to notice of the time set for the hearing on the demurrer. Defendant replies that the court rules of Siskiyou county provide that Saturday of each week shall be law day, on which all demurrers "shall be disposed of, unless otherwise ordered by the court," and that "parties shall be deemed to have notice that on law day any demurrer that has been on file for five days prior thereto will be argued and submitted for decision." The court rules have not been made a part of the record, and therefore cannot be considered. Johnston v. Callahan, 146 Cal. 212, 79 Pac. 870. It must be assumed in support of the judgment, however, that there was no court rule requiring notice of the hearing on the demurrer, and the question of right to notice must be determined in accordance with the provisions of section 594 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which reads as follows:

> "Either party may bring an issue to trial or to a hearing, and in the absence of the adverse party, unless the court, for good cause, otherwise direct, may proceed with his case, and take a dismissal of the action, or a verdict or judgment, as the case may require; provided, however, if the issue to be tried is an issue of fact, proof must first be made to the satisfaction of the court that the adverse party has had five days' notice of such trial."

The provision requiring notice of trial of an issue of fact was added in the year 1899. In the case of Dusy v. Prudom, 95 Cal. 646, 30 Pac. 798, it was held, under the law as it stood prior to the amendment, that—

> "It is not an abuse of discretion for the trial court to deny a motion to vacate a judgment rendered in the absence of the parties against whom the judgment is given, on the ground of excusable neglect, where the application to set it aside simply shows that such parties had no notice of the setting of the case for trial; that they relied upon the belief that they were entitled to notice, as they were nonresidents of the county."

The section has not been changed relative to notice of the trial of an issue of law, and hence the case of Dusy v. Prudom is authority for the action of the trial court in this case. In the case cited the trial of a question of fact was had in the absence of the defendant, and judgment rendered against him. The determination of the trial court in that case, if based on conflicting evidence, would have been conclusive on appeal, whereas in this case the question of law presented by the demurrer was as fully open for consideration on appeal as in the trial court. The effect of granting appellant's motion would have been to permit argument of the demurrer. If the court was satisfied that the demurrer was properly sustained, it cannot be said that it unwisely exercised its discretion in denying the motion and leaving the plaintiff to its remedy by appeal. But, regardless of other considerations, the statute authorized the court to hear and decide the issue of law raised by the demurrer without notice to the appellant, and, to hold that it was an abuse of discretion to deny the appellant's motion to vacate the judgment on the sole ground that appellant had no notice of the hearing on the demurrer other than that afforded by the placing of the same on the law calendar, would be to nullify the statute, because a party without notice could always make that showing.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

JACKSON v. ALLEN. (Civ. 3920.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2. California. Nov. 18, 1921.)

1. Reference ⟹89—Immaterial that findings were personal opinions of referees.

A contention that report of referees, appointed to report upon facts under Code Civ. Proc. § 639, subd. 1, that 'from the testimony taken we are convinced that about half of the hay produced on this tract was no more than Bermuda grass, which would have practically no market value as hay," was the personal opinion of the referees, was without significance, since such referees were appointed to render their personal opinion, based upon the evidence produced before them.

2. Reference ⟹63—Expert opinions as to values unnecessary.

Referees appointed to report upon questions of fact under Code Civ. Proc. § 639, subd. 1, in an accounting between partners, need not seek expert opinions as to values of property, such as hay.

3. Appeal and error ⟹1033(7)—No complaint of favorable error.

A party cannot complain of findings of referee in an accounting which were favorable to him.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; S. L. Strother, Judge.

Action by W. A. Jackson against Asa W. Allen. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. D. Crichton, of Fresno, for appellant.
Stanley Moffatt, of Fresno, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendant to obtain a judgment dissolving a partnership and for an accounting of the partnership existing between plaintiff and the defendant. The plaintiff recovered a judgment for $619.48, and the defendant has appealed under section 953a. The transcript purports to be a transcript by the county clerk, setting forth copies of certain papers on file in his office, but the appellant has not brought up any transcript of the proceedings or the evidence. The trial court made an interlocutory judgment on the 3d day of January, 1921, dissolving the partnership on the stipulation of the parties, and ordered a reference to Burdick & Baker as referees to state an account between the plaintiff and defendant, and thereafter to submit the same to the court for its final decision. It does not appear whether the testimony and proceedings before the referees were taken down, nor does it appear that any exceptions were taken before the referees, nor does it appear that anything purporting to be the evidence, or purporting to be a record of proceedings had before the referees, was thereafter certified to the trial court; however, it does appear by a recital in the findings that the referees prepared a written report; that the defendant made certain objections in writing to the same; that the matter was thereupon referred back to the referees; that they made a supplemental report; that written objections were made to that report, and that thereafter, on April 26th, the report of the referees and the objections thereto were heard in open court, and thereafter the trial court ordered judgment in favor of the plaintiff in accordance with the findings and the report of the referees. At this time the appellant makes certain points which call upon us to reconsider his objections to the report of the referees. Assuming, without deciding, that this court has the power, on this kind of a record, to re-examine such questions, we will attempt to dispose of the issues presented.

The appellant cites and relies on Lambert v. Smith, 3 Cal. 408, Calderwood v. Pyser, 31 Cal. 333, and Lee Sack Sam v. Gray, 104 Cal. 243, 34 Pac. 85. The case first cited was one in which the trial court had ordered a reference to hear and determine the whole issue, pursuant to subdivision 1 of section 183 of the Practice Act (St. 1851, p. 79) which was codified as subdivision 1 of section 639 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The second case may be classified in the same manner. The third case involved a proceeding had and taken under and pursuant to sections 1507 and 1508 of the Code of Civil Procedure. As stated above, in the instant case the trial court did not order a general reference, but its order was under the last clause of subdivision 1 of section 639 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides: "* * * Or report upon any specific question of fact involved therein." It is patent, therefore, that the referees were not to prepare any conclusions of law, and there was therefore no occasion to state conclusions of law together with, or separately from, findings of fact, and the referees neither did nor omitted to do anything in violation of the authority conferred upon them. It is claimed that the referees called and examined witnesses, and received oral evidence not in the presence and hearing of the defendant, and that such fact appears on the face of the report. It is sufficient to state that the fact does not appear on the face of the report, nor does it appear in any other manner.

[1] As to a quantity of hay, the referees reported:

> "From the testimony taken we are convinced that about half of the hay produced on this tract was no more than Bermuda grass, which would have practically no market value as hay."

The appellant complains of this language to the effect that the same was contrary to the evidence, and the personal opinion of the referees. However, as the evidence taken by the referees is not before us, we may not consider whether the statement was in accordance with, or contrary to, the evidence. As to the statement being the personal opinion of the referees, it is sufficient to state that the referees were appointed to render their personal opinion based on the evidence produced before them, and there is nothing to show that they did otherwise.

[2] Regarding this same hay, the referees also reported:

> "From our personal knowledge of the market price of hay during the years of 1918 and 1919, and the quotations on the open market, we are convinced that the 40 tons of hay charged up to the partnership would not have been worth $10 per ton."

The appellant attacks the statement as being contrary to the evidence. That attack cannot be considered for the reasons stated above. It is also asserted that the statement of the referees is the personal opinion of the referees. If by this attack the appellant complains because the referees did not seek expert opinions as to values, it is sufficient to remark that they were not bound to do so.

[3] The referees reported, among other things, as follows:

> "There was some question as to the amount of cream checks received by Allen, inasmuch as he was to have all of the cream checks for his care of the milk cows, and it is utterly impossible to ascertain just how many milk cows of his own and how many of the partnership were producing milk at the time. We have eliminated the entire transaction as immaterial."

It will be noted that the checks in question were received by Allen; that if there was any materiality in the item, Allen should have been charged to the extent of the item. If Allen was not so charged, then Jackson had a just right to complain, but Jackson has not appealed, and Allen may not complain of errors that were in his favor.

As stated above, the referees found that there was owing from Allen to Jackson the sum of $619.48. The appellant complains that the finding is contrary to the evidence and is not supported by any evidence. This objection has already been discussed above, and needs no further attention on our part.

The judgment is affirmed.

PHILLIPS et al. v. WHEELER et al.
(Civ. 2372.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 16, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error ⚷933(4) — Presumed that new trial not granted for insufficiency of evidence.

Under the express provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 657, as amended by St. 1919, pp. 141 and 142, it is presumed that an order granting a new trial was not made on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence where the order does not state that it was so made.

2. Appeal and error ⚷1161—Order granting new trial reversed when respondent concedes it cannot be sustained.

Where respondents concede that they cannot successfully argue the only grounds in support of an order granting a new trial open to them in view of the presumption under Code Civ. Proc. § 657, as amended by St. 1919, pp. 141 and 142, that the order was not granted for insufficiency of the evidence, the order will be reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

Action by J. W. Phillips and another against John H. Wheeler and another. From an order granting plaintiffs' motion for a new trial, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Otis & French, Frank L. Gafney, H. T. Hiatt, and C. B. Harris, all of Sacramento, for respondents.

HART, J. [1] On the 16th day of November, 1921, this court filed herein an opinion, 156 P.2d 468, of which the following is a portion, and which we hereby adopt as a part of this opinion:

"This is an appeal from an order granting a motion by the plaintiffs for a new trial. The motion was based upon all the statutory grounds (see section 657, Code Civ. Proc.), and the order granting it was in general language or silent as to the particular ground or grounds upon which it was predicated. There was no showing, by affidavits or otherwise, in support of any of the grounds enumerated in the first, second, third, and fourth subdivisions of section 657, such a showing being required by section 658 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The action was for damages for personal injuries, and, the verdict being for defendants, no question of excessive damages, etc. (subdivision 5, § 657), is involved herein, and it is obvious, therefore, that the order appealed from was not based upon that ground. The question as to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict is eliminated from consideration here, since the order granting the new trial does not state that it was made on that ground; the presumption in such case being, under said section 657, as amended by the Legislature of 1919 (Stats. 1919, pp. 141, 142), that the order was not made upon that ground. It results that there are left but two of the several causes for which an order granting a new trial may be granted upon which the order could have been made, and they are: (1) That the verdict 'is against law' (subdivision 6); (2) 'error in law, occurring at the trial and excepted to by the party making the application' (subdivision 7). But, as to these grounds, neither counsel for respondents nor counsel for appellants have a word to say in their briefs. In fact, the brief of counsel for respondents is devoted entirely to a discussion of the question of the discretion of a trial court in the matter of granting the motion on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict, while those of appellants involve merely a reply thereto and also the contention that the duty is not upon them to show that the court did not err in any of its rulings or instructions. There was no oral argument of the cause; it having been submitted upon the briefs on file. * * * It is clear that, as the cause now stands submitted, a reversal of the order would be justified. Inasmuch, however, as we conceive it our duty to assume that the trial court had some substantial legal reason for granting the motion, we feel reluctant about ordering a reversal without giving the attorneys for the respondents an opportunity to point out, if they can, any errors affecting their vital rights in the trial which occurred during the course thereof."

[2] In accordance with the conclusion thus announced, the order submitting the cause for decision was vacated and set aside, and in due time the attorneys of the respective parties notified thereof, and the respondents were allowed ample time within which to point out, if they could, any errors of law occurring at the trial, or to show, if they could, wherein the verdict was against law, and the appellants were given like time within which to make a reply to any points which respondents might advance in the particulars mentioned. On the last day of the time (December 15, 1921) allowed to respondents for filing an additional brief covering the points upon which the court desired and in its opinion invited enlightenment, the attorneys for respondents filed a document with the record herein which was signed by said attorneys, and which, among other things, states:

"Since the order made in the above-entitled action setting aside the submission on briefs on file, we have investigated the record in view of the suggestions made by the court in the order setting aside the submission. From a further examination of the transcript, we are convinced that the respondent cannot successfully argue the points referred to in the order setting aside the submission. We believe the trial court decided the points of law arising during the trial in a proper manner, but in view of the fact that we cannot consider the insufficiency of the evidence we cannot argue this point in connection with the ground that the verdict is against law. * * * We would therefore respectfully submit that the order granting the new trial be vacated and set aside, and that a remittitur issue forthwith."

Accordingly the order appealed from is reversed, and the remittitur ordered to issue forthwith.

SUWA v. JOHNSON. (Civ. 2322.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 31, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 24, 1921.)

Aliens ⚷6(2)—Issue of alienage not available to landlord in action for possession by tenant under lease.

In an action by an alien for possession of real estate under a lease for six years, in view of the Alien Land Law, Pol. Code, § 474, and Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1269–1273, the issue of alienage was not available to the landlord, but could be raised only by the Attorney General on behalf of the state.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sutter County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action by C. Suwa against J. W. Johnson. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, for appellant.
A. H. Hewitt, of Yuba City, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. Plaintiff was given judgment for the possession of certain agricultural land, and the defendant appeals.

On January 25, 1917, the defendant executed and delivered to the plaintiff a lease of said land for a term of three years, commencing the 1st day of February, 1920, and ending the 31st day of January, 1923. On the same day the defendant executed and delivered to I. Murayama a lease of the same land for a term of three years, commencing on the 1st day of February, 1917, and ending on the 31st day of January, 1920. By separate answer and by proof offered at the trial the defendant sought to show that Suwa and Murayama are aliens, being subjects of the Emperor of Japan; that prior to the execution of the two leases Murayama desired to acquire the land for a term of six years; that the defendant then informed Murayama that a lease for six years would be invalid under the alien land law of 1913; that thereupon it was agreed between them that the two leases should be executed, one to Murayama for a term of three year, and the other to Suwa for three years after the termination of the first lease; that the two leases were executed and delivered pursuant to this understanding; and "that the two leases were made for the benefit of I. Murayama and I. Murayama alone, and for the purpose of avoiding" the restrictions of the alien land law. On motion of the plaintiff the separate answer was stricken out, and his objection to the proof offered was sustained. Murayama held possession and farmed the land for the term of the first lease, paying the stipulated rental therefor. The defendant retook possession before the commencement of the term of the second lease and refused to deliver possession of the land to the plaintiff. Thereupon this action was instituted.

The only question argued on appeal is whether a lease for six years to an alien, ineligible to citizenship, can be avoided at the suit of the lessor on the ground that the lease is invalid on account of the alienage of the lessee. Section 2 of the alien land law (Stats. 1913, p. 206) provides that aliens ineligible to citizenship—

> "may acquire, possess, enjoy and transfer real property, or any interest therein, in this state, in the manner and to the extent and for the purposes prescribed by any treaty now existing between the government of the United States and the nation or country of which such alien is a citizen or subject, and not otherwise, and may in addition thereto lease lands in this state for agricultural purposes for a term not exceeding three years."

Section 6 provides:

> "Any leasehold or other interest in real property less than the fee, hereafter acquired in violation of the provisions of this act by any alien mentioned in section 2 of this act * * * shall escheat to the state of California. The Attorney General shall institute proceedings to have such escheat adjudged and enforced as provided in section five of this act."

Section 5 provides that—

> "The Attorney General shall institute proceedings to have the escheat of such real property adjudged and enforced in the manner provided by section 474 of the Political Code and title eight, part three, of the Code of Civil Procedure."

The question presented is not new, and the act of 1913 discloses no intention on the part of the Legislature to provide any new rule for its determination. It has uniformly been held under statutes forbidding ownership of land by aliens that an alien grantee takes a defeasible estate, "free from attack by any one except the government" in a direct proceeding. Ramires v. Kent, Bartel & Co., 2 Cal. 558; Norris v. Hoyt, 18 Cal. 217; Ferguson v. Neville, 61 Cal. 356; Santa Paula Waterworks v. Peralta, 113 Cal. 38, 45 Pac. 168; Doe v. Robertson, 11 Wheat. 332, 6 L. Ed. 488; Manuel v. Wulff, 152 U. S. 505, 14 Sup. Ct. 651, 38 L. Ed. 532; McKinley Creek Mining Co. v. Alaska United Mining Co., 183

Gold & Copper Co., 29 Utah, 443, 82 Pac. 475, 110 Am. St. Rep. 719; Oregon Mortgage Co. v. Carstens, 16 Wash. 165, 47 Pac. 421, 35 L. R. A. 841; Abrams v. State, 45 Wash. 327, 88 Pac. 327, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 186, 122 Am. St. Rep. 914, 13 Ann. Cas. 527; State v. World Real Estate Commercial Co., 46 Wash. 104, 89 Pac. 471; Keene v. Zindorf, 81 Wash. 152, 142 Pac. 484; Prentice v. How, 84 Wash. 136, 146 Pac. 388. The rule and the reason therefor are stated by the Supreme Court of the United States in Doe v. Robertson, supra, as follows:

> "That an alien can take by deed, and can hold until office found, must now be regarded as a positive rule of law, so well established that the reason of the rule is little more than a subject for the antiquary. It no doubt owes its present authority, if not its origin, to a regard to the peace of society and a desire to protect the individual from arbitrary aggression."

Where an owner has conveyed his title to an alien, he becomes as much a stranger to that title as if he had never owned the property conveyed. To permit such a stranger to attack an owner's title on the ground of alienage would not promote "the peace of society" or "protect the individual from arbitrary aggression." If the alien grantee leases the land to another, he may collect the rent, and his alienage is no defense to an action therefor. Ramires v. Kent, Bartel & Co., 2 Cal. 558. If he is out of possession, he may recover the same by appropriate action. Norris v. Hoyt, 18 Cal. 217. He may defend in court against adverse claimants. Ferguson v. Neville, 61 Cal. 356; Santa Paula Waterworks v. Peralta, 113 Cal. 38, 45 Pac. 168. The Constitution of the state of Washington provides that:

> "All conveyances of lands hereafter made to any alien directly, or in trust for such alien, shall be void." Const. art. 2, § 33.

The courts of that state have uniformly held, as will appear from an examination of the cases cited, that an alien grantee takes a defeasible estate, void only as against the state.

There are cases holding that a court will not assist an alien to acquire title. In Ales v. Epstein, 283 Mo. 434, 222 S. W. 1012, the plaintiff, an alien, sought to enforce a constructive trust in land alleging that the defendant had purchased the land in her behalf pursuant to an oral agreement that he would convey the same to her, their relations being confidential, and the plaintiff being ready to pay, but not having paid the purchase price. The court said:

> "If the plaintiff had received a deed to the real estate in controversy, conveying to her the absolute title to same, and these defendants were seeking to divest her of said title, * * * then it might be well said that the state alone could attack the conveyance, declare a forfeiture, and take the property. If it was unlawful * * * for plaintiff, under the circumstances of this case, to take and hold the real estate aforesaid, it would be equally as unlawful for a court of equity to aid her in violating said law."

To the same effect is the holding in Case v. Kelly, 133 U. S. 28, 10 Sup. Ct. 220, 33 L. Ed. 513. No case, however, has been cited or discovered which holds that, after title has passed to an alien in violation of law, his defeasible estate can be attacked collaterally on the ground of his alienage; and all attacks are collateral except a direct proceeding by the government in the manner provided by law in the case of escheated estates.

From the foregoing authorities it seems clear that the issue of alienage, tendered by the separate answer, was not available to the defendant, but can be raised only by the Attorney General on behalf of the state, in the manner provided by the act of 1913.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

ALECHOFF v. EDWARDS. (Civ. 3585.)

1. Partnership 🔑331—Partner required to account to copartner to time of interlocutory decree providing for accounting.

In a partner's action against copartner who had taken exclusive possession of the partnership business for an accounting and for a dissolution, the court did not err in taking an account up to the date of filing an interlocutory decree declaring plaintiff entitled to a dissolution and to an accounting, regardless of whether dissolution took place when defendant took exclusive possession of the business under Civ. Code, § 2451, or when court rendered interlocutory decree under section 2452, subd. 2, since defendant having assumed to act in liquidation of the partnership affairs, should be required to make a complete accounting.

2. Partnership 🔑331—Equity will make complete settlement of accounts, though involving items accruing after suit.

On a suit for dissolution and accounting, a court of equity will not make an incomplete settlement of accounts, but will adjust the whole matter, even involving items accruing after commencement of the suit.

3. Appeal and error ⚷924—Referee's report in partnership accounting presumed limited to items necessary to an accounting and settlement of the co-partnership business.

In action by a partner for an account against copartner who had taken exclusive possession of the partnership business and profits the appellate court on appeal from judgment for plaintiff for amount found due by referee must assume that the referee's report was limited to the items necessary to an accounting and settlement of the copartnership business, and did not attempt to include business or property of the defendant exclusive of such partnership affairs.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leslie R. Hewitt, Judge.

Action by Mike Alechoff, also known as Mike Alekian, against M. K. Edwards. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Stanley Visel, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Wm. Lewis and Guy Lewis, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. Action for dissolution of partnership and for an accounting. Complaint filed January 6, 1919. The partnership came into existence on the 20th day of September, 1918, under an agreement whereby it was provided that the partnership should continue during the mutual agreement of the parties. After a trial of the issues presented other than the facts involved in the accounting, the court, on August 30, 1919, entered an interlocutory decree. From the facts stated in the interlocutory decree it appears that the partnership business continued until December 27, 1918, at which time the defendant, in violation of the terms and conditions of the partnership agreement, took exclusive possession, adversely to the plaintiff, of the partnership business and property, including all the proceeds and profits thereof since the beginning of the partnership, and converted the same to his own use. The interlocutory decree declared that the plaintiff is entitled to a dissolution of the partnership and to an accounting; that the assets of the business be sold, and the net proceeds, as shown by the accounting, be equally divided between plaintiff and the defendant. A referee was appointed to take the accounting and to report what upon the balance of the account should appear to be due from either party to the other.

A final judgment was entered November 15, 1920, in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant for the sum of $1,405.73. In this final judgment it is stated that the order of reference was made by consent of the parties; that the referee took the evidence and stated an account and duly filed his report to the court. A hearing was duly had upon said report and the exceptions thereto. On motion of the plaintiff, duly presented and argued, the court approved the account "up to the entry of said interlocutory judgment and wherein and whereby it was found that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment against the defendant for the sum of $1,405.73." Judgment was entered accordingly. From the judgment so entered the defendant appeals. The appeal is presented upon the judgment roll alone.

Appellant's sole point on appeal is that the trial court was not warranted, in the face of the pleadings and evidence, in taking an account up to the date of filing the interlocutory decree and in attempting to decree a dissolution of the partnership when a dissolution had legally been had prior to the filing of the action; that the court erroneously compelled the defendant to account for the income of "his business" for the period running from the time when defendant contends that a dissolution took place to the date of the interlocutory decree. This claim is based upon the fact that, in addition to the facts hereinbefore stated, the complaint alleged and the answer admitted that "the plaintiff no longer agrees or desires to continue the said partnership, and has so informed the defendant." From this it is argued that the partnership must have been terminated prior to the commencement of this action (Civ. Code, § 2451), and therefore could not be dissolved by judgment of the court on account of misconduct of the defendant, as provided for in case of such misconduct (Civ. Code, § 2452, subd. 2).

[1-3] So far as the evidence is concerned, there is none before the court. Since the court found that the business was carried on by the parties together until December 27, 1918, it is manifest that the plaintiff's attempted withdrawal of his consent to the further continuance of the partnership did not occur earlier than that date. At all times after that date the defendant took and held exclusive possession of the partnership business and property. No facts are presented from which we can infer that it makes any difference whether the court dissolved the partnership, or determined that it was dissolved on December 27, 1918. In either event, since the defendant assumed to act in liquidation of the affairs of the partnership, he should not be permitted to escape a complete accounting.

"A court of equity will not make an incomplete settlement of accounts, but will go on and adjust the whole matter, even if it involves items accruing after the commencement of the suit." Roberts v. Eldred, 73 Cal. 394, 15 Pac. 16.

In the absence of any evidence to the contrary, we must assume that the referee's report was limited to the subject-matter described in the order of reference, to wit, the items necessary to an accounting and settlement of the copartnership business, and did not attempt to include business or property of the defendant exclusive of such partnership affairs.

The judgment is affirmed.

FAY IMPROVEMENT CO. v. NELSON.
(Civ. 4004.)

Municipal corporations ⚷312—Repeal of ordinance ordering improvements held not to deprive board of public works of jurisdiction to subsequently order work done.

Where a board of public works, pursuant to a general street improvement ordinance, adopted an ordinance ordering certain improvements to be done under its supervision, after due passage, publication, and posting of a resolution of intention, that subsequently the ordinance ordering the work was repealed held not to deprive the board of public works of jurisdiction to later pass another ordinance ordering the work to be done; the adoption and repeal of the ordinance operating as a mere postponement, and being at most a mere informality, curable by the street improvement ordinance itself.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by the Fay Improvement Company against Adeline M. Nelson to foreclose a street assessment lien. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Sawyer & Sawyer and Frank W. Sawyer, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

John R. Daniels, of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is from a judgment in the plaintiff's favor in an action to foreclose a street assessment lien. The street improvement work in question was done upon Forty-Fourth avenue, between Anza and Fulton streets, in the city and county of San Francisco, under the provisions of the street improvement ordinance of said municipality adopted on September 2, 1913.

The appellant herein makes two main points. The first of these is that the ordinance in question is unconstitutional. No extended discussion of the argument urged in support of this contention need be made, since the question of the constitutionality of this and similar ordinances of said municipality has been set at rest by the decisions of the Supreme Court in the cases of Mardis v. McCarthy, 162 Cal. 98, 121 Pac. 389; Hayne v. San Francisco, 174 Cal. 185, 162 Pac. 625; Bienfield v. Van Ness, 176 Cal. 585, 169 Pac. 225.

The appellant's next contention is based upon the following facts as shown by the record herein: On the 14th day of June, 1916, the board of public works of the city and county of San Francisco duly and regularly passed a resolution, pursuant to the provisions of the ordinance above referred to, that it was expedient that the street improvements in question herein should be made. Thereupon plans and specifications for the doing of said work were duly prepared as in said ordinance provided. On July 12, 1916, the said board of public works duly and regularly and in accordance with the terms of said ordinance adopted and passed its resolution of intention to recommend to the board of supervisors of said city and county the doing of said work pursuant to the provisions of said street improvement ordinance, and also immediately thereafter duly caused said resolution of intention to be posted and published as required by the terms of said ordinance. On August 18, 1916, the said board of public works duly passed and adopted a resolution recommending to the board of supervisors of said city and county that they order said improvements to be made, which resolution, accompanied by a diagram certified by the city engineer and showing in detail the separate lots, pieces, and parcels of land within the limits of the district to be assessed for said work, and the location of the same with relation to the contemplated improvements, was duly transmitted to said board of supervisors. On September 18, 1916, the said board of supervisors duly and regularly passed and adopted an ordinance ordering the said work and improvement to be done under the supervision of the said board of public works. Thereafter, and on October 21, 1916, the said board of supervisors adopted an ordinance repealing the last above-mentioned ordinance ordering the said work to be done. The matter rested there until June 25, 1917, when the board of supervisors adopted another ordinance, similar in form to the ordinance of September 18, 1916, ordering the said work and improvements to be done but postponing the time for entering upon the same to a date nine months after the date of the approval of said ordinance by the mayor. At the expiration of said time the work of making said improvements proceeded in accordance with the original ordinance providing the procedure for making such improvements. The appellant's contentention is that, by the repeal of the ordinance of September 18, 1916, ordering the doing of said work, the board of supervisors and the board of public works lost jurisdiction to carry on said improvements, and hence that all that was done thereafter, leading up to the assessment sought to be enforced against the appellant's property, was illegal.

We find no merit in this contention. General jurisdiction over the matter and method of making public improvements of the kind attempted in the instant case was conferred upon the board of public works and the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco by the terms of the street improvement ordinance of 1913. It is in said ordinance provided that such work shall be initiated by the board of public works, through the adoption by it of a resolution of intention recommending to the board of supervisors the ordering of said work, specifying the nature and details of the same, which resolution of intention shall be published or posted as in said ordinance directed. Section 21 of said ordinance provides:

> "No assessment, warrant, diagram or affidavit of demand and non-payment after the issue of the same, and no proceedings prior to the assessment, shall be held invalid by any court for any error, informality or other defect in the same, where the resolution of intention of the board of public works to recommend to the supervisors the ordering of the improvement has been actually published and posted and the notices of improvement posted as in this ordinance provided."

An examination of the other provisions of said ordinance discloses that nowhere is it provided therein that the board of supervisors shall within any specified or limited time act upon the recommendations of the board of public works in the way of ordering the said work to proceed; nor is it therein provided that said work shall be proceeded with or completed within any specified or limited time after the passage of the resolution of intention by the said board of public works. Jurisdiction to make said improvement and to bind the property of the appellant and of all others within the district for the expense of making the same was, we think, acquired by the due passage, publication, and posting of the resolution of intention under the express terms of the foregoing section of the Improvement Act of 1913, and was neither acquired nor lost by the passage or repeal of the ordinance of the board of supervisors of September 18, 1916. The ordinance of the board of supervisors of October 21, 1916, repealing said last-named ordinance, did not purport to be an ordinance abandoning the proceedings already taken toward making the improvements in question. Section 7 of said Street Improvement Act embraces a provision that the board of supervisors "by an affirmative vote of not less than fifteen members may determine to abandon all proceedings had and taken in the matter of the proposed improvement," but the said repealing ordinance of said board enacted on October 21, 1916, did not purport to be passed under this provision, but at most must be construed as merely expressing the resolve of the board not to proceed at present with the making of the intended improvements, but to delay its orders in that respect to some more opportune time. In the entire absence of any showing that any one, and especially this appellant, was or would be injured by the delay in ordering and proceeding with the making of these improvements we hold that the action of the board of supervisors, in first adopting and then repealing this ordinance ordering said improvements to be proceeded with, operated as a mere postponement of the time within which they should be entered upon, and was at most a mere informality which would be cured by the provisions of section 21 of the improvement ordinance above set forth. Chase v. Trout, 146 Cal. 350, 80 Pac. 81.

No other errors being urged upon this appeal, the judgment is affirmed.

Crops growing or to be grown are subject to contract for sale and to absolute sale.

3. Executors and administrators ⚷390—One assuming executor's contract for sale of growing crop held bound thereby, although original contract not confirmed.

Where an executrix contracted to sell a growing prune crop, but did not have the contract confirmed by the probate court, and thereafter sold the land and also the contract to one who agreed to carry it out, and the sale of the land and crop was confirmed to him by the probate court, he could not thereafter avoid performance on the ground that the original contract for the sale of the crop had not been confirmed.

4. Assignments 🔑5—Purchaser of growing crop may transfer his rights to assignee.

Where an executrix sold a growing prune crop, the rights arising out of the obligation were the property of the purchaser, and were capable of being transferred as such to his assignee, in view of Civ. Code, § 1458.

Action by the Richmond-Chase Company against Charles Schlessinger. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Fry & Jenkins, of San Jose, for appellant.
Charles S. Wheeler and Charles S. Wheeler, Jr., both of San Francisco, for respondent.

WASTE, P. J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment rendered in the lower court, after demurrer to the first count of plaintiff's complaint sustained without leave to amend.

It appears from the facts pleaded in the first count of the complaint that Mrs. Carrie Losse, as the executrix of the last will and testament of her husband, which gave her power to sell any property of the estate without first having obtained an order of court, entered into a contract with E. N. Richmond by which she sold, and Richmond bought, the entire prune crop then growing on the real property belonging to the estate. This sale was not reported to, nor confirmed by, the probate court, for the reason that, shortly after executing the contract, the executrix received an offer in writing from the defendant to buy the real property, the sale and purchase price to include the growing crops on the land, together with the existing contract for the sale of the 1919 prune crop to Richmond, which agreement the defendant assumed and agreed to perform in the place and stead of the executrix. This sale was confirmed by the probate court. Richmond thereafter assigned his contract to the plaintiff, which made demand upon the defendant for delivery of the crop, which was refused. Thereupon the plaintiff brought this action for damages alleged to have been sustained by reason of the refusal of the defendant to deliver the crop in accordance with the agreement entered into by the defendant and the executrix of the estate.

The complaint is in two counts. The first stated the facts in detail, and the second is a common count for money had and received. The defendant interposed a demurrer, which was sustained as to the first count, on the ground of want of facts. In view of the ruling of the court, the plaintiff dismissed the second count, and upon this appeal relies upon the sufficiency of the facts alleged in the first count to constitute a cause of action.

The principal contention of the respondent in support of the ruling of the lower court, and one which no doubt greatly conduced to the action below, is that the attempted sale of the prune crop to appellant's assignor was void, for the reason that, from a reading of the contract, it is apparent that both the executrix and the purchaser intended a present sale, and not a mere agreement to sell the crop; the intention being to then and there vest Richmond with the title, contrary to section 1561 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which requires confirmation by the court in order to pass title. The sale not having been reported to the court, and confirmed, the contract was only an attempt to pass the title in a manner contrary to express law, and is a void transaction. At most, argues respondent, there was only an implied agreement to report the sale of the crop to the court for confirmation. No valuable consideration had passed. No equitable title had vested in the vendee. The transaction, so far as consummated, meant only that the purchaser was to get title to the prunes and pay the price in the event the court should confirm the sale. The confirmation, therefore, would be a condition precedent to any obligation on the part of either the buyer or the seller. In its absence, no liability for breach of the contract would attach to either the executrix or to Richmond.

[1, 2] Respondent's contention would impress us more strongly, if we were dealing with a situation presented by a refusal of the executrix to carry out the contract with the purchaser of the crop. In such a case the sale would be ineffectual without confirmation, and the appellant's procedure would have been to apply to the court to require that a return be made. Bennallack v. Richards, 125 Cal. 427, 433, 58 Pac. 65; In re Walker, 149 Cal. 214, 218, 85 Pac. 310. But we are not called upon to consider that situation. We are not now dealing with the case of an executrix, who, under such circumstances, may not bind either the estate or herself, without confirmation of her acts by the court, but with a situation presented by a party refusing to carry out a contract made for the benefit of another, the promisor being able to do so, and the contract one capable of exact performance. The sale by the executrix to Richmond was not invalid, but title to the property could not pass until confirmation had been had. The contract in the meantime would remain executory. In all other respects the agreement was attended with the same incidents, and should receive the same construction as a similar contract between any other vendor or vendee. Bennallack v. Richards, supra. There is no merit in respondent's theory that the executrix, even with the sanction of the court sitting in probate, could not sell, or agree to sell, the crop of prunes. It is well settled that crops, growing or to be grown, as well as other personal property, are subject to contract for, and to absolute sale. Jones v. Cal. Growers & Shippers, 182 Cal. 777, 778, 190 Pac. 172; Hamilton v. Klinke, 183 Pac. 675, 677.

[3] It is alleged in the amended complaint, and on demurrer must be deemed to be true, that the agreement of the defendant to assume and perform the contract for the sale of the prunes to Richmond, in the place and stead of the executrix, was one of the considerations moving from the defendant to the executrix for the sale of the land. The written offer of the respondent to the executrix specified that—

> "Said sale and payment of the purchase price shall include also all growing crops on said land, together with the existing contract for the sale of the 1919 prune crop to E. N. Richmond, which contract I assume and agree to perform in your place and stead."

Therefore, whether or not the contract with Richmond had been reported to the probate court for confirmation was, and is, immaterial. The respondent accepted it as an existing obligation, and agreed to perform it. The sale of land and crop was confirmed to him, and he was thereby immediately placed in position to do what he stipulated with both the executrix and the court he would do, as one of the impelling inducements and as a part of the consideration for the sale to himself. He no doubt considered it, at that time, to be to his financial advantage to assume the contract. He should not now be allowed to avoid the performance of the obligation so readily assumed, upon the speculative theory that the court might or might not have approved the contract between the executrix and plaintiff's assignor.

[4] The transaction between the respondent and the executrix of the estate resulted in a contract made for the benefit of Richmond, and, not having been rescinded by the parties to it, he might maintain an action for the breach of the agreement. That right does not rest upon the ground of any actual or supposed relationship between the parties, as some of the earlier cases seem to indicate, but upon the broad and more satisfactory basis that the law, operating upon the acts of the parties, has created the duty, established a privity, and implies the promise and obligation on which this action is founded. Washer v. Independent Mining, etc., Co., 142 Cal. 702, 708, 76 Pac. 654; Morgan v. Overman S. M. Co., 37 Cal. 534, 537; Lewis v. Covillaud, 21 Cal. 179, 189. The right arising out of the obligation was the property of Richmond, and was capable of being transferred as such to his assignee. Civ. Code, § 1458.

We are therefore of the opinion that the first count of the complaint states a cause of action, and that the demurrer was improperly sustained. The judgment is reversed.

PARKER v. PARKER. (Civ. 3757.)

1. Divorce 🔑231—When granted on husband's offense, court may make division of property and compel allowance for wife's support.

Where a divorce has been granted for an offense of the husband, by Civ. Code, § 139, the court is authorized, not only to make proper division of the community property, but also to compel the husband to make suitable allowance for the future support of the wife.

2. Divorce 🔑245(1)—Husband consenting to stipulation for lien on property for wife's support estopped from denying validity, and court could not modify decree.

In an action for divorce, where the authority of the court to impose a lien on the husband's property was derived solely from a stipulation of the parties, and not from the right of the court to impose upon the husband any duty to provide for the wife's future support, and the payments provided for in the decree were a part of and only incidental to the division of the community property, the husband having accepted the benefit of the decree so made, was estopped from denying the validity of the lien so established, and the judgment, notwithstanding the court's attempt to reserve the right to modify it, became unchangeable.

Action by Francis M. Parker against Willie O. Parker. From an order modifying decree of divorce, defendant appeals. Reversed.

CONREY, P. J. By interlocutory decree of date November 25, 1912, it was determined that the plaintiff was entitled to a divorce from the defendant. This was followed by a final decree dated August 5, 1915, whereby the parties were divorced. In the interlocutory decree, which as to these terms was followed by the final decree, it was stated that the parties stipulated in open court that, if a decree for divorce should be awarded to either party, the court, instead of dividing the property of the parties between them, might provide for the separate maintenance of the defendant by awarding to her certain property for life, and that plaintiff pay defendant such monthly allowance and secure the same by a lien upon such property of the plaintiff as in the discretion of the court should seem proper. Pursuant to that stipulation, the court awarded to the plaintiff certain parcels of real property and other property, and awarded to the defendant, for the period of her natural life, certain described real property, with remainder over to the plaintiff. It was further ordered thereby that the plaintiff pay to the defendant the sum of $50 per month during the remainder of her natural life, "and to secure the payment of said sum of $50 per month, a lien in favor of said defendant is hereby created and declared to exist upon the remainder over and interest of said plaintiff in said lot 30, Alcantara Grove tract, above described, and also upon that real property situated in the county of Orange, state of California, more particularly described as lots 5, 6, 7, and 8 of the P. A. Stanton tract, as per map recorded in book 5, at pages 23 and 24, miscellaneous records of Orange county, Cal." In October, 1920, the plaintiff made application to the court for an order modifying the provisions of the decree of divorce relating to property rights of the parties, and asked that the cash payments of $50 per month be discontinued and not further required, and that the lien in favor of the defendant on said lots in the Stanton tract be released. The matter having been regularly heard upon the application and the affidavits filed on behalf of the respective parties, the court on November 22, 1920, entered an order denying the application of plaintiff for discontinuance of the monthly payments of $50. But the court further ordered that said lien to secure the said monthly payments to the defendant on said lots in the Stanton tract be released. The defendant has appealed from all that portion of the order which orders the release of the lien on said lots.

[1, 2] If the divorce had been granted by reason of misconduct of the plaintiff, the court would have been authorized, not only to make proper division of the community property, but also to compel the husband to make suitable allowance for the future support of his wife. Civ. Code, § 139. This allowance cannot be made when the divorce is granted for the offense of the wife—only when it is for the offense of the husband. Ex parte Spencer, 83 Cal. 460, 464, 23 Pac. 395, 17 Am. St. Rep. 266. If in this case the court had authority to impose a lien in favor of the defendant upon a portion of the community property awarded to the plaintiff, as security for payments thereafter to be made by the plaintiff to the defendant, that authority was derived from the stipulation made, and not from any right of the court to impose upon the plaintiff any duty to provide for the future support of the defendant. Having accepted the benefit of the decree so made in accordance with his own consent, we think that the plaintiff should be held to be estopped to deny the validity and efficacy of the lien thus established. The parties agreed that the provision thus made was in lieu of any other division of the property. If the plaintiff at the time of the award had objected that such payments to be made and such lien securing the same were outside the scope of the stipulation as made, it may well be that the court would have decided that the defendant was entitled to a larger portion of the community property in the division then about to be made. Having accepted the benefits of the stipulation and decree as thus made, the plaintiff should not now be permitted to be relieved from the burdens imposed upon his property by the decree. In the decree of divorce and in the interlocutory decree, the court attempted to reserve to itself the right to modify the decree and the allowance to be paid to the defendant, and the liens declared to secure the payment thereof. If this had been the allowance provided for by the statute to be paid to the wife in a divorce action where she is not the party in fault, it may be conceded that such allowance might thereafter be modified. But since the payments provided for in this decree were a part of and only incidental to the division of the community property, no reason appears why the judgment, when it became final, did not also become unchangeable to the same extent as a final judgment in any other action.

That part of the order from which the defendant has appealed is reversed.

LARSON v. TAYLOR et al. (Civ. 3466.)

1. Landlord and tenant 🔑172(1)—Failure to pay tenant part of proceeds of products and plowing of certain land held not to constitute an eviction.

Where plaintiff leased 40 acres and purchased dairy stock thereon, and agreed to turn over moneys realized by her from the sale of milk and live stock, and defendants agreed to pay her $50 a month out of such proceeds and to apply the remainder on rent and the price of the stock, landlord's failure to pay $50 per month and his plowing of 4 acres, which destroyed the alfalfa thereon, was not an eviction, in the absence of evidence tending to show that such plowing deprived plaintiff of the use of the tract.

2. Landlord and tenant 🔑34(1)—Lease contract may be rescinded by consent of parties.

A lease contract whereby tenant turned over proceeds to landlord, who applied it on rent and price of live stock purchased from the landlord, could be rescinded by consent of the parties, under Civ. Code, § 1689.

3. Landlord and tenant 🔑34(5)—Lease contract held mutually rescinded.

Where plaintiff leased land and purchased dairy herd thereupon, and proceeds were turned over to defendants to be applied on rent and price of stock, and it became apparent that the plaintiff was unable to make a living and stated that unless the contracts were modified she would abandon the possession of both the leasehold and personal property, and defendants assented to the rescission by taking possession of the land and property thereon, there was no eviction, but a mutual rescission, in view of Civ. Code, § 1689, providing for rescission by consent of the parties.

James W. Glassford and H. L. Welch, both of El Centro, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Action to recover damages for the alleged eviction of plaintiff from the possession of premises which she held under a lease from defendants, who appeal from an adverse judgment.

It appears that on June 11, 1919, defendants executed a lease to plaintiff of 40 acres of land for a period of five years at the term rental therein specified of $6,000, to be paid in installments of $100 per month. On the same date a contract was executed between the parties whereby defendants sold to plaintiff a dairy herd of cows, together with other personal property, for the sum of $4,200 payment of which plaintiff promised to make in installments of $100 or more per month, and to secure which she executed a chattel mortgage upon the property so purchased by her. It was agreed that all moneys realized by her from the sale of products from said cows, as well as that received from the sale of live stock disposed of, should be paid monthly, which sums, less $50 per month which they were to pay plaintiff, were to be applied upon the rent due upon said lease, and any balance paid upon plaintiff's note so secured by the chattel mortgage. The dairy stock and other personal property were by defendants delivered to plaintiff, who, on the date mentioned, entered into possession of the real estate, and continued therein until September 5, 1919, a period of about four months, during which time defendants received checks for the milk products sold amounting during the period to the sum of $300, which was applied to the rental of the property under the terms of the lease, in addition to which and from other sources plaintiff paid them $600 upon the contract of sale of the personal property. Defendants, however, failed to pay plaintiff the sum of $50 per month from said creamery checks, as they had agreed to do.

The court found that on June 28, 1919, defendants entered upon the land and plowed about four acres thereof, as a result of which the alfalfa pasturage thereon was destroyed, and that on September 5, 1919, without the consent of plaintiff, they seized all of the dairy stock and personal property so purchased by plaintiff from defendants and for the payment of which she had executed the chattel mortgage, and converted the same to their own use; that by reason of the nonpayment of the $50 per month to plaintiff as stipulated in said contract, without which she had no means of subsistence, and the destruction of said four acres of pasturage on said premises on June 28, 1919, plaintiff was deprived of the beneficial use of said premises.

[1] Conceding that defendants breached their contract in the payment to plaintiff of $50 per month, and that by reason thereof she might have had a cause of action for damages, such fact, since it cannot be deemed to have interfered with her use and possession of the premises, did not constitute an act of eviction from the leasehold; and conceding also that defendants, as found by the court, destroyed 4 acres of the 40-acre tract of alfalfa, such fact, standing alone and without other evidence tending to show that it deprived plaintiff of the use of the tract, is likewise insufficient to constitute an eviction. Moreover, while plaintiff testifies that she did not consent to such act of defendants in destroying 4 acres of pasturage, she testifies the work was done with teams which she furnished therefor and by a man jointly employed by herself and defendants.

[2] As a further defense, it was alleged in the answer that, prior to defendants taking possession of the property, plaintiff notified them that she rescinded the contract and abandoned said leased premises and the live stock and implements in said contract described, and requested defendants to take charge thereof, and that their acts in taking possession of the property were due to the acts of plaintiff in so notifying them that she rescinded the contract and abandoned said leased premises and the live stock for the reason that she could not make a living upon the land under the terms of the contract. A contract may be rescinded by consent of all the parties. Section 1689, Civ. Code. The court made no finding upon the issue tendered, and in support of which evidence was offered by appellants. Such failure so to do constituted error.

[3] It is apparent from the evidence that plaintiff, under the conditions of the lease and terms of the chattel mortgage given upon the dairy herd and personal property, was unable to make a living upon the ranch, and, unless the contracts were modified by defendants in accordance with her request, she expressed the intention of abandoning possession of both the leasehold and personal property, and so notified defendants, who, while unwilling to change the contracts, by their acts in taking possession, assented to the plaintiff's acts of rescission.

Conceding that defendants were guilty of a breach of their contract to pay plaintiff $50 per month out of the creamery checks, thus rendering it impossilbe for her to successfully operate the ranch on account of insufficient funds, it devolved upon her to secure the same elsewhere, looking to defendants for such damages as she might be legally entitled to on account of the breach. At all events, it was not an act upon which to base a claim of eviction from the leasehold.

ALEXSON v. STEWARD et al. (Civ. 2327.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 17, 1921.)

1. Limitation of actions 🔑127(2)—Amended complaint held not to state new cause of action.

An amended complaint alleging that a contract was executed by L., doing business under the name of L. Company, in his own behalf, did not state a new or different cause of action than the original complaint, which alleged that the contract was executed by L., as president, on the behalf of the L. Company, a corporation, so as to be barred by limitations; it appearing that the corporation had at the time of the contract forfeited its charter, and that L. was the sole stockholder.

2. Shipping 🔑120—Person transporting granite held liable for all damage and work of shipper in repairing damage.

Owner of barge contracting to transport and "to secure granite well on barge, so as to avoid damage in transit, and shall be responsible for any and all damage done person or property by reason of the prosecution of his work," was just as liable as a common carrier, if not a common carrier, for injury to the granite by sinking of the barge, and there was a sufficient consideration for employment of the shipper to raise the granite, as would be the case with a common carrier, under Civ. Code, § 2194.

3. Corporations 🔑617(2)—Contract with corporation whose charter was forfeited held not void.

Contract with a corporation which had forfeited its charter for nonpayment of its license tax held not void, where executed by one who had been its president and owned all of the stock and was conducting the business under the old corporate name, where no prejudice resulted from the fact that the president, rather than the corporation named, was the real party in interest.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by Nick Alexson against L. P. Steward and another, as individuals and as copartners doing business under the firm name and style of Steward Bros. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. E. Kleinsorge, of Sacramento, for appellants.

Johnson & Lemmon, of Sacramento, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The defendants appeal from a judgment against them in favor of plaintiff. The original complaint alleged that the defendants were copartners "engaged in the business of transporting freight as a public carrier, on the Sacramento river"; that the Leed Granite Company was a corporation; that in July, 1917, the Leed Granite Company delivered to defendants a shipment of granite, under an agreement whereby the defendants agreed to transport the same from Sacramento to Hunter's Point; that the "defendants so negligently and carelessly handled the barge upon which said granite was being transported that said barge sunk in the Sacramento River on or about July 5, 1917"; that thereafter the defendants employed the said Leed Granite Company to raise the cargo of granite and agreed to pay all "expenses incurred in raising the said granite as aforesaid and in putting the said granite in the condition the granite was in prior to the sinking of the said barge"; that the Leed Granite Company performed said work at a cost of $1,570.86; and that prior to the commencement of the action the Leed Granite Company assigned its claim for such expenses to the plaintiff.

The defendants answered, denying most of the allegations of the complaint, and alleging that on the 5th day of March, 1917, the charter of the Leed Granite Company was forfeited by failure to pay its corporation license tax.

On September 15, 1919, the plaintiff, by leave of the court, filed his amended complaint, in substance the same as the original complaint, except that the name of Werner Leed was substituted for that of Leed Granite Company. The defendants moved the court to strike the amended complaint from the files on the ground that it "wholly changes the cause of action and states an entirely new cause of action, and that said cause of action as set forth in said first amended complaint is barred by the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure" and subdivision 3 of section 340. The motion was denied and the defendants answered, denying the material allegations of the amended complaint, except the allegation that the defendants are partners, and setting up the statute of limitations as in the motion.

The evidence shows that Werner Leed owned all of the capital stock of the Leed Granite Company; that the corporation forfeited its charter March 5, 1917, by failure to pay its license tax; that thereafter Werner Leed continued the business in the corporate name and that he was the only person interested therein; that on April 30, 1917, the following contract was executed:

"Office and Quarry, Rocklin, Cal.,
"April 30, 1917.

"Articles of agreement made and entered into by and between Leed Granite Company of Rocklin, party of the first part, and Steward Bros. of Sacramento, party of the second part.

"Witnesseth: That the party of the second part agrees to handle all granite in three shipments for Union Iron Works dry dock from cars on barge and deliver said granite from Sacramento to Hunter's Point, San Francisco Bridge Co. to unload barge as soon as possible.

"Party of the first part will furnish hooks for handling said granite.

"Party of the second part agrees to secure granite well on barge so as to avoid damage in transit, and shall be responsible for any and all damage done person or property by reason of the prosecution of his work.

"Party of the first part agrees to pay sum of two dollars ($2) per ton payment to be made on delivery of granite at Hunter's Point. In witness whereof, the parties have hereunto set their hands this 30th day of April, 1917.

"Leed Granite Co.,
"Werner Leed, President.
"Steward Bros.,
"By J. L. Steward."

The evidence further shows that the defendant's barge, loaded with granite, was sunk as alleged, but the court found that the defendants were not negligent in the matter. Thereafter Werner Leed asked the defendants to raise the granite, and one of the partners, J. L. Steward, according to Leed's testimony, said, "I want to find what it was going to cost, and which was the easiest way to get it up;" that he would let Leed know "as soon as he got information." After various conversations between them, Steward said to Leed, about July 17 or 18 or 19: "Yes; you can go ahead; you people may do better than I can; I never heard anything about my man; maybe you can be able to do better than I can; if you can get things going on, go ahead." Leed asked for "some kind of writing," and Steward executed and delivered to Leed the following:

"Sacramento, Cal., July 18, 1917.

"Leed Granite Company, Rocklin, Cal.—Gentlemen: In response to your inquiry, will state that it is perfectly agreeable with us for you to make arrangements for raising your granite from the river at Vorden. Respectfully yours, Steward Bros., by J. L. Steward."

Leed proceeded thereafter to raise the granite and put it in its former condition, at an expense of the amount sued for, and assigned his claim therefor to the plaintiff. The defendants believed at all times that their transactions were with the Leed Granite Company rather than with Werner Leed as an individual.

[1] The plea of the statute of limitations is based upon the assumption that the amended complaint states an entirely new cause of action. The original and amended complaints, however, are founded upon the same contract. The cause of action in each arose out of the same state of facts. The original complaint was drawn on the theory that the contract sued on was executed by Werner Leed as president on behalf of the Leed Granite Company. The amended complaint was drafted on the theory that the same contract was executed by Leed, doing business under the name of the Leed Granite Company, in his own behalf. The cause of action was the same in both. Walsh v. Decoto, 194 Pac. 298; Thompson v. Southern Pacific Co., 180 Cal. 730, 183 Pac. 153.

[2] The court found that the defendant partnership was a "public carrier." The appellant assails this finding as unsupported by the evidence. Leed testified:

"I asked him (J. L. Steward) if it was a fact he was in the business, transportation, * * * and he says: 'Yes; I handle that kind of business.' * * * He says: 'We have regular transportation; have lots of barges; we can handle all granite.'

"Q. Transportation where? A. All over.

"Q. You mean on the river? A. On the river."

J. L. Steward testified:

> "My brother and I operated gasoline towboats, barges on the Sacramento and San Joaquin rivers. * * * We made contracts and agreements for miscellaneous hauling from different points, towed barges and towboats, turning steamers, and did miscellaneous work."

The witness further testified that they did not operate between fixed points or make fixed trips, or have fixed charges, or "undertake to do any and all business that might be submitted." Under the provisions of the Civil Code, §§ 2168 to 2194, relative to common carriers, it may be doubtful whether the foregoing evidence is sufficient to uphold the finding that the defendant partnership was a common carrier. The finding, however, is not necessary to the conclusion reached by the court and is material only upon the question of consideration for the contract authorizing Leed to raise the cargo. If the defendants were common carriers they were absolutely liable, under the circumstances disclosed, for the injury to the granite. Civ. Code, § 2194. Such liability would afford sufficient consideration for the agreement with Leed last referred to. But if the defendants were not common carriers, the contract under which they undertook to carry the granite imposed upon them the same measure of liability as that provided by section 2194. There was no conflict in the evidence as to the execution of that contract or its terms. It provided:

> "Party of the second part agrees to secure granite well on barge so as to avoid damage in transit, and shall be responsible for any and all damage done person or property by reason of the prosecution of his work."

The liability thus assumed furnishes sufficient consideration for defendants' employment of Leed to raise the granite.

[3] Appellants urge that the contracts with the Leed Granite Company are void because executed after the corporation had forfeited its charter for nonpayment of its license tax. The evidence shows that Leed was the owner of all the capital stock of the corporation, and that after the forfeiture of its charter he continued the business as an individual, but under the corporation name. In the case of Ginaca v. Peterson (C. C. A.) 262 Fed. 904, after the corporation had forfeited its charter by failure to pay its license tax in this state, the president and owner of all the capital stock of the corporation executed a deed conveying property of the corporation. The court said:

> "It is said that a stockholder of a corporation which has forfeited its charter cannot as a corporation convey real property of the corporation, and that one not shown to be a director in office at the time of the forfeiture of the charter of the corporation cannot properly execute a deed as president and trustee. The evidence, however, shows that at the time of the execution of the deed of March 10, 1915, S. W. Parker was the president of the Hornitos Gold Mining Company and owner of all of the capital stock of the corporation. We believe that he had ample power to do with the property of the corporation and to make conveyance of property, and that it is not in the power of any one to complain of any disposition made by Parker of the property, except, of course, creditors existing at the time of the disposition. Havemeyer v. Superior Court, 84 Cal. 327, 24 Pac. 121, 10 L. R. A. 627, 18 Am. St. Rep. 192; Civ. Code Cal. § 400; Reed & Co. v. Harshall, 12 Cal. App. 697, 108 Pac. 719; Relley v. In Willey v. Crocker-Woolworth National Bank, 141 Cal. 513, 75 Pac. 108, it is said:

> "There is no law of this state which prevents the use of a trade name by an individual, and, in the absence of any such prohibition, an individual may conduct business under any designation he sees fit."

While the appellants believed that they were contracting with the Leed Granite Company, and not with Werner Leed individually, their rights were in no manner prejudiced by the fact that Leed, rather than the corporation named, was the real party in interest.

Under their agreement to carry the granite, the appellants made themselves liable for the damages suffered by the shippers, and their various conversations with Leed relative to raising the cargo, together with their letter of July 18, 1917, constituted a contract obligating them to pay the reasonable value of such work. In the absence of such contract, they would have been liable in damages, under the original agreement, for the reasonable cost of raising the granite and putting it in the condition in which it was when received by them. The judgment imposes no greater obligation.

ASHLEY et al. v. SUTTER BUTTE CANAL CO. (Civ. 2376.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 3, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error ⚷930(1)—Court accepts successful party's version of contract in case of conflict.

On appeal from a judgment for plaintiff, where there was a conflict in the evidence as to the terms of an oral contract, plaintiff's version thereof must be accepted.

2. Waters and water courses ⚷254—Waiver of damages for noncompletion of irrigation ditch held not to apply to failure to furnish water under modified contract.

Where a contract by defendant to furnish water to plaintiff for irrigation provided that plaintiff would not claim any damages on account of the noncompletion of the ditches, etc., and the contract was superseded by an oral contract providing for the furnishing of water by means of pumps to be constructed and ditches already constructed, the waiver of damages for noncompletion of the ditches was not a part of the new contract, as it comtemplated a contingency that would not possibly arise, and, even if a part of the new contract, did not exonerate defendant from liability for its failure to deliver sufficient water by the substituted method.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Action by P. N. Ashley and others against the Sutter Butte Canal Company. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Henry Ingram, of Gridley, W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, and Guy R. Kennedy, of Chico, for appellant.

George F. Jones, of Oroville, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The action was for damages for the failure of defendant to furnish sufficient water for the irrigation of a rice crop on 450 acres of land belonging to plaintiff, Ashley. The claim was for $30,000, and a jury awarded to plaintiffs the sum of $1,800. Only one point is made by appellant, namely, that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict. The contention is based upon the claim of the insufficiency of the evidence to establish a contract between the parties, but more particularly, as we understand the contention, that in the asserted contract which is the basis of this action respondents waived any claim for damages. As appellant states:

"In the spring of 1918 P. N. Ashley owned some land, and was about to purchase, and afterwards did purchase, for cropping to rice during that season other lands which he and certain tenants and associates afterwards during that year sought to crop to rice. Of course water was necessary for the enterprise. No irrigation ditches had as yet been constructed to any of these lands, and Mr. Ashley, along about April, 1918, took up with appellant a proposition whereby it was to construct ditches and canals to these lands in order that they might receive water for irrigation."

It is not disputed that a contract in writing was formulated and signed by Mr. Ashley, but afterward it was abandoned by mutual consent because it was found impracticable to irrigate by the method therein provided, and it was superseded by an oral contract.

[1, 2] As to the terms of this oral contract there is a conflict, but, obviously, we must accept the version of the respondents. The following substantially covers Mr. Ashley's testimony in reference to it:

"Q. Now, when you did ascertain between yourself and Mr. Tulloch that the water could not get on the 606 acre tract of land by gravity, and then what was agreed to or done by you and him? A. I met Mr. Tulloch and I said to Mr. Tulloch, 'I understand that we cannot flow the water from the west part of the Crocker tract from that ditch,' and he said that was true, but he would put pumps in there and pump that water for me over that tract from Dry creek.

"Q. Did you have any different contract or agreement for the pumping of the water on there than you had for the furnishing of water to the rest of your land? A. The conversation was brief. I told him all right, that that was all right, and it ended there.

"Q. Did you understand that you would be served with water for that tract of land in all respects practically on the same terms that you were being served on your other tracts, excepting that it was to be pumped on there for you? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And in all other respects the contracts were practically the same. A. I repeated the conversation—I told you just the conversation.

"Q. Your understanding? A. I understood that the contract was to be carried out excepting as to the pumping.

"Q. That it would be in effect just the same as if Exhibit B had been signed, or number 1, rather—except that you were to get the water by being pumped instead of coming by gravity? A. Yes, sir."

He further testified:

That Mr. Tulloch told him that he would turn the water into said Dry slough from the ditch above, and would install two pumps; that after these pumps were in operation he "notified Mr. Tulloch that the pumps were not carrying their rated capacity; that they should carry a great deal more than they were carrying; that there was something the matter with the pump; and Mr. Tulloch came out and viewed the situation, and he said that he would get a different pulley and put it on the pump to see if it would not do better."

It is not controverted that respondents relied upon this agreement in incurring the expense of preparing the land for a rice crop, but appellant seems to think the case is rendered difficult by reason of the following provision in said Exhibit B:

> "It is further mutually understood, stipulated and agreed by and between the parties hereto that, owing to the lateness of the season, said party of the second part will not claim any damages for or on account of the noncompletion of the ditch or ditches hereinabove referred to, and will not claim that the failure to complete said ditch or ditches was caused by lack of due diligence or reasonable efforts on the part of the party of the first part to complete said ditch or ditches to the lands and premises hereinabove described; and in this connection it is further stipulated and agreed, and hereby admitted by the party of the second part, that this contract would not be entered into by said Sutter Butte Canal Company, in view of the lateness of the season, without the waiver in this paragraph contained being made by the party of the second part."

This language is entirely plain, and it cannot be doubted that it provided for a waiver of damages in the event of only one contingency, and that is the failure to complete the ditch which it was supposed originally to build in order to carry water by gravity to said land. It could not possibly apply to the oral agreement, which was substituted, for the reason that, under the executed agreement, there was no ditch to construct. Dry creek was a natural waterway, and the ditches and flumes crossing it, which appellant used in conveying water, had been constructed for years. Respondents understood —and rightly so—that appellant was to supply the pumps by opening the gates in the flumes where they crossed said Dry creek and allowing sufficient water to pass down to satisfy the needs of the land.

The only reasonable construction of the agreement between the parties, as we view it, is that all the terms embodied in said written instrument, which were applicable to the substituted method of irrigation, were to control the parties, but said covenant, being entirely extraneous, and contemplating a contingency that would not possibly arise, could not have been in the minds of said parties. The conditions which were obviously included in the agreement are found in the following portion of said writing:

> "The first party agrees to furnish sufficient water to the second party during said period and for such additional number of years thereafter during the term of the corporate existence of the first party, its successors and assigns, as the second party may desire, for the irrigation of said land for rice, not exceeding the ratio of three cubic feet of water per second for each 160 acres of land, and the second party agrees to pay therefor to the first party annually during said period, and annually in said additional years, at its office, in gold coin of the United States, at the rate of $7 per acre, and if more than said ratio of three cubic feet of water per second for 160 acres is used by the second party in any year, the second party shall pay the first party for said excess such additional proportion of the foregoing rate per acre as the excess of water used bears to three cubic feet of water per second for 160 acres."

Of course the result is the same if we regard said covenant of waiver as a part of the new agreement. The situation would then be that appellant agreed to furnish the water by means of pumps that were to be thereafter constructed and by means of ditches that had already been constructed, provided that appellant should not be liable for damages by reason of its failure to construct a ditch for conveying said water. There was and could be no such failure, and therefore the condition did not exist that relieved appellant from its obligation to supply what water was needed by respondents. There is no pretense, it may be said of a provision exonerating appellant from liability for its failure to deliver sufficient water by the substituted method, and this failure is the basis for respondents' action.

It is true, as before stated, that appellant also claims that there was no contract between the parties; or, as declared in the closing brief:

> "This isn't a case where appellant is seeking an excuse for nonperformance of contract because of any difficulty in performance. It is a case where there was no contract at all; simply an offer of a makeshift accepted by respondents for what it might be worth to them."

This statement, however, is based upon the testimony that was favorable to appellant, while we, of course, are required to regard the evidence for respondents as controlling. That such evidence justifies the conclusion that a contract was entered into similar to the written proposal, with the modification already noted, we think is quite apparent.

There can be no escape from the conclusion that the judgment is supported, and it is therefore affirmed.

CRAWFORD v. MEADOWS.

(Civ. 3476; L. A. 6818.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Nov. 1, 1921. Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing Dec. 30, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑649—No abuse of discretion shown in refusal to relieve party from default in presenting record on appeal.

There was no abuse of discretion on the part of the court in denying motions to be relieved from default due to failure, within the time allowed by law, to prepare and present for authentication a record to be used on appeal on the ground of excusable neglect or mistake, where the affidavit was barren of any facts to show neglect or mistake other than that counsel filed with the clerk a notice that defendant intended to appeal, and requested preparation of a transcript as provided in Code Civ. Proc. § 953a.

2. Appeal and error 🔑672—Matters to be considered in absence of instructions and evidence.

In the absence of the instructions and the evidence adduced at the trial, appeal must be considered on the judgment roll alone.

3. Pleading 🔑193(1)—Defects not reached by general demurrer.

Defects of form, in a complaint, sufficient in substance, cannot be reached by general demurrer.

4. Abatement and revival 🔑75(2)—Supplemental complaint on substitution of administratrix properly alleged presentation for allowance.

Where judgment was had against defendant and was reversed on appeal, pending which defendant died, a supplemental complaint, substituting his administratrix and alleging a presentation to the administratrix for allowance or rejection of the claim as provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 1502, was properly allowed.

5. Replevin 🔑97—Verdict held not indefinite and uncertain as to damages for detention.

A verdict in a claim and delivery case, "We, the jury in the above-entitled action, find for the plaintiff, and find he is entitled to the return of the automobile described in the complaint, and find the value thereof to be the sum of $2,200, together with interest thereon from February 5, 1915, at 7 per cent. per annum," was not indefinite and uncertain under Code Civ. Proc. § 627, and as against a contention that there was an absence of a finding as to damages for the detention of the property, since the court was justified in construing the interest stated as the damages sustained by reason of the detention.

6. Replevin 🔑76—Damages for detention.

In claim and delivery the ordinary measure of damages for wrongful detention is interest; but, where the property has a usable value which exceeds the lawful rate of interest, the usable value is the measure of damages.

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

7. Appeal and error 🔑440—District court may correct records nunc pro tunc pending appeal.

While the district court has no power or jurisdiction to make an order vacating a judgment or materially altering it pending an appeal, it has power to correct its own records nunc pro tunc so as to make its records state what actually occurred.

8. Appeal and error 🔑440—Alteration of judgment held mere correction authorized pending appeal.

Where verdict of jury in claim and delivery was that plaintiff was entitled to the return of the property, and that its value was a certain amount with interest as damages in accordance with Code Civ. Proc. § 627, and the judgment actually rendered was in accordance with this verdict, but in attempting to enter it the clerk entered a simple judgment for the recovery of the property and the accrued interest, and failed to enter the judgment as actually rendered for possession of the property, or for its value, in case a delivery could not be had, and for the interest as damages, a subsequent alteration of the judgment to conform to the verdict and the judgment actually rendered was not the entry of a new judgment, but was simply a correction nunc pro tunc, which the court had jurisdiction to make pending appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Phil D. Swing, Judge.

Action by Harry J. Crawford against Rebecca J. Meadows, as administratrix of the estate of Mobley Meadows, deceased. From a judgment for plaintiff and orders denying her motion for relief from default in preparing her record for use on appeal, defendant appeals. Affirmed in District Court of Appeal and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

See, also, 41 Cal. App. 13, 181 Pac. 845.

Thomas A. Sanson, of Los Angeles, and James L. Allen, of Brawley, for appellant.

Samuel J. Crawford, of Ocean Park, and Alfred F. MacDonald, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal from a judgment entered in favor of plaintiff, and from orders denying defendant's motions for relief from default in preparing her record for use on appeal.

It appears that this action in claim and delivery was originally brought against Mobley Meadows as sheriff of Imperial county. An answer was filed, and upon the issues so joined a trial was had, which resulted in a judgment for defendant, from which plaintiff appealed, as a result of which the judgment was reversed. Meanwhile Meadows had died and Rebecca J. Meadows was appointed administratrix of his estate. Thereupon in due time plaintiff, in accordance with the statute, duly presented to her as such administratrix a demand for the delivery to him of an automobile made the subject of the claim and action then pending. Thereupon she as such administratrix was substituted as defendant, and a supplemental complaint was filed, setting forth the facts upon which plaintiff based his claim to the property, together with other matters which under the circumstances were proper in a supplemental complaint. To this complaint defendant filed a general demurrer, which was overruled. Thereupon defendant answered the same, wherein, in addition to denials, she alleged a number of separate defenses to plaintiff's cause of action. The case was tried by a jury, which rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, fixing the value of the automobile, constituting the subject of the action, at the sum of $2,200, together with interest thereon from February 5, 1915, the date of the taking. Following this verdict, judgment was entered by the clerk on May 13, 1920. A motion for a new trial, made by defendant, was denied by operation of law on August 13, 1920.

On September 10th following, defendant filed a notice of appeal from the judgment and order denying her motion for new trial, followed on November 10, 1920, by the filing of a transcript of the record in support of the appeal, after which, to wit, on February 7, 1921, the Supreme Court, in which court the appeal was pending, made an order dismissing the same.

In entering the original judgment on May 13, 1920, the clerk failed to comply with the directions contained in section 667, Code of Civil Procedure, wherein provision is made for the entry of judgment in such cases in the alternative form. Nor did it provide that payment should be made by defendant as administratrix in due course of administration of the estate of Mobley Meadows, deceased, in accordance with the provisions of section 1504, Code of Civil Procedure.

Thereafter, to wit, on November 12, 1920, upon motion of plaintiff, the court made an order pursuant to which the judgment was amended nunc pro tunc as of date May 13, 1920, when originally entered. The amendments consisted of a compliance with the provisions of the statute requiring the judgment in such cases to be in the alternative form, so that as amended it provided for the recovery by plaintiff of the automobile and damages, and in case a delivery could not be had of the property that plaintiff should recover the value thereof, with interest, payment of which should be made by said administratrix out of the estate of Mobley Meadows, deceased, in due course of administration.

Thereafter, to wit, on November 23, 1920, the defendant filed with the clerk of said court a notice that she intended to appeal from the judgment as amended, and requested that a transcript of the proceedings be prepared in accordance with the provisions of section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure. Whether or not such transcript was ever prepared and presented for authentication is not disclosed by the record. It does appear, however, that on December 17, 1920, defendant, correctly or erroneously assuming that her time for so doing had expired, and upon notice supported by the affidavit of her counsel, moved the court for an order relieving her from default in filing with the clerk notice of defendant's intention to appeal from the judgment entered against defendant on May 13, 1920, and requesting the reporter's transcript to be prepared in accordance with section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that the court reporter be ordered and directed to transcribe the phonographic notes of the report of the trial, and also made a motion that she be relieved from default in failing to prepare and present to the judge of said court a bill of exceptions of the proceedings had at the trial of the cause within 10 days after the defendant's motion for a new trial had been denied, which motions were made upon the ground of the alleged mistake, inadvertence, and excusable neglect of defendant's counsel, both of which motions, upon consideration of appellant's affidavit in support thereof and the counter affidavit filed by plaintiff, were, on December 17, 1920, denied by the court, which proceedings in regard to the making and denial of said motions are embodied in a bill of exceptions presented by the record.

Thereafter, on December 31, 1920, defendant filed two notices of appeal, one of which was directed "to the plaintiff and to the clerk of said court," and the other "to the plaintiff and to his attorneys," in both of which she gave notice of an appeal to the Supreme Court from the judgment as amended by order of court on November 12, 1920, and also from the orders of the court denying her motions for relief from default made on December 17, 1920.

[1] There was no abuse of discretion on the part of the court in denying motions that defendant be relieved from her default due to her failure within the time allowed by law therefor to prepare and present for authentication a record to be used on appeal, without which the orders should not be disturbed by this court. The affidavit, dated December 6, 1920, of defendant's attorney in support of the motions is barren of any facts which even tend to show excusable neglect or mistake on the part of defendant. Other than the statement that on November 23, 1920, her counsel filed with the clerk of the court a notice that defendant intended to appeal, and requesting the preparation of a transcript of the proceedings at the trial, as provided in section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure, all of the statements therein relate to the motion theretofore made for a new trial and to matters occurring prior to the entry of the amended judgment made on November 12, 1920, and from which this appeal is prosecuted. While it appears that within 10 days from the entry of the amended judgment he filed with the clerk notice and request for a transcript of the record, including the reporter's notes to be used on the appeal, it does not appear that the transcript was ever prepared. On the contrary, affiant states that—

> "He has not been able to obtain the transcript from the said court reporter, and has not received it at this time (December 6, 1920), and is unable to assign any reason for the failure of the said court reporter to furnish it."

Upon the showing so made by affidavit, we cannot say there was any abuse of discretion on the part of the court in denying the motions; indeed, it is difficult to see how it could properly have done otherwise. Moreover, while not necessary to a decision of the case, we are unable to perceive how a reversal of the orders could in any wise avail appellant on this appeal. She has appealed from the judgment on the judgment roll, and that appeal must be determined on its merits, regardless of the fact that the trial court may have wrongfully refused to settle a bill of exceptions or have a proper record authenticated. The proper remedy in such case is to apply to this court for a writ of mandate to compel the trial court, or officers charged therewith, to authenticate a proper record which can be brought up with the record on appeal from the judgment.

[2] We are thus brought to the appeal from the judgment, which in the absence of instructions given by the court to the jury and the evidence adduced at the trial must be considered on the judgment roll alone. Contrary to respondent's contention, we shall, without so deciding, assume the time for taking the appeal commenced from the entry of the judgment as amended on November 12, 1920, rather than, as he claims, from the time of the entry of the original judgment on May 13, 1920, from which last judgment it appears that an appeal was taken and thereafter dismissed by the Supreme Court.

[3, 4] Appellant suggests, without making any argument thereon, that the court erred in overruling her general demurrer to the supplemental complaint. There was no error in so doing. While in form the complaint may have been objectionable, it is sufficient in substance, and defects, if any, therein could not be reached by a general demurrer. Neither was it objectionable in that, as claimed, it added a cause of action against defendant individually and not in her representative capacity. The cause of action as stated was against her solely and alone in her capacity as administratrix of the estate of Mobley Meadows, deceased, out of whose estate it was ordered the judgment be paid in course of administration. Neither was there any error on the part of the court in permitting the supplemental complaint substituting the administratrix of deceased, to be filed, and alleging therein, as provided by section 1502, Code of Civil Procedure, the presentation for allowance or rejection of plaintiff's claim. "In such cases, a supplemental complaint should be filed, alleging the death and due presentation of the claim." Falkner v. Hendy, 107 Cal. 49, 40 Pac. 21, 386. In Thomas v. Fursman, 39 Cal. App. 278, 286, 178 Pac. 870, 874, it is said:

> "The proper practice undoubtedly is to serve and file such a complaint, alleging compliance with the statute. Proof of presentation of the claim as required is made by the statute essential to recovery, and this implies an allegation of the fact upon which issue may be joined if desired, and a finding where issue is joined."

[5, 6] The verdict of the jury was:

> "We, the jury in the above-entitled action, find for the plaintiff, and find he is entitled to the return of the automobile described in the complaint, and find the value thereof to be the sum of $2,200.00, together with interest thereon from February 5, 1915, at 7 per cent. per annum."

Appellant insists that such verdict is not in accordance with section 627, Code of Civil Procedure, in that it is indefinite and uncertain, and hence constituted no basis for the judgment, as amended, entered thereon. That the verdict was sufficient in finding that plaintiff was entitled to the return of the automobile and as to the value thereof admits of no doubt, and hence is not uncertain either as to plaintiff's right or the value of the property in the event that delivery could not be had. Nor is there merit in the contention that there is an absence of any finding as to damages for the detention of the property. In Tucker v. Hagerty, 37 Cal. App. 789, 174 Pac. 908, it is said:

> "In an action for the wrongful detention of property, the ordinary measure of damages is interest, but where the property has a usable value which exceeds the lawful rate of interest, such rule has no application."

In other words, the usable value may, as in the case cited, exceed the value of the property itself. Since the property at the time of the wrongful taking was of the value of $2,200, plaintiff, in case of nondelivery, was entitled to such sum, together with interest, which interest might be, as taken by the court, the amount of damages sustained for its detention. Kelly v. McKibben, 54 Cal. 192; Webb v. Phillips, 80 Fed. 954, 26 C. C. A. 272. See, also, 23 Ruling Case Law, § 77, p. 914, where it is said:

> "The amount of damage which the owner of goods wrongfully taken and detained is entitled to recover in ordinary cases is the value of the property, with damages, which is ordinarily the interest on the value."

No damages were found by the jury on account of the usable value of the automobile due to its detention, and upon the authorities cited the trial court was justified in construing the interest stated in the verdict as the damages sustained by plaintiff for detention of the property, if delivery thereof was made.

A number of separate defenses were set up in the answer of defendant, which the jury by its implied finding decided adversely to her. In the absence of instructions given or any evidence offered, we must assume there was no error in the trial which affected the verdict.

The judgment and orders appealed from are affirmed.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; JAMES, J.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. [7] The petition for a rehearing of this cause in the Supreme Court after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the Second Appellate District, Division 1, is denied.

The defendant insists that the district court failed to consider at all her objection that the court had no power or jurisdiction to make an order amending the judgment as entered on May 13, 1920, nunc pro tunc, while the appeal therefrom was pending, so as to make it conform to the judgment as rendered on that day, and that the corrected judgment so entered is void for that reason.

In support of this point she cites Kinard v. Jordan, 175 Cal. 13, 164 Pac. 894, and other cases to the effect that when an appeal is taken the entire cause is removed to the appellate court, so that the lower court has no jurisdiction thereafter until after the appeal has terminated, to take any proceeding in the cause. These decisions are correct so far as they refer to orders which in some respect alter the judgment appealed from as actually rendered. The superior court, pending the appeal, has no power to vacate the judgment or materially alter it so as to make it different from the judgment as actually rendered. But this rule does not affect the power of the court to correct its own records nunc pro tunc so as to make its record state what actually occurred.

[8] The action in this case was in claim and delivery under the Code. The verdict of the jury was that the plaintiff was entitled to the return of the property, and that its value was $2,200, with interest, as damages, in accordance with section 627, Code of Civil Procedure. The judgment actually rendered was in accordance with this verdict, and it should have been entered in that form. In attempting to enter it, however, the clerk, by a mistake that is perfectly apparent from the previous proceedings shown in the record, entered a simple judgment for the recovery of the property and the accrued interest, and failed to enter the judgment as actually rendered, that is, a judgment for the possession of the property, or for its value in case a delivery of the possession could not be had, and for the interest as damages. The subsequent entry nunc pro tunc was not the entry of a new judgment different from that already rendered, or the vacation of the previous judgment, as was the order entered in Kinard v. Jordan, supra. It was the entry of the judgment as actually rendered on May 13, 1920, and a correction of the clerical error of the clerk in the original entry. The pendency of an appeal does not destroy the power of a court to make such correction of its record when the mistake is obvious from the other parts of the record and the proper correction can be made therefrom. In Fay v. Stubenrauch, 141 Cal. 575, 75 Pac. 174, the court said:

> "Nor is the right of the lower court to amend suspended or impeded by an appeal where an amendment does not affect any substantial rights of the appellant, and consists of the correction of a clerical mistake appearing upon the face of the record."

For other cases of similar effect see San Francisco v. Brown, 153 Cal. 651, 96 Pac. 281; Boust v. Superior Court, 162 Cal. 345, 122 Pac. 956; Holland v. Superior Court, 169 Cal. 364, 146 Pac. 878. There is no attempt to show that the corrections made in the entry in any wise prejudiced the appellant. If the District Court had accepted her theory that the corrected judgment was void because an appeal was then pending, it would merely have reversed the judgment, with directions to the lower court to re-enter it in the same form. It reached the same result by affirming the judgment as corrected.

Husband and wife ⚿264—Evidence held to show property was not community.

In action by former wife of decedent, who had procured divorce from him, against decedent's brothers, to quiet title to real property devised by decedent to defendants, plaintiff claiming it was community property, evidence held to show that the property was not community; a settlement between plaintiff and decedent having been had prior to divorce.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Albert Lee Stephens, Judge.

Suit by Minnie Shields Prichard against Mrs. M. H. Prichard and others. From judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Alpheus G. Reily, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

George A. Prichard and M. M. Meyers, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

JAMES, J. Appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment denying to her the relief prayed for in her amended complaint. That complaint, in so far as its contents are material to questions here presented, sets forth causes of action to quiet title to a parcel of real property located in the county of San Bernardino, and also to declare a trust against the same property as against the defendants, who were heirs of and distributees under a will made by Joseph G. Prichard, deceased. The evidence offered was in support of the alleged cause of action asserting the right to have a trust declared. The contention here made is that the trial court's findings are not supported and that the evidence presented entitled the plaintiff to a judgment.

The plaintiff in the year 1911 was the wife of Joseph G. Prichard. The couple resided, during the most of their married life at Omaha, where they acquired a small tract of land. This land was the property of the marital community. The husband in October, 1910, came to the city of Los Angeles to visit his brothers, who are named as defendants herein. The wife remained at Omaha to dispose of the land. After having found a purchaser for the same and having collected the proceeds, she came to Los Angeles in April, 1911. The amount of money which remained in her hands, resulting from the sale of the property in Omaha, after paying debts owing by herself and husband there, was about the sum of $3,200. It appeared that she resided with her husband in Los Angeles for a few months and then left him and went to reside with a sister, who also lived in the city named. In October, 1913, she brought an action for divorce against her husband, which was not contested, and an interlocutory decree was entered on the 2d day of December, 1913. The complaint in the action for divorce contained this allegation: "That there are no children the issue of said marriage and no community property to be settled or disposed of by this action." On the 8th of September, 1914, Joseph G. Prichard died, leaving a will which devised to these defendants the real property mentioned in the complaint in this action. Probate proceedings were duly had and decree of distribution was entered on the 10th day of April, 1917. This action was commenced on March 23, 1920, almost three years after the property and estate of Joseph G. Prichard had been so distributed. Plaintiff in her testimony admitted that she was informed about a month after the death of her husband that that event had occurred, but claimed that she had had no information of the pendency of the probate proceedings until August, 1919. She based her right to have the trust declared as to the property referred to upon the claim that such property was the community property of herself and husband, and that one-half of it should have been awarded to her. The court found that there had been a settlement of all property interests between the husband and wife prior to the divorce proceedings being had.

There is abundant evidence in the record to sustain this finding, and the case need be given no further consideration than to call attention to some of the facts and circumstances which that evidence presents. It was admitted by both parties that the husband used such money as he received from the sale of the Omaha property in purchasing the land described in plaintiff's complaint. While the plaintiff testified that after coming to Los Angeles she handed over to her husband the net proceeds of that sale, it appears in contradiction of such testimony that she in her own handwriting rendered a statement, which was found among the effects of her husband, showing a calculation of various matters, including the amount received from the Omaha property and a dividing of that amount into two equal parts. It was also shown by the testimony of several witnesses that after leaving her husband she stated that they had settled their property matters; that she had given him one-half of the proceeds from the sale of the Omaha property and had invested money of her half, received from the same source, by loaning the same in Omaha. She stated further to some of these witnesses that she had given "Joe" his half and kept her own, and that they were through "for good and always." Very significant also is the allegation in her divorce complaint that there was no community property requiring an order of court affecting the same. When plaintiff was asked the question, during the taking of her deposition, why community property had not been adjusted in the divorce action, the only reply she had to make thereto was that she did not know.

It was shown clearly that plaintiff was a woman of mature years, of considerable mental keenness, and of long business experience. That she did not overlook any matter which would result in benefit to her we can very safely assume from all the evidence as the record expresses it. The bringing of this action may be considered as added evidence of her industry in that direction. Respondents point to the fact that probate proceedings were allowed to progress to distribution of the estate without protest made by this plaintiff, and that in consequence she would be debarred from asserting any claim to property distributed. So well satisfied are we with the court's determination of the case upon the evidence that we feel it unnecessary to extend this opinion to the discussion of any further propositions. That evidence supported fully the determination of the trial judge that there had been a settlement of all property interests and that none of the property brought into the estate was of a community character.

SHOUDY v. SHOUDY. (Civ. 4055.)

1. Divorce 🔑254—Judgment in divorce held not bar to rights of wife in insurance policy.

A judgment, awarding alimony and directing payment of certain sums "in full payment for alimony, maintenance, and support of the minor child, made or to be made and in full settlement of their property rights," and providing that defendant shall pay all claims by reason of the community heretofore existing or from any contract to which said defendant may be a party, did not determine the interest of the wife as to a prior agreement made between her and the husband in settling their property rights, to the effect that the husband should keep life policies in effect for her benefit so as to bar an action to enforce such agreement after his death; he having attempted to change the beneficiary.

2. Insurance 🔑586—Divorced wife held to have equitable interest in life policies under agreement.

Where husband, pending a divorce action agreed with his wife, who was a mere volunteer beneficiary in life policies to keep the policies in effect "for her as long as she remained single," her interest as beneficiary became changed from that of a mere expectancy, and she acquired an equitable interest which could not be divested by the mere act of the insured in changing the name of the beneficiary, and her equities were superior to those of one who subsequently loaned money to the insured and thereafter married him, after having ceased to press him further for the payment of the money upon his assuring her that she was protected by his insurance policies; the latter never seeing the policies nor knowing anything about the change in the name of the beneficiary.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by Emma Eldred Mae Shoudy against Julia Shoudy. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

J. R. Gilbert and E. B. Mering, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Andrew F. Burke and John R. Tyrrell, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in the defendant's favor. As to the facts of the case there is no material dispute: The plaintiff and appellant, Emma Eldred Shoudy, intermarried with one Dexter Shoudy on March 1, 1906. There was issue of this marriage one child, Kenneth Shoudy, born October 10, 1907. The parties to said marriage were divorced on April 10, 1916. On February 6, 1919, Dexter Shoudy married Julia Cochran, the defendant and respondent herein. On the 22d day of September, 1908, Dexter Shoudy had caused two life insurance policies, each for $2,000, to be issued by the Illinois Bankers' Life Association upon his life, with his then wife Emma Shoudy as the beneficiary named therein. On the 29th day of March, 1916, while a divorce action instituted by his said wife against Dexter Shoudy was pending and about to be brought to trial, the latter wrote a letter to his sister, Mrs. Laura Armstrong—who, it seems, had interested herself in bringing about a property settlement between the parties—which letter as far as is material reads as follows:

"Dear Sister: Referring to our conversation settlement between Mrs. Shoudy and myself you are at liberty to say to her as follows:

"First. She can have the divorce.

"She can have the custody of the child.

"Second. She will have an alimony as long as Ruth is with her of $125.00 per month. * * * If at any time during this year I am able to pay her in cash $3,500, I am to be released from paying alimony entirely.

"Third. * * * As soon as the divorce is granted I will give her $250.00. I will give her $250.00 on June 1st, 1916, * * * $500.00 on September 1, 1916. * * *

🔑For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

"Fourth. * * * Dishes. * * *

"Fifth. * * * For Ruth * * * a piano.

"Sixth. In consideration of this, and when payments have been met, i. e., $250.00, $250.00, $500.00 and the furniture purchased, I want it understood and considered that I am released and have settled in full for everything of every kind and nature whatever.

"Seventh. Insurance: I have a policy in the Bankers' Life Association, $4,000.00, which I will keep in effect for her as long as she remains single, and also for Ruth until she marries—$3,000 for Mrs. Shoudy and $1,000.00 for Ruth. I feel that I will be able to carry this out. * * *

"If this letter is acceptable to her, have her so instruct her attorney, Mr. Wilman Tucker, and we will close the matter up as speedily as possible.

"All this, if you like, can be incorporated in the decree if the judge will so permit."

Upon the same day on which this letter was written Dexter Shoudy and his then wife, the plaintiff herein, entered into the following written agreement respecting a settlement of their property rights and interest, namely:

"Memorandum of agreement made and entered into this 29th day of March, 1916, by and between Dexter Shoudy, the party of the first part, and Emma May Shoudy, the party of the second part, witnesseth: That whereas the parties hereto are now husband and wife; and whereas, there is now an action pending for divorce; * * * and whereas, the parties hereto have arrived at an adjustment of their business affairs, which is evidenced by a letter dated March 29, 1916, addressed to Mrs. Laura Armstrong which is hereto attached marked 'Exhibit A,' and which the parties hereto hereby confirm and adopt.

"In witness whereof the parties hereto have hereunto set their hands and seals the day and year first above written."

On April 10, 1916, an interlocutory judgment was made and entered in said divorce action granting the plaintiff therein a divorce and awarding to her the custody of said minor child which, in so far as the same refers to alimony or to any division or settlement of the property rights and interests of the parties, reads as follows:

"That the plaintiff be and she is hereby awarded alimony as follows: $250 to be paid upon the entry of this decree; $250 to be paid on June 1, 1916; $500 to be paid on September 1, 1916, and in addition thereto that the defendant pay to the plaintiff the sum of $125 per month, the first of said payments to commence on the 1st day of April, 1916, and the said sum to be paid on the 1st of each and every succeeding month until such time as the plaintiff may remarry, at which time said alimony shall cease. That in the event the daughter of the plaintiff, Ruth Genevieve Osborne, should marry or cease to reside with plaintiff, then and in that event the said alimony shall be reduced to the sum of $100 per month. The foregoing in full payment of and for alimony, maintenance, and support of minor child made or to be made, and in full settlement of their property rights.

"That in the event the defendant shall pay to the plaintiff within one year following the entry of this decree the sum of $3,500 then and in that event the said alimony shall cease.

"Said defendant shall hereby assume and pay all claims and demands arising and to arise by reason of the community heretofore existing, or by reason of any contract or note to which said defendant may be a party."

The letter which he had sent to the insurance company was dated April 19, 1916. It inclosed and referred to the original policies which had been issued to him, and then proceeded to say:

"This is to advise that we have just been divorced a few days ago, and I agreed to keep these in force for her until she may remarry. Therefore, I think there is another indorsement needed. I wish you would kindly fix them up as they should be and return them to me. She will go by the name of Mrs. Emma Mae Shoudy, and of course is a widow. I desire her to receive the money in case of my death."

The letter in reply from the insurance company, a copy of which he sent to his former wife and also to his said sister, returned the policies to him with the statement that—

"In reply will say that these policies do not need any change as the face of the policy provides, should they become a claim, would be paid to Emma Eldred Shoudy, and the wife part of it would not cut any figure. This is simply placed in the policy at the time of issue to show that there was a relationship when the policy was issued. Unless there is a legal change in the changing of the beneficiary altogether, at your request, the face of the policy would be paid to Emma Eldred Shoudy as stated in the policy."

To this letter Dexter Shoudy sent the following reply:

"I am in receipt of yours of the 25th and note that with reference to policies 9452 and 9453 for $2,000.00 each, it makes no difference about the divorce.

"You say the policies will be paid to Emma Eldred Shoudy just the same in case of my death.

"My address for assessment notices is 421 Railway Exchange Building, Seattle, Washington."

Copies of all of these letters were sent, as we have seen, to the plaintiff herein. The policies themselves, both before and after the divorce between the parties, appear to have been kept in a vault to which Dexter Shoudy and his former wife had each a key.

Notwithstanding these various letters and agreements Dexter Shoudy on April 21, 1916, undertook to change the name of the beneficiary in his said two policies from "Emma Eldred Shoudy, wife," to "Mrs. Laura Armstrong, sister." On October 15, 1917, he again undertook to change the name of such beneficiary from "Mrs. Laura Armstrong, sister," to "Julia Cochran, fiancée"; and still again on April 21, 1919, he undertook to change said beneficiary from "Julia Cochran, fiancée," to "Julia Shoudy, wife," to whom he had been married on February 5, 1919.

The record herein further discloses without substantial conflict the following facts: In the month of April, 1916, after Dexter Shoudy had been divorced from the plaintiff herein, Julia Cochran, the defendant herein, delivered to him the sum of $5,000. There seems to have been no note evidencing this transaction nor any postponed time of repayment, but Dexter Shoudy credited that amount to Julia Cochran about that date in his books of account, stating therein that it was cash for investment, and also later on entered items showing payments on account of said transaction to the amount of several hundred dollars. In her testimony herein Julia Cochran states that the transaction was in the nature of a loan, and she further testifies that during the year 1918 and prior to her marriage to Dexter Shoudy she began pressing him for the payment of this loan, whereupon, as she testifies and as the trial court found, he said to her—

> "I have protected you. I have life insurance in the Illinois Bankers' for $4,000, and I am protecting you. If anything happens to me, why, you will have my insurance for the money I owe you."

She further testifies that upon this statement she ceased pressing him further for the repayment of the money. The fact was that Dexter Shoudy had in the year 1917, a year or so after receiving said money and some time before the defendant began to press him for its repayment, changed the name of the beneficiary in said policies on the face thereof to "Julia Cochran, fiancée." It does not appear that Julia Cochran ever saw or had possession of these policies or ever knew that any change had been made in the name of the beneficiary therein until after Dexter Shoudy's death, which occurred on October 28, 1919. Thereafter the plaintiff herein demanded of said defendant that she turn over to her the said policies, which demand being refused, the plaintiff commenced this action to recover said policies or the proceeds thereof.

Upon the trial of the cause the court found in the defendant's favor, holding that Dexter Shoudy had made no binding contract with the plaintiff which would have the effect of taking away the right reserved in said policies to change the beneficiary thereof at any time, and that by the change to "Julia Cochran" under the circumstances above set forth she became invested with the right to the same and the proceeds thereof at the time of Dexter Shoudy's death. The court further found that the plaintiff was estopped to claim or assert any right to be or remain the beneficiary of said policies, and that the judgment of divorce between herself and said Dexter Shoudy was a bar to the making of said claim. Judgment was entered accordingly in the defendant's favor, and from such judgment the plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

The first question which presents itself upon this appeal is that arising upon the respondent's contention that the judgment of divorce between Dexter Shoudy and the plaintiff herein constituted a determination of the rights of the plaintiff in respect of these policies, and is a bar to the maintenance by her of the present action.

[1] We find ourselves unable to agree with this contention as to the effect of said judgment. It is true that in said judgment the trial court, after making the award of alimony and directing the payment of certain sums of money according to the terms of the prior agreement between the parties, does say:

> "The foregoing in full payment for alimony, maintenance, and support of the minor child made or to be made and in full settlement of their property rights."

But the said decree also contains another clause evidently inserted in the decree with the agreement of the parties in the peculiar form and order in which the same is phrased before the court, which reads as follows:

> "Said defendant shall hereby assume and pay all claims and demands arising and to arise by reason of the community heretofore existing or by reason of any contract or note to which said defendant may be a party."

There is no reference in the record to any other outstanding contract to which said Dexter Shoudy was at said time a party than the written agreement predicated upon the letter or note to his sister, Mrs. Armstrong, and which was apparently before the court at the time it made and entered said judgment. Moreover, the parties to said divorce action did not at any time so interpret said judgment, but, on the contrary, evidently regarded the agreement between them as to the status of the rights of the plaintiff in regard to said policies as still in force and effect, since Dexter Shoudy immediately after the entry of said judgment took steps to have the said status and rights of the plaintiff therein and herein fixed and determined upon the face of said insurance policies, and at the time, supposing that he had done so, duly notified said plaintiff thereof. We therefore conclude that the said judgment of divorce did not determine the rights and interests of the plaintiff in respect to said insurance policies adversely to whatever fixed and vested rights or equities she had acquired therein by virtue of said agreement, and that the said judgment is not a bar to her present action.

[2] The next contention which arises upon the face of this record is as to the right or interest that the plaintiff herein acquired in these two policies and in the proceeds thereof by virtue of her contract with Dexter Shoudy. The Bankers' Life Association is, as the record shows, a mutual benefit association, the members of which are, by the terms of its policies, permitted to change the beneficiaries named therein by obtaining the written consent of the insurer so to do. Up to the time when Dexter Shoudy and the plaintiff entered into their said agreement the plaintiff was a mere voluntary beneficiary therein, having an expectancy but no vested or equitable rights or interests therein which the insured could not have terminated at will by changing the beneficiary named therein; but when Dexter Shoudy, in anticipation of the divorce between himself and his wife, offered as one of the terms of settlement of their property rights "to keep in effect for her as long as she remained single" said policies, and when this offer was accepted by her the quality of her interest as a beneficiary in said policies became changed from that of a mere expectancy to a more fixed and permanent relation. She had thenceforth an equitable interest in said policies of which she could not be divested by the mere act of the insured in changing the name of the beneficiary. In the case of Jory v. Supreme Council, etc., 105 Cal. 20, 38 Pac. 524, 26 L. R. A. 733, 45 Am. St. Rep. 17, this interest or equity is thus described:

> "The principle here under consideration is the most recent growth of mutual benefit association law, a branch of law which in itself is young in years; and we know of nothing in the law which deprives a person contemplating membership in a mutual benefit association from so contracting with the proposed beneficiary as that when such certificate is issued, equities in favor of the beneficiary are born of such merit that the insured member has no power to defeat them. The few authorities shedding light upon this question declare the rights of the beneficiary are such as to create a vested interest in the proceeds of the certificate. Smith v. National Ben. Soc., 123 N. Y. 85; Maynard v. Vanderwerker, 24 N. Y. Supp. 932. Possibly this is not a correct declaration of the principle of law applicable to the conditions; for a second beneficiary might be substituted, wholly innocent of the contractual relations existing between the insured and the first beneficiary, and his substitution give rise to the creation of equities in his behalf, all controlling upon a judicial disposition of the rights of the parties concerned. If the original beneficiary's interest was vested no subsequent conditions could possibly arise which would defeat his right, and for this reason we think it can hardly be termed a vested interest. The whole matter seems to be rather a question of equities, and the stronger and better equity must prevail."

In this view of the instant case it would seem to follow that the equitable right which the plaintiff herein acquired by virtue of her agreement with Dexter Shoudy was one of which she could not be deprived by any act of the insured in the way of an attempted substitution of the name of a merely voluntary beneficiary in the place and stead of her name in said policies; and that in so far as Mrs. Laura Armstrong or Julia Cochran or Julia Shoudy were such voluntary beneficiaries neither they nor either of them could have gained any right or interest in said policies which would be superior to that of the plaintiff herein.

The respondent, however, contends that the defendant herein, Julia Shoudy, upon the facts of this case as testified to by her and as found by the court to be true, became, by virtue of the change in the name of the beneficiary in said policies to her own name, something more than a mere voluntary beneficiary therein; and that upon said facts it must be held that she acquired an equitable interest therein which was superior to the equitable interest of the plaintiff therein, and hence that for that reason the judgment must be affirmed.

The facts upon which the defendant herein relied in the trial court successfully to sustain this claim are undisputed and are these: On April 23, 1916, Dexter Shoudy credited Julia Cochran on his books with $4,000, charging himself with the same under the item "Gave me cash to invest." On April 27, 1916, he credited the account of Julia Cochran with the sum of $1,000 debiting himself with that sum under the item "Cash." Julia Cochran, testifying regarding these matters, states that the $5,000 was a loan. There was no security then given or any note or other memorandum than said book entries evidencing the transaction. On October 15, 1917, Dexter Shoudy changed the name of the beneficiary upon the face of said policies to "Julia Cochran, fiancée." This was done apparently of his own motion, without either agreement, demand, or knowledge on the defendant's part. At some time during the year 1918 she began pressing Dexter Shoudy for the repayment of this money, and he then said to her:

> "I have protected you. I have life insurance in the Illinois Bankers' for $4,000, and I am protecting you. If anything happens to me, why, you will have my insurance for the money I owe you."

She further testifies that upon hearing this she ceased to press him further for the payment of the money. Dexter Shoudy married Julia Cochran on February 6, 1919. Thereafter, and also without her knowledge or agreement, he caused the name of the beneficiary on the face of said policies to be change from "Julia Cochran, fiancée," to "Julia Shoudy, wife." The defendant never saw these policies nor knew anything about the changes in name of the beneficiary in said policies until after Dexter Shoudy's death.

We are of the opinion that these facts fall far short of being sufficient to create equities in the defendant herein superior to those already created by Dexter Shoudy in favor of his former wife. His act in changing the name of the latter as the beneficiary of said policies was at the time such change was made a wrongful act on his part, in express violation of what we have found to be the agreement with the plaintiff. It was also an entirely voluntary act on his part, for which there was no consideration moving from any one, and regarding which there was neither agreement, compulsion nor knowledge on the part of this defendant. The mere fact that he owed the defendant some money at that time would not suffice to render her other than a mere voluntary beneficiary, created by himself and changeable at his will. The defendant herein upon such a state of facts could not have asserted any equities in said policy against Dexter Shoudy himself had he undertaken to again change the beneficiary in said policies; and she certainly cannot be heard to assert equities against the prior rights of this plaintiff which she could not have asserted against Dexter Shoudy himself.

Nor do we think that the subsequent conversation between Dexter Shoudy and this defendant strengthens the position of the defendant in this regard, since it amounted to nothing more than the vague, general statement that he had protected her, and that she should have his insurance upon his death. No details were given or asked as to how the defendant had been protected, nor was any agreement made or further understanding had between the parties. The defendant merely states that upon being given this vague assurance of protection she ceased to press him further for the money. We are cited to no authorities, and are satisfied that there are none which would serve to uphold the claim of an equitable assignment of an insurance policy as between a debtor and his creditor based upon the oral generalities of such a conversation as this. If the defendant understood from this conversation that she was thereby being invested with equitable rights in these policies which Dexter Shoudy could not thereafter take away, and with superior equities therein to those which might exist in favor of former beneficiaries, she should certainly have taken some steps to inform herself as to the facts out of which they arose. She did not do this; she made no effort to inform herself further, and remained in ignorance of the fact that she had ever been made the beneficiary of these policies until after Dexter Shoudy's death. Out of such an inchoate condition and in the absence of any definite agreement or understanding between Dexter Shoudy and this defendant amounting in effect to an equitable assignment of these policies to her, we cannot conceive how equities could have arisen in her favor which can be made superior to the definite equities which the plaintiff acquired by virtue of her agreement with Dexter Shoudy at the time of her divorce from him. We are therefore of the opinion that the trial court was in error in its finding and conclusion that the equities of the defendant were superior to those of the plaintiff herein, and in rendering judgment in the defendant's favor predicated upon such erroneous finding of fact.

SHOUDY v. SHOUDY. (Civ. 4056.)

1. Insurance ⟹586—Wife held not to have vested interest in policy.

Where husband took out policy of life insurance and handed it to his wife with the statement that he thought it would be a protection for the children and the family in case anything went wrong, he did not give the wife such a vested interest as would prevent the exercise by him of the right reserved to him in the policy to change the beneficiary thereof.

2. Insurance ⟹586—Payment of premiums on policy of husband from community gives no vested interest in wife.

Where husband took out life insurance and made wife beneficiary, the fact that the premiums were paid out of the community property did not give the wife a vested interest such as would prevent the exercise by the husband of the right reserved to him to change the beneficiary.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by Emma Eldred Mae Shoudy against Julia Shoudy. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

E. B. Mering and J. R. Gilbert, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

John R. Tyrrell and Andrew F. Burke, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This case and that of the same title numbered 1 Civil No. 4055 (203 Pac. 433), decided in this court November 25, 1921, were tried together, and the appeals are before us upon the same transcript. In the opinion filed in said last-mentioned case the circumstances preceding and giving rise to the litigation are set out in some detail, but are not necessary to be gone into upon the present appeal.

The plaintiff is the divorced wife of Dexter Shoudy, deceased, who in his lifetime took out a policy of life insurance with the Northern Life Insurance Company of Seattle for the sum of $5,000, and made said plaintiff the beneficiary thereof, delivering said policy to her. It contained a provision giving to the assured the right to change the beneficiary named therein by indorsement made by the company on the face thereof. Marital difficulties having arisen between himself and his wife, Dexter Shoudy substituted his sister as the beneficiary in said policy and later made a second change, this time in favor of the defendant, whom he subsequently married. At the time of Shoudy's death he had borrowed from the insurance company upon the security of the policy the sum of $2,400, so that only the balance of $2,600 was payable thereon, which sum was in due course paid to the defendant, his widow, and was used by her in liquidating various debts incurred by the assured during the last year or two of his life.

The plaintiff brings this action against the defendant, basing it upon the claim that she had acquired a vested interest by contract in said policy of insurance by virtue of the facts that she had been made the beneficiary thereof, that Shoudy had delivered it to her, that he had promised that he would continue to pay the premiums thereon, and that a large proportion of the money used to pay the annual premiums on said policy was community property—or at least, such payments having been made during coverture, their source must be presumed to be community funds.

The trial court found against the existence of any vested right by contract in said policy in the plaintiff, and also found to be true certain facts pleaded by defendant as an estoppel in her favor, but which we do not deem necessary to refer to in detail, being satisfied of the correctness of the court's finding against the plaintiff's claim of a vested interest in said policy. It accordingly rendered judgment in the defendant's favor, from which the plaintiff has appealed, and urges here the same contentions as were made by her in the trial court.

The testimony introduced by plaintiff in support of her claim to a vested interest in the policy by contract is as follows: She was sick in a hospital, and in the first stages of pregnancy. She there had a conversation with her husband, the substance of which she related in the following terms:

"Q. The question, Mrs. Shoudy, is what did you say and what did Mr. Shoudy say at the time the policy was delivered, or on or about that time, in reference to that policy? A. Well, he just said that he had taken out the insurance policy for me; he said that in case there were any children coming along he thought it would be a protection for the children and the family in case anything went wrong, and he didn't have any money at that time—just an ordinary conversation. That is all that I can remember."

[1] This testimony falls far short of establishing in the plaintiff such a vested interest as would prevent the exercise by the assured of the right reserved to him in the policy of insurance to change the beneficiary thereof. Jory v. Supreme Council, 105 Cal. 20, 38 Pac. 524, 26 L. R. A. 733, 45 Am. St. Rep. 17; Hoeft v. Supreme Lodge, 113 Cal. 91, 45 Pac. 185, 33 L. R. A. 174.

[2] Nor would the fact that a large proportion of the premiums were paid from community funds improve the plaintiff's position (and it may be remarked that there was no proof that such was the fact). Cade v. Head Camp, 27 Wash. 218, 67 Pac. 603. It has even been held that the payment of premiums from the separate funds of the beneficiary would not suffice to create a vested interest in his behalf. Supreme Council v. Behrend, 247 U. S. 394, 38 Sup. Ct. 522, 62 L. Ed. 1182, 1 A. L. R. 966.

The sections of the Civil Code and authorities cited by appellant to the effect that a husband and wife are under the obligation of mutual support, and that they may contract with each other as to community and other property, have no determinative bearing upon the facts of this case.

Judgment affirmed.

PLOTNIK et ux. v. ROSENBERG.
(Civ. 3971.)

1. New trial 🔑77(1)—Court can set aside verdict for exemplary damages showing passion and prejudice.

Though the power of the jury in the award of exemplary damages under Civ. Code, § 3294, is broad, the courts have the same power to set aside a verdict for such damages, and exercise it upon the same principle as in any case of excessive verdict if the amount awarded was such as to suggest passion and prejudice of the jury.

2. Damages 🔑94—Exemplary damages must bear reasonable proportion to actual damages.

While there is no fixed rule as to the proportion between actual and exemplary damages, the exemplary damages should bear some reasonable proportion to the actual damages suffered.

3. Landlord and tenant ⚷132(3)—Judgment for $1,500, including exemplary damages for trespass by landlord, reduced to $300.

In an action by tenants against their landlord for an unjustified trespass in entering the premises and removing the doors therefrom, where the actual damages claimed amounted to only $15.60, a judgment awarding as compensatory and exemplary damages $1,500 allowed a sum as exemplary damages out of all proportion to the actual damages, and should be reduced to $300.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thomas F. Graham, Judge.

Trespass by Nathan Plotnik and wife against R. C. Rosenberg. Judgment for plaintiffs for $1.500 reduced by the court from $2,000 awarded by the verdict, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded for a new trial, unless the respondents shall remit all damages in excess of $300 in which case judgment affirmed.

Goodfellow, Eells, Moore & Orrick, of San Francisco. for appellant.

Albert Jacoby, of San Francisco, for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an action in trespass. Plaintiffs were tenants of the defendant and occupied a certain flat or apartment on Natoma street, in San Francisco. The husband, an invalid, was away part of the time, and the wife and three minor children occupied the flat. During the tenancy, while the rent was seldom paid on the due date, no month passed without payment of the rent in full. For some reason, defendant decided to force the plaintiffs to move, whether it was because of higher rents then obtainable or because he considered the plaintiff Rose Plotnik a trouble maker, is wholly immaterial. Defendant had served notice on plaintiffs that on October 17, 1919, the rent would be advanced to more than double the amount of the previous rent, but at no time was a notice terminating the tenancy served upon the plaintiffs. It is admitted that on the evening of October 2, 1919, defendant, without any legal justification, in the temporary absence of the plaintiffs, entered plaintiffs' home with his pass-key and removed therefrom six doors, including the front and rear door. It was only when the police intervened, at the request of the neighbors of plaintiffs, that defendant restored two of the doors, but never restored the interior doors during the remaining period of plaintiffs' tenancy. The keys of the two doors which were replaced by the defendant were taken by him, and their return was refused. The jury awarded actual and exemplary damages in the sum of $2,000, which amount was reduced to $1,500 by the trial court and judgment given therefor.

[1] The contention is made upon appeal that the damages are excessive. Judgment was prayed "for the sum of $15, the amount of the damage actually suffered by reason of the removal of the said tenant and boarder as aforesaid, and for the further sum of 60 cents, expended for said keys, as aforesaid, and for the further sum of $5,000 as exemplary damages," and for costs. Assuming that the full amount of actual damages alleged were allowed by the jury. the verdict represents an award of $1,484.40 punitive damages—about 100 times the amount of the actual damage alleged. It is true that the common-law rule with relation to the assessment of punitive damages allowed to the jury an exceedingly broad discretion (Hanna v. Sweeney, 78 Conn. 492, 62 Atl. 785, 4 L. R. A. [N. S.] 907); but even under that rule, the courts granted new trials in cases where the amount of punitive damages awarded was such as at first blush to suggest passion and prejudice of the jury (Hanna v. Sweeney, supra; Flannery v. Wood, 32 Tex. Civ. App. 250, 73 S. W. 1072; Saunders v. Mullen, 66 Iowa, 728, 24 N. W. 529; International, etc., Co. v. Telephone Co., 69 Tex. 277, 5 S. W. 517, 5 Am. St. Rep. 45).

[2] It is true that there is no fixed rule as to the proportion between actual and exemplary damages in cases where exemplary damages are recoverable. St. Louis Southwestern Ry. Co. v. Thompson, 108 S. W. at page 457; Tynberg v. Cohen, 76 Tex. 409, 13 S. W 315 at pages 316, 317. But it has been held that the exemplary damages should bear a reasonable proportion to the actual damages sustained (Flannary v. Wood, supra), and that the discretion of the jury is not unlimited in this matter. The decisions of the various states present conflicting theories upon which exemplary damages are allowable. In California it is not a question of theory, but of express statutory provision. Civ. Code, § 3294. The power of the court to set aside a verdict for exemplary damages is the same power, and is exercised upon the same principle as in any case of excessive verdict. Sedgwick on Damages (9th Ed.) vol. 1, p. 756. The cases in which courts have set aside such verdicts furnish some guide to the exercise of this power in the present case. A study of these cases reveals the fact that even in cases presenting evidence of extreme malice and aggravation, the verdicts permitted to stand do not represent an award of punitive damages so greatly in excess of the actual damages as in the present case. See Sedgwick on Damages, vol. 4 (9th Ed.) p. 2699.

In this state we have a case presenting facts strikingly similar to the facts of the case at bar. Waters v. Dumas, 75 Cal.

563, 17 Pac. 685. In that case, the plaintiff was occupying a house in San Francisco, and the defendants "wrongfully and maliciously took down, removed, and carried away the front door of said house; took out and carried away the windows therefrom; stopped and stuffed the flues of the chimney so as to prevent the escape of smoke through the same." It also appeared that at the time of the occurrence, the weather was cold, wet, and stormy, and when the plaintiff tacked cloth on the windows to keep out the cold, the defendants tore down the same, and threatened her and struck her with a board or piece of stick. The jury rendered a verdict of $301. It was contended that the damages should have been limited by the trial court in its instructions to the value of the use and occupation of the premises. The Supreme Court stated that punitive damages were properly allowed, and further stated that the appeal was frivolous, and were it not for the fact that the court "deemed the verdict quite large enough," a penalty for frivolous appeal would have been added thereto.

[3] Guided by the above intimation of the Supreme Court in a case presenting facts strikingly similar to those in the instant case, we have concluded that the judgment in the instant case should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial, unless the respondent shall, within 20 days from the date of the filing of this opinion, file in this court a remittitur of all damages in excess of $300, plus costs. If such remittitur be filed, the judgment then to be modified in accordance therewith, and, as so modified, affirmed. It is so ordered.

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division Two. California. Nov. 22, 1921.)

1. Criminal law 🔑1023(8) — Order denying motion for arrest of judgment is not appealable.

An order denying motion for arrest of judgment in a criminal case is not appealable.

2. Criminal law 🔑656(9)—Court's statement as to weight of evidence held error.

In a prosecution for rape, trial judge's complaint that counsel for the defendant were not establishing anything and not asking a material question, and only corroborating the state's witnesses, and that they certainly knew they were "not getting anywhere with their evidence," and if they had any witness to contradict any witness brought by the state they should call such witness, made in the presence of the jury, held erroneous where such evidence as to the condition of the prosecutrix shortly after the alleged crime contradicted that of a state's witness in a material way.

3. Criminal law 🔑1053—Misconduct of court need not be excepted to, where admonition to jury would have been futile.

In a prosecution for statutory rape, where the judge added one harmful remark to another, calculated to prejudice defendant, held that the judge's action could be reviewed, although not excepted to by the defendant's attorneys, since admonition to the jury would have been useless.

4. Criminal law 🔑1166½(12) — Court's admonition to jury to disregard his own remarks bearing upon weight of defendant's evidence held not to cure error.

In a prosecution for rape, where the court was guilty of misconduct in commenting upon the defendant's evidence, stating that the defendant's counsel were getting nowhere with their evidence, the court's admonition to the jury that "the remarks of the court are not for your consideration," but "only addressed to counsel," and to disregard it, held insufficient to cure the error.

5. Witnesses 🔑311 — Exclusion of evidence that prosecutrix was testifying under coercion and duress held error.

In a prosecution for rape, the exclusion of defendant's evidence tending to show that the prosecutrix was testifying against the defendant through fear of her adoptive father and mother held error.

6. Indictment and information 🔑125(37)—Information may charge prosecutrix was under 18 years of age, and also charge rape with force and violence.

A single count in an information for rape, alleging that the prosecutrix was of the age of less than 18 years, and that the crime was committed by force and violence, held not to show an improper joinder.

7. Criminal law 🔑1144(12) — Exclusion of testimony assumed harmless in view of the record.

On appeal from conviction of statutory rape, where defendant did not show what prosecutrix testified to in the preliminary examination as to her age, and such is not shown by the record, it cannot be determined whether her statements were different from those made on trial, so that the appellate court is bound to assume that the exclusion of such testimony, if error, was harmless.

8. Criminal law 🔑1137(5)—Defendant cannot complain of admission of evidence as to age of prosecutrix, when he introduced similar proof.

On appeal in a prosecution for statutory rape, the defendant may not complain of the testimony of prosecutrix's adoptive father and mother as to her age, where he has introduced an application for admission of prosecutrix to a children's home society, which shows her to have been under the age of consent.

9. Criminal law 🔑454—Adoptive parents of prosecutrix could give opinion as to her age.

In a prosecution for statutory rape, the opinions of her adoptive parents as to the age of the prosecutrix were admissible, they having adopted her 9 years before the alleged offense, and her presence in court did not render such testimony incompetent.

10. Criminal law 🔑400(3)—In prosecution for statutory rape prosecutrix's adoptive parents' testimony as to her age held admissible as evidence secondary to public records, where she was born out of state.

In a prosecution for rape testimony of prosecutrix's adoptive parents as to her age held admissible as evidence secondary to the public records of the date of her birth, where she was born outside of the state.

11. Witnesses 🔑330(3)—Answer to question held properly excluded as not tending to show duress of prosecutrix.

In a prosecution for rape, where defendant claimed that prosecutrix testified under duress and coercion of her adoptive father and mother, a question asked the adoptive mother on cross-examination, "You have even caused her to be put in the Juvenile Hall after the preliminary hearing?" held properly excluded, as not tending to show duress.

12. Rape 🔑59(3)—Refusal of instruction to view prosecutrix's testimony with caution not error, where corroborated, and prosecutrix was not of tender years.

In a prosecution for rape, where the prosecutrix was not a child of tender years, and where her testimony was corroborated, it was not error to refuse an instruction that prosecutrix's testimony "ought to be viewed with great care and caution by you, and you must weigh the evidence in this case with the utmost care, without bias or prejudice."

13. Rape 🔑59(3)—Refusal of instruction that the jury should consider evidence as fairly as if crime were of another nature held not error.

On appeal by one convicted of rape where the prosecutrix was not a child of tender years and was corroborated, refusal of an instruction that the jury should not allow their minds to be prejudiced against the defendant merely because he was charged with crime, nor on account of the nature of the crime, but were to consider "fairly and without prejudice" the evidence both of the prosecutrix and the defendant "as you would if the crime charged were of another nature," held not error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; Z. B. West, Judge.

Clarence Caldwell was convicted of rape, and from an order denying his motion for new trial and from an order denying his motion for an arrest of judgment, he appeals. Judgment and order denying motion for new trial reversed, and cause remanded for new trial. Appeal from order denying motion in arrest of judgment dismissed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Arthur Keetch, Deputy Atty. Gen., and John W. Maltman, of Los Angeles, for the People.

WORKS, J. [1] This is an appeal from a judgment of conviction of rape, from an order denying appellant's motion for a new trial, and from an order denying his motion for an arrest of judgment. The latter order is not appealable.

The information charged that the rape was committed with force and violence, and also that the prosecutrix was under the age of 18 years, that being the age of consent to sexual intercourse. Appellant was of the age of 20 years. The facts show that a party of six, including the prosecutrix, the appellant, two other boys and two other girls, drove in an automobile to a park in the country in the latter part of the afternoon. The prosecutrix and appellant separated themselves from the other four. As evening approached, the four, desiring to return home, made search for the missing couple, but did not find them, and finally started home without them. They went to the home of Mr. and Mrs. Smith, father and mother of one of the two girls, where they told the girl's parents that they had been unable to find appellant and the prosecutrix, and had left them in the park. Smith then asked the two boys to accompany him on a search for the missing pair, and they did so, going in the car in which the young people had just returned, one of the boys driving it. The car, at some distance short of the park, met appellant and the prosecutrix walking beside each other along the road. They were taken into the vehicle, and the entire party returned to the Smith home. Mrs. Smith questioned the prosecutrix soon afterward, and elicited from her a statement that appellant had violated her while they were in the park. The prosecutrix is an adopted child, and her adoptive father was called to take her to the family home, some blocks away. Appellant was put under arrest for the alleged crime that evening.

[2] Appellant contends for a reversal of the judgment on the ground of the conduct of the trial judge in making the following statement while a witness for the defense, one of the boys who drove back to the park with the other boy and with Mr. Smith, was on the stand:

> "Well, I do not usually desire to interpose the court's own objection, but you are not establishing a thing, you are not asking a material question, and all you are doing with these three last witnesses is to corroborate what was said by the plaintiff's witnesses. Now, you must have some purpose in that, because you certainly know you are not getting anywhere with your evidence; if you have got any witnesses that know anything that will contradict any witness brought or any one that knows anything material, call the witness."

These remarks met with no protest from appellant's counsel, but the district attorney at once attracted additional attention to the attitude of the court by saying:

> "I don't know whether the court thinks that the prosecuting officer is negligent, but I can't object when it is favorable to the prosecution; for that reason I did not object."

Notwithstanding the failure of appellant to take exception to the judge's statement, by that means giving him the opportunity to withdraw it and to admonish the jury to disregard it, we feel called upon to consider minutely the point presented. In doing so it will be necessary to take a view of portions of the evidence. If such a view shall disclose that counsel for appellant were "not establishing a thing," that they were "not asking a material question," that all they were doing with their "three last witnesses" was "to corroborate what was said by the plaintiff's witnesses" that they must have had "some purpose in that because" they certainly knew they were not "getting anywhere" with their evidence, and that the judge was justified in saying, "If you have got any witnesses that know anything that will contradict any witness brought or any one that knows anything material, call the witness"—if, we say, these things shall appear, then appellant's contention is at an end, except for some considerations which we shall mention below, for the language employed by the court wil have been shown to be harmless upon that score. On the other hand, if the things mentioned, or some of them, shall not appear from a review of the evidence, then we can discern a great injury resulting to the defense and therefore to the rights of appellant.

There were but five witnesses for the defense, called in the following order: A physician, who testified as an expert; the prosecutrix; the two boys who were of the party which went to the park and who returned there with Smith on the search for the missing pair; and the defendant himself. The three witnesses referred to in the statement of the judge to which exception is taken were the prosecutrix and the two boys, and his remarks were made toward the close of the direct examination of the boy who testified last of the two. It is to be noted, therefore, as a preliminary to the examination of the testimony of the three, that if their statements contained anything that was worthy the attention of the jury, the remarks of the judge were such as completely to nullify the effect of those statements and to leave appellant's defense on the facts to rest upon his own unsupported testimony, for we have already observed that the sole remaining witness testified as an expert.

Not much is to be said concerning the testimony of the prosecutrix when on the stand for appellant. Her examination was very brief. In fact, objection was made and sustained to the principal questions addressed to her, and she was at once called from the stand. We must say, however, that there is nothing in the record to indicate that she was not called in good faith, and the questions put to her were consistent with the general line of defense adopted by appellant. They were objectionable only because they had been addressed to her before, on her cross-examination while on the stand as a witness for the people.

Upon the score of the materiality of the testimony of the two boys and the extent to which it contradicted the evidence brought forth by the prosecution, we are first pointed to the testimony of Smith. Speaking concerning the trip to the park in search of the prosecutrix and appellant, and testifying for the prosecution, that witness said:

> "When we met the two coming in the machine Lillian [the prosecutrix] jumped in the machine and threw her arms around my neck and just simply collapsed."

A little later the witness said:

> "I held Lillian all the way into Santa Ana."

Smith's testimony, and that of others, shows that on the ride to the park he and Cecil Park, one of the boys, occupied the rear seat, and Dewey Callahan, the other boy, sat in the front seat alone and drove the car. When appellant and the prosecutrix were taken up the latter got into the rear seat between Smith and Parks and appellant sat in front with Callahan. With this observation we turn to a part of the cross-examination of Smith:

> "Q. Now, what do you call 'collapse'? A. Well, she was in a nervous condition and she wasn't able hardly to walk, she was just simply prostrated. * * * Q. And as soon as she got in the car she did what? A. She fell into my arms. * * * Q. Inside of the car? A. Yes. * * * Q. Did you have your arms out? A. Yes. Q. Ready for her to fall into your arms? A. I did. Q. And she didn't sit down in the seat, did she? A. Yes. Q. After falling into your arms or before? A. Both. * * * Q. What did you say to her there? A. 'Lillian' was about the only thing I said. Q. You kept saying 'Lillian,' is that it? A. Yes. * * * Q. And all you said was 'Lillian' all the way in? A. Yes, sir. * * * Q. What was the first thing said by either you or the defendant or [the prosecutrix] when you met them? * * * A. 'Lillian.' Q. You said 'Lillian'? A. Yes. Q. And what did she say? A. 'Mr. Smith.' * * * Q. What else was said? A. That was all then said. Q. Park say anything to either of them in your presence then? * * * A. Not that I remember. Q. Didn't you hear Park say at that time, ask [the prosecutrix] and the defendant if they were lost? A. I don't remember. Q. You didn't? A. No, sir. Q. So there was nothing said from that time you met them at the park gate by any of you until you got home except 'Lillian' and 'Mr. Smith,' is that right? A. I wouldn't swear nothing was said, I couldn't say that; I was looking at Lillian, the main thing I thought of. Q. You weren't thinking of anything except of Lillian's welfare, you can't remember a thing said except 'Lillian' and 'Mr. Smith,' and you addressed her as 'Lillian' and she you as 'Mr. Smith'? A. Yes. Q. Nothing else said? A. Nothing that I recall. * * * Q. When was the next you saw the defendant? A. Well, it was a few minutes after we got home, I don't know how many minutes. I took the girl in the house, and she was in such a condition when we went in I took care of her first. Q. Did you carry her in your arms? A. No, sir; I very nearly carried her in; she walked, however. Q. * * * And she never even laid down when she got in the house? A. She set down very forcibly. * * * Q. And she got up and talked with her young friends in your house? A. No, sir. Q. She didn't talk to you at all, while in the house before her stepfather came for her? A. She talked, but she didn't get up to talk. Q. They were all sitting down when they were talking? A. Yes. * * * Q. What did you say to her? A. That I don't remember; it was only as a father would do to a daughter, just quietly; her nerves were in such a condition. Q. What did you do to quiet her? A. Stroked her head and talked to her."

We now take up the testimony of the two boys in order to determine the extent to which Smith was contradicted by them. Dewey Callahan, having the prosecutrix in mind, testified in part as follows:

"Q. Did you see that girl at the house before her father came for her? * * * A. I did. Q. Was she sitting down all the time or not? A. She wasn't. Q. What was she doing in the house? A. Walking about the rooms. Q. Was she talking with anybody? A. No. Q. Was she weeping copiously, weeping? A. Just walking around the room, with her head down. Q. And Smith was there, was he? A. He was."

Cecil Park, speaking first of the occurrences at the time when he, Smith, and Callahan met the prosecutrix and appellant coming from the park, testified in part thus:

"Q. Do you remember what the first thing said was when you met them there? A. The first thing said, Mr. Smith hollowed 'Lillian.' Q. What was the next thing said? A. Well, I asked the defendant and the girl both if they had been lost. Q. What did they say, if anything? A. The defendant said 'Yes,' and the girl said something. Q. Did you see the girl walking along the road that night? A. I didn't see them until we got to them. Q. Did she need any assistance to get into the car? A. She got in by herself. Q. Did she collapse after she got in the car? A. Well, I don't know what a collapse is, she sat down in the machine, and Mr. Smith put his arm around her. Q. She sat down in the machine, and Mr. Smith put his arm around her? A. After she sat down in the machine, Mr. Smith put his arm around her."

These extracts from the evidence show plainly that Callahan and Park contradicted Smith in several respects, the contradictions, taken together, tending in a considerable degree to impeach his story in two of its particulars: First, that the prosecutrix collapsed when she and appellant were met outside the park; second, that at Smith's home she was so nearly prostrated that she was unable to be on her feet and needed the attentions by means of which he says he ministered unto her. In addition to these contradictions of Smith, Callahan and Park testified at some length upon the general occurrences in which they figured, having to do with the case. More specifically, they both testified that the prosecutrix sat on appellant's lap during the ride of the three couples to the park, and that shortly after they arrived at their destination the prosecutrix and appellant separated themselves from the other four, who remained in company. One of the boys testified that the prosecutrix did not cry on the return trip to the Smith home.

As is usual in such cases the events surrounding the actual commission of the alleged offense are to be gathered only from the testimony of the prosecutrix and of appellant. The girl's recital was to the effect that appellant and she had sexual intercourse in the park as a result of physical force employed by him upon her. Appellant testified that he resorted to no force in accomplishing what was done by the two; that there was no resistance upon the girl's part; that, in truth, she was in full accord with him in what was done; that, with that accord on her part they indulged in a certain course of conduct toward each other which did not include penetration, and that he never did penetrate her person; that the reason there was no penetration was because the girl said she was not well, and therefore would not permit him to indulge in sexual intercourse with her. It will thus be seen that there were two issues arising from the testimony of these two witnesses: First, was the crime of rape consummated upon the prosecutrix by the performance of the final act without which the crime cannot be committed, that is, a penetration of the person of the woman? Second, if the crime was committed, did it result from the employment of force, or is appellant guilty solely because the prosecutrix was under the age of consent? Upon one of these questions the jury found with the prosecutrix; upon the other they declined to believe her testimony, and found with appellant. They adjudged him guilty as charged, but found that the crime was committed "without force and violence," and recommended him to the leniency of the court. Their verdict, then, shows that a decided doubt was present in their minds on the score of the credence to be given respectively to the testimony of the two. If the conduct of the trial and the shaping of the evidence had been modified in but a slight degree in favor of appellant, the jury might have found against the testimony of the prosecutrix upon the issue as to which, the record being as it is, they found with her. Granting the presence of but a slight added circumstance favorable to appellant, they might well have utterly disbelieved the prosecutrix; they might well have given credence to the entire story of appellant. Is it not plain that the trial could have resulted so if the judge had not taken, and expressed, his determined attitude against all of appellant's evidence on the facts except the testimony of appellant himself? The jury, assuredly, after the judge made his statement, must have laid the entire testimony of Callahan and Park out of consideration except as favorable to the prosecution. They were not told merely that the answers of the two boys amounted to nothing by way of defense, but the judge said directly and positively that those answers strengthened the case made by the prosecution. As we have already observed, the attitude of the judge put the appellant in such a position that his story must have stood alone before the jury. But for his own word, he faced the jury undefended by any evidence on the facts. All corroboration of his testimony was swept away at a blow. Perhaps it may be well to state, at the risk of repetition, the extent to which appellant was corroborated by Callahan and Park. Smith's testimony tended to prove that when the prosecutrix came from the park, while she was on the way to his home, and after she had arrived there, she was in a condition which might naturally have followed upon a forceful violation of her person. This testimony was disputed by the two boys. In addition, appellant's statement that the prosecutrix was a willing participant in their conduct in the park is somewhat borne out by the testimony of the two boys that she sat on appellant's lap on the way to the park, and that, soon after the party reached its destination, prosecutrix and appellant separated themselves from the other four, who remained together. Nor does it matter that the corroboration of appellant's story in these respects related to the issue upon which the jury found with his story as against that of the prosecutrix. The heartier the corroboration of that branch of his testimony, the more inclined, naturally, would the jury have been to disbelieve what the prosecutrix said upon the other issue between them, that is, upon the question as to whether her person was penetrated.

There is another feature of the case in which Callahan's and Park's contradiction of Smith was most material. It is contended by appellant, inasmuch as the prosecutrix made no complaint concerning his conduct, except in response to questions, that she testified falsely through fear of Smith and her adoptive father and mother; that, in effect, she testified under their coercion. Many questions were put by counsel in support of this theory at the trial on cross-examination of witnesses for the prosecution, and it was shown that the next morning after the alleged commission of appellant's offense the adoptive mother shook the prosecutrix in an endeavor to make her talk concerning the events of the evening before. We have already observed that the statements out of which the prosecution grew were made by the prosecutrix in response to questions put to her by Mrs. Smith. Under this state of the record and under the contention of appellant concerning it, he was entitled to the benefit of the testimony which contradicted Smith, for, if he could have convinced the jury that Smith testified falsely concerning the girl's condition after she came from the park, that circumstance might have aided the jury in some degree, though perhaps slight, to a conclusion favorable to his contention that the entire case, including the incriminating testimony of the prosecutrix, was inspired not only by Smith, but by the others whom appellant endeavored to hold responsible for a coercion of the prosecutrix. The remarks of the trial court effectually swept this right away.

Laying aside these questions, all arising from the nature of the subject-matter of the testimony of the two boys, other considerations lead us to the conclusion that the statement of the judge did irreparable damage to appellant's defense. Whatever the nature of the examination of the two witnesses, whether counsel were "getting anywhere" with it or not, we cannot avoid the conclusion that the judge's remarks showed a decided hostility toward appellant and toward his defense. In this connection we must mention a circumstance to which we have not yet adverted. We have observed that the statement of the judge occurred toward the close of the testimony of Park. A few pages further along in the record, and at the end of the testimony of that witness, the reporter's transcript shows the following, the italics being ours:

> "The Court: Now, gentlemen, the noon hour has arrived, and we will take an adjournment, if you have another witness that you can call or want to call, call him.
> "Mr. Utley [of counsel for defendant]: We have no other.
> "Mr. Willson [also for defendant]: Excepting the defendant; that will take some time.
> "The Court: Then you have no other witnesses of this kind?
> "Mr. Willson: You mean—
> "The Court: I mean to establish all the facts testified to by the plaintiff.
> "Mr. Willson: We do not, your honor—of course, we respect the court, but we do not so consider."

This return of the trial judge to the attack, after what he had said a few pages back in the record, will serve to accentuate all that we have said above upon the point presented as to his conduct. We mention the occurrence in this place particularly, however, for the reason that, but for the announcement of a noon recess of an hour and a quarter which immediately followed it, the quoted colloquy was the last event of the trial preceding the appellant's being sworn in his own behalf, for he took the stand, the last witness in the case, upon the reconvening of court after the recess. In such a position was his defense left when he alone and unsupported was to face the jury in testimony upon the serious charge pending against him. The jury could not have heard the judge say, as he had said but a short time previously, that appellant's counsel were "not establishing a thing," that all they were doing by all their witnesses on the facts was "to corroborate what was said by the plaintiff's witnesses," that they "must have some purpose" in their course, because they certainly knew they were not getting anywhere with their evidence, that if they had any witnesses that knew anything "that will contradict any witness brought or any one that knows anything material," they should "call the witness"; they could not have heard the district attorney say, under the inspiration of the judge's statement, that he did not object because appellant's evidence was "favorable to the prosecution"; they could not have heard the judge say, finally, that appellant's witnesses were of a kind "to establish all the facts testified to by the plaintiff"; the jury could not have heard all these things without feeling that all the evidence offered to them up to the moment that appellant took the stand in his own behalf tended to prove his guilt. Undoubtedly he opened his testimony with the jury feeling as they had felt at the close of the case for the prosecution; nay, he was in even a worse position, for the jury had heard the judge say that the testimony of his witnesses had corroborated the testimony of the prosecution, which was to say, in effect, that when he took the stand he had a stronger case to meet by his testimony than if he had foregone the aid of other witnesses and had himself testified immediately after the people had rested. We cannot feel that, so handicapped, appellant had the fair trial to which he was entitled under the law.

[3] The Attorney General insists that appellant's contention can avail him nothing, for the reason that no exception was taken to the statement of the judge at the time it was made. It is the general rule, of course, that misconduct of a district attorney or of a trial judge must be called to the attention of the court by a defendant whose rights are prejudiced by it, upon the theory that through timely objection or exception the court is given the opportunity duly to admonish the jury to disregard the fault, thus making harmless a course of conduct which but for the admonition would be harmful. It is not always true, however, that admonition will eradicate the evil done by an improper statement made by district attorney or judge. When it will not, the necessity for objection to the misconduct vanishes, and in such a case the error is not cured, even if the court, in the absence of objection, hastens in an attempt to correct the impression improperly conveyed to the jury. People v. Derwae, 155 Cal. 592, 102 Pac. 266; People v. McDonald, 167 Cal. 545, 140 Pac. 256. It is impossible for us to imagine what the judge could have said, by way of admonition or instruction, of sufficient potency to remove from the minds of the jury the effect of his statements made in their presence in this case. His utterance was not a short, sharp expression, the effect of which might have been removed by a statement that it came forth through inadvertence or undue haste. He spoke at some length, and added one harmful remark to another, until the total was enough to do substantial and lasting injury to the defense. Moreover, he evidently spoke with deliberation, for his remarks were prefaced by a statement that he disliked interposing the court's own objection; and, when he had concluded, he had impressed the jury with the idea that he spoke after due reflection, for his condemnation of the evidence of the defense reached back through the testimony of three witnesses; and, not content with what he then said, he took up the same theme a short time later, as we have already shown, thus settling his views firmly in the minds of the jury. Disregarding the rule that the jury are the sole judges of the facts, he placed before them what amounted to an expression of a deliberately formed opinion on his part, as appellant was about to take the stand as the last witness in his behalf, that the case of the prosecution was stronger than when the prosecution rested. Considering the nature of the evidence the people had offered, the jury could not well have escaped the conviction that the judge believed appellant guilty as charged. No admonition could have purged their minds of that conviction.

[4] The Attorney General takes the ground that the judge did admonish the jury to disregard his statements. After what we have said in the paragraph immediately preceding this, it is not worth while to spend any great time upon a consideration of this claim. Therefore we shall notice it but briefly. At the conclusion of the colloquy between court and counsel which we have last quoted above, and immediately following the statement of Mr. Willson that "we respect the court, but we do not so consider," the judge said:

"Ladies and gentlemen of the jury, the remarks of the court are not for your consideration, it is only addressed to counsel; diregard it."

This is the "admonition" upon which the Attorney General makes his point. The judge's statement was ineffective for two reasons: First, it necessarily impressed the jury as referring only to the remark made just preceding the retort of Mr. Willson, and as not at all touching the longer statement of the judge made some time before; second, it was totally inadequate to the occasion, forgetting for the moment what we have said in the last preceding paragraph. The judge did not say that he had no right to speak as he had spoken, that all questions of fact were within the peculiar province of the jury, or that his opinions were incorrectly formed. On the contrary, he left with the jury the impression that he had the right so to disburden himself, albeit by way of remark to counsel, the duty of the jury being not to leave their ears unstopped when he found it necessary thus to speak. Such an "admonition" could have borne no fruit whatever.

[5] Appellant's counsel, in an endeavor to substantiate their claim that the prosecutrix testified under the coercion of her adoptive father and mother and Mr. Smith, and that certain physical disabilities under which the prosecutrix claimed she labored were due to her fear of them, especially of her adoptive father and mother, asked her several questions on cross-examination. These were objected to on the ground that they were incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and in each instance the objection was sustained. The various rulings are assigned as error. One of these questions was,

"You were afraid of your father when he came there to that Smith house that night, were you not?"

Another was:

"Now, what did your father say to you when you saw him at the Smith house?"

Yet another:

"You would never have said a word to anybody about this affair, had it not been for your fear of your father and mother; isn't that true?"

And still another:

"Your mother abused you when you arrived home?"

In order that their purpose in asking these questions might be clearly before the court, counsel made the following statement after the objection to the second question had been sustained:

"We offer to prove that this girl is testifying under the influence of her father and mother and has all the way through the proceedings, that she is under the duress of her adopted father and mother, and we make the offer to prove it by cross-examination as well as other witnesses."

To this offer the court responded, after an objection by the district attorney:

"The court ruled on the objection that it was immaterial; now the counsel offers to prove by this witness certain things which would run counter to the ruling of the court. Therefore the offer to prove by this witness is disallowed."

The Attorney General contends that none of these questions was proper cross-examination, but that position is not tenable, even if it be admitted that, strictly speaking, the questions were not legitimate cross-examination. None of the objections made by the district attorney included that ground. Moreover, the court, in his remarks in response to the offer of proof, distinctly stated that he considered the evidence as immaterial, and he specifically rejected the offer on that ground. Counsel were justified in taking the statement as final. They doubtless did so, and they doubtless refrained from calling witnesses by whom to prove the offered matter on that account. It would have been a futility for them to call witnesses for the purpose of making the proof, merely to have objection made to the testimony and to have it sustained on the ground that the evidence was immaterial. After all that had transpired they were amply justified in assuming finally that any evidence offered by them on the subject would meet that fate. We are convinced that the evidence proffered both by the questions and the offer of proof was not immaterial. People v. Knight, 5 Cal. Unrep. 231, 43 Pac. 6. It is certainly most important in a rape case that proof be made, if such be the fact, that the prosecutrix is influenced by her fear of others to testify against the defendant. The credibility of a witness in any judicial proceeding will be affected by the fact that the witness gives testimony through coercion or duress of others; and it is a most important function of the law of evidence to ascertain the credibility of witnesses. We are satisfied that the court erred in sustaining objection to the questions we have set out above.

A reversal of the case must follow from the commission of the errors we have noted, and we are therefore called upon to consider such other points discussed in the briefs as may arise upon a retrial.

[6] The information under which appellant was tried consisted of but one count, containing the two allegations that the prosecutrix was of the age of less than 18 years, and that the crime with which appellant was charged was committed by force and violence. The pleading was demurred to on the ground of an improper joinder in the respect mentioned and the demurrer was overruled.

It is contended that the ruling was error. The point is not well taken, as there was no improper joinder. People v. Jailles, 146 Cal. 301, 79 Pac. 965; People v. Maruyama, 19 Cal. App. 290, 125 Pac. 924.

[7] Counsel for appellant made several attempts at the trial to impeach testimony of the prosecutrix as to her age by asking her whether she had made statements on the same subject as a witness at the preliminary examination of appellant. In each instance they were halted by the court's sustaining an objection on the ground that no proper foundation for the inquiry had been laid. There is nothing in the record to show what the statements of the witness at the preliminary examination were. We are therefore unable to say that they were different from her statements made at the trial. Under such circumstances we are bound to assume that the rulings of the court in sustaining the objections, even if erroneous, which we do not decide, were harmless. An appellant must always make an affirmative showing that errors of the trial court have resulted prejudicially to him.

[8] Appellant contends that the trial court erred in receiving, over his objection, testimony of the adoptive father and mother of the prosecutrix as to her age. Their testimony on the subject was based upon their recollection of the appearance of the girl as indicating her age at the time of her adoption by them, the answers evidently having been given through a process of adding the number of elapsed years after the adoption to the number representing the age the girl appeared to have attained when the adoption occurred. Whatever intrinsic merit this question possesses is robbed of interest on the present appeal because of the fact that appellant himself introduced evidence showing prosecutrix to have been less than 18 years of age at the time of the commission of the alleged offense. This evidence is in documentary form, and is entitled "Application for Admission of a Child to the Michigan Children's Home Society." The child mentioned in the application was the prosecutrix, and, among various items of statistical matter concerning her set forth in the paper, the date of her birth is stated. Under well-established rules of evidence appellant is bound on this appeal by the showing made by this document, introduced by himself. Nor does it matter that the paper was not a public record, and that it might have been excluded upon objection by the district attorney as "inadmissible evidence, if admitted without objection, is sufficient proof of the fact to which it relates." Prentice v. Miller, 82 Cal. 570, 23 Pac. 189. It becomes necessary, however, to consider the point made by appellant, as it may arise on the retrial of the cause, when appellant may not see fit again to offer the application.

[9] It appears to be settled by an overwhelming weight of authority that a witness may give his opinion as to the age of one whose age is the subject of judicial inquiry. Where the point presented is merely as to whether the individual in question has passed from minority to majority, some cases are to the effect that the opinion of any witness who has seen him may be taken. Where the ascertainment of exact age is necessary, a sterner test is generally applied. In such a case the witness must have had an intimacy, or at least an acquaintance of some duration, with the person whose age is under inquiry before the opinion may be received. In both kinds of cases, however, that is, in those in which the question is merely as to the passage from minority to majority, as well as in those in which age is to be ascertained, many of the authorities decide that the opinion cannot be given until after the witness has described the individual who is the subject of the inquiry. A copious list of cases in support of all these rules may be found in a note to State v. Pruett, L. R. A. 1918A, 662, 685. In a number of decisions it has been held that opinion evidence as to age, generally, may be received only when the subject of the inquiry is not in attendance in court or is deceased (State v. Robinson, 32 Or. 43, 48 Pac. 357), and the cases deciding that a description of the subject must accompany the opinion would seem to be based upon the same theory, for if he were present in court no description would be necessary. The reason for this rule is that if age is to be determined from appearance and the subject is in court the jury may themselves resolve the question without the aid of opinion evidence. It has been determined in this state that the age at a particular time of one who was deceased at the date of the inquiry was provable by the opinion of one who had known him for 25 years. People v. Bond, 13 Cal. App. 175, 109 Pac. 150.

[10] We state these various rules of law in but a general way, for the reason that it appears to us to be unnecessary to review or to distinguish separately the cases which announce them. No case like the one now before us has come to our attention, and any of the rules which are above stated, and which would appear at first glance to operate against the reception of the opinions of the adoptive parents as to the age of the prosecutrix, may be shown not to apply here. They testified at a time when she had been under their especial care and observation as a dependent member of their household, as their child, although by adoption, for a period of 9 years. She had come to them as a little girl, and they had observed, practically as minutely and narrowly as would natural parents, her transition from childhood to budding womanhood. It is next to impossible that they did not know her actual age at the time of the adoption, although the knowledge might be hearsay when tested by the rules of evidence. It is next to impossible, granting for the moment that her age at the period of the adoption was unknown to them, that they did not know her approximate age at the time they testified. They fixed her age as more than 2 years under 18, and, reasoning from the standpoint that only an approximation was possible as coming from them, it is impossible that under all the circumstances of their intimate association with her they could have been 2 years from the truth in stating the approximation. They need not have described her, for she was present in court. On the other hand, her presence in court did not render their opinions inadmissible under a rule we have stated above, for it would be futile to assert that the jury could judge her age from seeing her a few hours as well as could they after having, during 9 years, reared her to young womanhood. If it be said that the testimony of the adoptive parents might in some sense be designated as secondary to books of public record which might disclose the date of the birth of the prosecutrix, although the assertion would not apply in the case of natural parents, it may be retorted that the record before us discloses that she was born outside of the state. Therefore, evidence secondary to the public records of the date of birth would be admissible. On the whole, to conclude, we are convinced that the opinions of the adoptive parents were properly received.

[11] Appellant contends that the trial court erred in sustaining an objection to the question, which referred to the prosecutrix and which was addressed to her adoptive mother on cross-examination:

> "You have even caused her to be put in the Juvenile Hall after the preliminary hearing?"

This question was asked in support of the defense that the prosecutrix was under duress in giving her testimony in the cause. It appears to us, however, that it did not tend to prove that defense, and that the objection that it was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial was for that reason good.

[12] It is insisted that the court erred in refusing an instruction to the effect that the testimony of the prosecutrix "ought to be viewed with great care and caution by you, and you must weigh the evidence in this case with utmost care, without bias or prejudice." Cautionary instructions of this character are proper in rape cases, under many decisions, either when the prosecutrix is a child of tender years, or when her testimony is uncorroborated. Neither of these conditions was present in this case. Therefore the instruction was uncalled for. People v. Rangod, 112 Cal. 669, 44 Pac. 1071; People v. Corey, 8 Cal. App. 720, 97 Pac. 907. Nor do we mean to determine whether the refusal to give such an instruction, in a case where it were proper to give it, would amount to reversible error.

[13] Appellant requested the trial court to instruct the jury as follows:

> "You are instructed that you shall not allow your minds to be prejudiced against this defendant merely because he has been charged here with this crime, nor on account of the nature of the crime here charged, but you are to consider just as fairly and without prejudice the evidence in this case, both for the prosecution and the defendant, as you would if the crime charged were of another nature."

Perhaps it would not have been improper for the court to have given this instruction; but, on the other hand, it was not error to refuse to give it. People v. Barney, 114 Cal. 554, 47 Pac. 41.

The judgment and the order denying the motion for a new trial are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial. The appeal from the order denying the motion in arrest of judgment is dismissed.

YOUDALL v. KAUFMAN. (Civ. 2346.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 25, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑854(3) — Demurrer sustained is deemed sustained on any ground on which it is well taken.

Where a demurrer is sustained and no particular ground for sustaining specified, it is deemed to have been sustained on any ground as to which it is well taken.

2. Pleading 🔑224—After sustaining demurrer to three of five paragraphs of an answer entering judgment for plaintiff on demurrer was error.

In ejectment, where the answer set up five defenses, and, under Code Civ. Proc. § 443, providing that demurrer may be made to one or more defenses, a demurrer was entered to three of these, leaving two good and sufficient defenses unassailed, upon sustaining the demurrer, entering judgment for plaintiff was error.

3. Ejectment 🔑23—Mistake as to boundary not a defense.

In ejectment, answer setting up that defendant committed the trespass under mistake as to boundary line did not relieve him from the duty of surrendering the property and making reparation in damages for the trespass.

4. Ejectment 🔑69—Admission in answer of a lease not alleged in complaint not averment of any fact.

In an action of ejectment, where the complaint did not allege a lease of the land in question to defendant, a statement in the answer that defendant admitted a lease of premises from plaintiff to him does not amount to an issuable allegation of a lease, not being an averment of fact.

5. Perjury 🔑1—Perjury is not committed by verified answer conceding a lease which the complaint did not allege.

In an action of ejectment, where the complaint did not allege a lease of the land in question to defendant, a verified answer, admitting a lease from plaintiff to defendant, is not perjury.

6. Pleading 🔑8(7)—Allegation in ejectment that defendant leased from plaintiff land in question, which lease had never been canceled held conclusions and insufficient.

In an action of ejectment, a statement that defendant leased from plaintiff the land in question, and that the lease had never been canceled or terminated, were conclusions, and further reference by the words "by reason of said lease," and another reference, "That defendant agreed to pay plaintiff a nominal sum as rental thereof until the entire matter could be adjusted," were too vague and indefinite.

7. Pleading 🔑214(4)—A demurrer does not admit the correctness of conclusions.

A demurrer does not admit correctness of conclusions.

8. Ejectment 🔑69—Denial that defendant is or ever was in possession is in effect the denial of an ouster.

In an action of ejectment, a denial by defendant in his answer that he "is or ever was in possession" is, in effect, a denial of an ouster, and is sufficient in the absence of objection thereto.

9. Appeal and error 🔑1073(1)—Judgment erroneous in part not reversed, where no prejudice results.

In an action of ejectment for two adjoining tracts of land, where judgment was properly given against defendant as to one tract, which would carry with it the costs, where he was never in possession of the second tract a judgment against him as to this tract is not injurious, and there should be no reversal as to it.

10. Pleading 🔑224 — Denial of hearing on question of damages on sustaining demurrer to other parts of answer held error.

In ejectment asking damages for retention of possession, where defendant alleged a defense as to damages, denying him a hearing on the question of damages on sustaining a demurrer which was good as to other matters alleged in defense, but not good as to the matter alleged in defense of the claim for damages, was erroneous.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; D. M. Young, Judge.

Action by Leonard F. Youdall against Isadore Kaufman. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Modified and affirmed.

A. H. Carpenter, of Stockton, for appellant.

Carleton C. Case and Elmer W. Forslund, both of Stockton, for respondent.

PREWETT, Justice pro tem. Action in ejectment to recover the possession of two certain lots in the city of Stockton, described as the north half of lot 10 and the north half of lot 12 in a certain block in that city.

The complaint is in the ordinary form, averring ownership in the respondent and ouster by the appellant, and that the rents, issues, and profits are $150. The appellant answered, denying certain allegations and furnishing insufficient defenses as to others. The court sustained a demurrer to the answer, with leave to the appellant to amend. He declined to amend, and in due course judgment was rendered against him for the recovery of both tracts and $150 as rents, issues, and profits. No costs were awarded to the respondent.

As the action of the court in sustaining the demurrer to the answer is the only point involved in this appeal, it will be found profitable to quote at length all the material parts of both answer and demurrer. The material parts of the answer are as follows (the numbers of the paragraphs are ours):

1. "Admits that plaintiff is the owner of the real property described in the complaint, and that he leased from plaintiff the north half of lot 12 * * * at a nominal rent for the ground thereof; and in that behalf alleges that such lease is still in full force and effect, and has never been terminated, canceled or revoked by notice as required by section 789, Civil Code, or in any other manner or way whatsoever."

2. "Denies that he is or ever was in possession of any part of the north half of lot 10 or that he ever leased the same from plaintiff."

3. "Denies * * * that he is wrongfully occupying or withholding the possession of the north half of said lot 12 of said tract; and in that behalf alleges that his occupation of the said last-named piece of land is rightful and lawful by reason of his said lease from plaintiff, which has never been canceled, revoked or terminated in any manner or way whatsoever."

4. "Denies that the value of the rents, issues and profits of said real property is the sum of $150, or any other or greater sum that $1 per month during the defendant's occupancy thereof, or the sum of $11. * * *"

5. "That the said Morrell erected said dwelling mainly on the south half of lot 12, but by mistake, extended the rear thereof upon the north half of the same lot * * * and when so informed by the plaintiff, defendant agreed to pay plaintiff a nominal sum as rental thereof until the entire matter could be adjusted."

The answer further shows that said Morrell was acting as an agent of the respondent in the erection of a dwelling on the south half of lot 12. There are a number of other allegations in the pleading, but they are unimportant.

The demurrer is directed to the allegations and denials contained in those paragraphs which we have designated as numbers 1, 3, and 5, and it is wholly silent as to paragraphs 2 and 4. Its grounds are stated as follows:

> "1. That said answer does not state facts sufficient to constitute a defense, for the reason that said answer shows upon its face that the defendant unlawfully and wrongfully entered upon the real property, the possession of which is sought to be recovered by plaintiff.
> "2. That the alleged lease mentioned by the defendant in said answer is not sufficiently identified or set up; that there is no allegation as to whether said alleged lease was or was not in writing, or the date thereof, or the amount of rental to be paid, or the length of the term of said lease; and said answer does not allege that the said plaintiff ever agreed to or accepted the terms of the alleged lease mentioned by defendant.
> "3. For the reasons given above the said answer is ambiguous.
> "4. For the reasons given above the said answer is unintelligible.
> "5. For the reasons given above the said answer is uncertain."

[1] The court, in sustaining the demurrer, did not specify any particular ground; hence it is deemed to have been sustained upon any ground as to which it is well taken. Sechrist v. Rialto, 129 Cal. 640, 62 Pac. 261.

[2] It is, of course, at once conceded that the denials contained in paragraphs 2 and 4 of the answer are good in form as to the particular matters which they attempt to deny, and that they raise material issues in the case. The appellant had a right to deny the allegation in the complaint that he withheld the north half of lot 10, and a like right to deny that the rents, issues, and profits exceeded the sum of $11. These two defenses were not demurred to, and the issues met by them were never tried. This was clearly error, unless the action of the court in sustaining the demurrer to other portions of the answer operated to carry these defenses with it. In this last event, the demurrer having been sustained in general terms, the effect of the order was to leave no answer on file, and the default of the appellant for not filing an amended answer was properly entered. While this is the rule where a demurrer is sustained to a pleading, all of whose parts are interdependent and constitute one complete and connected statement of a cause of action or ground of defense, it is not the rule as to a demurrer directed only to certain specified defenses, leaving other and sufficient ones unassailed. It will be shown further along that the demurrer was properly sustained as to defenses numbered 1, 3, and 5. The effect of the demurrer was to leave intact and unassailed the defense or denial that appellant withheld lot 10 and the denial that the damages exceeded $11. In support of this point, we will quote from but one case, as it appears to be conclusive:

> "Where a pleading contains sufficient to make a good cause of action or a good defense, the effect of sustaining a special demurrer thereto is no different than * * * results where a motion to strike out has been granted. Where such a demurrer has been sustained, and the party affected fails to amend, then the portions of the pleading so specially demurred to will be taken out of view for the purposes of the trial, and be deemed to have been stricken out." Pitzel v. Maier Brewing Co., 20 Cal. App. 737, 130 Pac. 705, 706.

The words "special demurrer," as used in the opinion from which we have just quoted, were construed by the Supreme Court, on petition for a hearing in that court, to mean a "demurrer to same particular detached portion" of the pleading. Section 443 of the Code of Civil Procedure expressly provides that a plaintiff may demur to one or more of several defenses set up in an answer. In the present case, one of the defenses set up in the answer is the denial by appellant of possession of lot 10, and another is the denial as to the rents, issues, and profits. The respondent, doubtless realizing that a demurrer would not lie to them, made no attempt to assail them by that means. They stand to-day as unimpeached denials and defenses in the case. Several other cases, from which, however, we will not quote, throw much light on the point discussed in the Pitzel Case. They are: Sukeforth v. Lord, 87 Cal. 399, 25 Pac. 497; Locke v. Peters, 65 Cal. 161, 3 Pac. 657, and Hagely v. Hagely, 68 Cal. 348, 9 Pac. 305. The conclusion that the matters set out in paragraphs two and four of the answer constitute subsisting defenses is so clearly sustained by the authorities above cited, that further attention to the point would be superfluous.

[3] Turning to the chief controversy in the case, which appears to involve the north half of lot 12, we will inquire whether the matters set up in paragraphs numbered 1, 3, and 5, and relating to said lot, constitute a defense. In these allegations, the appellant admits the commission of a trespass upon said lot, and he pleads no legal justification therefor. He shows, perhaps, that he committed the trespass under a mistake as to the location of the boundary line, but this does not relieve him from the duty of surrendering back the property and making full reparation in damages for the trespass.

[4, 5] The complaint in no manner or form alleges or hints at a lease. Nevertheless the appellant purports to admit that he leased the tract in question from the respondent, but this admission, in the absence of an allegation to be admitted, does not amount to an issuable allegation that he so leased it. At most, he merely concedes it. The answer is verified, and upon such a concession, where there is nothing to concede, he could not be held for a perjury in making it. Moreover such a vacuous admission, when directly challenged by demurrer, is wholly insufficient to amount to an averment of the fact.

[6, 7] Even if we could read the word "admits" as meaning "alleges," the allegation would still fall far short of a proper pleading. The sole allegation, as thus construed, is that he "leased from the plaintiff the north half of lot 12 * * * at a nominal rent for the ground thereof." The respondent is entitled, as against his demurrer, to a distinct allegation of such an array of facts as will enable the court to say, as a mere matter of law, that the respondent leased the premises to the appellant, and that the lease still subsists. It is quiet apparent that the appellant has failed to meet this test. His several statements in his answer that the lease has never been "canceled or terminated" amount only to conclusions of the pleader. A demurrer does not admit the correctness of conclusions.

The second reference in the answer to the alleged lease consists of the use of the words "by reason of said lease." The third and remaining reference is found in paragraph 5, and is in the following words:

> "That defendant agreed to pay plaintiff a nominal sum as rental thereof until the entire matter could be adjusted."

But there is here no allegation that the respondent parted with the leasehold estate to the appellant, nor that he ever assented to or accepted appellant's agreement. Other infirmities in the allegation are plainly apparent. Only by conjecture could the court ascertain that the lease still subsists. In all respects it is too vague and indefinite to stand as a pleading.

Taken as a whole, paragraphs 1, 3, and 5 do not state a defense, and, in addition, they are uncertain and unintelligible. They are the only paragraphs toward which the demurrer was directed, and as to them it was properly sustained. The court appears to have treated the demurrer as going to the entire answer, and its order was entered accordingly. While this action as to lot 10 and the claim for damages was clearly erroneous, it does not follow that the appellant was injured thereby, at least not beyond the power of this court to furnish a provisional remedy without ordering a new trial. It is manifest that the substantial controversy concerns only lot 12, and as to that tract the judgment of the court is right. The appellant concedes that he does not own, and that the respondent does own, the north half of this lot. He concedes the ouster and the continued trespass and furnishes no justification for them. Thus far, the judgment is sustained by the pleadings and the proofs.

[8] The appellant concedes that the respondent owns the north half of lot 10. He does not complain of an adjudication based upon this fact, for he admits it. He does, however, deny that he "is or ever was in possession" of any part of it. While this does not in express terms deny an ouster, it does in effect do so. In the absence of objection this denial is sufficient.

[9] Conceding, as we must, that this denial is true, the proper form of judgment should be that the respondent take nothing by the action, and that he pay the appellant's costs. Although appellant does not concede that he withholds this tract, he does concede that he has no right to withhold it, and therefore he is only technically injured by a judgment based upon the assumption that he still withholds it. He is not injured, even as to his costs, since he loses them in any event as an incident to the judgment as to lot 12. Moreover, his costs amount to but $2 or $3. If the judgment were reversed, and the case sent back for trial as to lot 10, the final judgment would leave the appellant where, for all practical purposes, he is at present. This would follow from the concession made in the brief of respondent, which is, in legal effect, that paragraph 2 of the answer is true. If there has been no miscarriage of justice, if, in other words, the appellant is uninjured by the judgment, there should be no reversal as to lot 10. There is no occasion to reverse it as to lot 12, for as to that tract the judgment is technically correct.

[10] However, the appellant denied that the damages suffered by the respondent exceeded $11. The judgment assesses them at $150. He was entitled to a hearing on this point, and it was error to deny him a hearing. He cannot complain of damages up to the sum of $11, for he concedes them. We cannot determine whether these damages were assessed upon the one lot or the other, nor the amount apportioned to each.

The judgment as to both tracts is affirmed. The judgment as to damages is reversed, unless the respondent shall, within 30 days after the judgment of this court is entered, remit all damages in excess of $11. If within said period said damages are thus remitted, the entire judgment will stand affirmed. The appellant will recover his costs on this appeal.

(District Court of Appeals, Third District, California. Nov. 29, 1921.)

1. Quieting title 🔑30(1)—In suit to quiet title allegation that plaintiff owned all the land did not prevent intervention of those beneficially interested.

In a suit to quiet title to land owned by plaintiff partly for himself and partly in trust for others, an allegation in the complaint that plaintiff owned all the land, even if seriously claimed by the subsequent pleadings of plaintiff, would not preclude other persons not made parties defendant to his complaint from intervening and setting forth their claims to the property, since Code Civ. Proc. § 387, provides that at any time before trial any person having an interest in the matter in litigation or in the success of the parties, or an interest against both, may intervene.

2. Trial 🔑396(3)—Findings of court held not inconsistent with pleadings.

In a suit to quiet title, in which plaintiff alleged that he owned all the land, but two interveners alleged that plaintiff held two-thirds of the land in trust for them, and plaintiff filed an answer to defendant's cross-complaint, alleging that one-third of the land belonged to him and that he held two-thirds in trust for the interveners and had conveyed to defendant relying upon defendant's promise to reconvey when requested, the finding of the court that defendant was owner of one-third, and that the interveners were each the owner of a one-third interest, and that defendant took the land with an agreement to reconvey it to them, was not inconsistent with the pleadings.

3. Trusts 🔑96—Breach of oral agreement to reconvey held to create a constructive trust.

Where a conveyance was made by plaintiff to defendant, his brother, upon an oral promise of defendant to reconvey when requested, although under Civ. Code, § 852, for a trust in relation to real property to be valid it must be created or declared by written instrument or by operation of law, and although void under section 857, in force at that time, providing that a trust for the conveyance of real property could not be formed, the transaction grew out of and was founded upon a fiduciary relation, and was a constructive trust arising by operation of law, which is valid under section 852, subd. 3.

4. Trusts 🔑62—"Resulting trust" defined.

A "resulting trust" arises by operation of law where the legal estate is disposed of or acquired, not fraudulently or in violation of any fiduciary duty, but the intent and theory of equity appears or is inferred or assumed from the terms or disposition, or from the accompanying facts and circumstances, and that the beneficial interest is not to go with the legal title (Civ. Code, § 853).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Resulting Trust.]

5. Appeal and error 🔑907(3)—On appeal on judgment roll, presumed that evidence was received to support findings of court.

In a suit to quiet title to land conveyed by one brother to another on a promise to reconvey when requested, where there was a finding of the court that a fiduciary relation existed, on appeal from the judgment on the judgment roll alone, a presumption arises that there was evidence received without objection, in addition to the fact that they were brothers, showing the existence of confidential or fiduciary relation prior to and at the time of the conveyance.

6. Trusts 🔑103(2)—Fiduciary relation between grantee and grantor held to extend to those for whom grantor held title, so as to make them beneficiaries of a constructive trust.

Where a grantor held title partly for himself and partly as a trustee for others, and conveyed the land to his brother on a promise to reconvey when requested, a fiduciary and confidential relation existing between the brothers extended to those for whom the grantor held title, so as to make them beneficiaries of the constructive trust in favor of the grantor.

7. Limitation of actions 🔑103(2)—Statute held not to begin to run until trust was repudiated.

Where a grantor held title partly for himself and partly in trust for others, and conveyed to a grantee, his brother, on a promise to reconvey when requested, the constructive trust created was a continuing one, and the statute of limitations did not begin to run against those for whom the grantor held title until there was a repudiation of the trust.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; J. C. Needham, Judge.

Suit by James J. Cummings against Frank M. Cummings, in which W. J. Hammonds and Thomas H. Wolfe and Annie E. Cummings intervened. From a judgment that defendant was entitled to one-third of certain lands and that interveners Richards and Wolfe were entitled to two-thirds of the land and that intervener Annie E. Cummings had no interest in the land, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Joseph Edward Connolly, of San Francisco (Charles Heggerty and Knight & Heggerty, all of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

A. H. Ricketts, of San Francisco, for respondent.

J. M. Walthall, of Modesto (Leon A. Clark, of Oakland, and F. O. Hoover, of Modesto, of counsel), for interveners and respondents.

HART, J. The plaintiff brought this action to quiet his title as against the defendant Frank M. Cummings to 320 acres of land situated in Stanislaus county. The appeal is by the defendant from the judgment, on the judgment roll alone, and therefore the findings, so far as this record discloses (and, indeed, as must be presumed), contain a full and complete history of the controversy between the parties. From the findings, consequently, the facts herein presented will be extracted, although it is deemed proper first to refer briefly to the several pleadings filed.

The complaint is in the usual form of a pleading designed to secure such relief. The defendant answered, denying the material allegations of the complaint and also filed a cross-complaint, alleging, among other things, that the plaintiff, on the 31st day of May, 1911, executed and delivered to the defendant a grant, bargain, and sale deed of conveyance, whereby he sold and transferred to the said defendant the property described in the complaint; said deed having been duly recorded in the office of the county recorder of Stanislaus county on the 3d day of June, 1911.

The plaintiff replied to the cross-complaint, traversing its material averments and alleging, in substance: That the property in dispute, at the time of the execution and delivery of the deed by plaintiff to the defendant, was owned in common by and in possession of the plaintiff, Thomas H. Wolfe, and W. J. Hammonds; that upon the acquisition of the ownership of the property by plaintiff, Hammonds, and Wolfe from one H. C. Morris, the title thereto was conveyed to plaintiff upon the agreement and understanding that he would, when requested by Hammonds and Wolfe, reconvey to them a two-thirds interest in the property; that plaintiff, reposing great faith and confidence in the defendant, his brother, and believing that he would faithfully execute the trust created in him, and relying upon defendant's promises to reconvey said premises when requested so to do, made conveyance to defendant of the land in question, upon the express understanding and agreement that the defendant would hold the same in trust for said Hammonds, Wolfe, and plaintiff in equal proportions and reconvey the same to them upon their request.

The prayer of the cross-complaint is that the plaintiff and interveners be declared the equal owners of the land in question and that defendant be required to convey the same to them.

Hammonds and Wolfe, having first obtained the consent of the court so to do, filed a joint complaint in intervention. We need not reproduce here the averments of said complaint in intervention, inasmuch as the facts found by the court are substantially in accord with the facts pleaded in said complaint. The prayer of the complaint in intervention filed by Hammonds and Wolfe is for a decree adjudging that each of said interveners has and owns an undivided one-third interest in and to the said real property, and that the said defendant be required to execute and deliver a deed conveying to the said interveners respectively their said undivided interests. The defendant answered the complaint in intervention, specifically denying each and all of the material averments thereof, and also set up as in bar of the action the provisions of sections 337 and 343 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

Annie E. Cummings, wife of the plaintiff, having first obtained permission from the court to intervene, filed a complaint in intervention, alleging that the property in controversy was acquired during the coverture of herself and the plaintiff; that it was community property; that it was transferred to the defendant by the plaintiff without any consideration; that she did not sign the instrument conveying said property to the defendant and had no knowledge of the purported conveyance by her husband to the defendant until the month of August, 1917. To the complaint in intervention by Mrs. Cummings the defendant replied, denying the material allegations thereof and pleading laches as a bar to her right to the relief prayed for in her complaint in intervention.

The history of the controversy, as it is to be gleaned from the findings of fact, may be summarily given as follows: That some time prior to the 10th day of June, 1907, the plaintiff and the interveners Hammonds and Wolfe jointly entered into negotiations for the purchase of the real property described in the complaint. These negotiations culminated on the 3d day of August, 1907, by the purchase of said property by the plaintiff and the said interveners. Pending the negotiations for the purchase of the property, an agreement or understanding was had between the plaintiff and Wolfe and Hammonds that said Cummings and Wolfe were to pay for said land and that Hammonds was to conduct and complete said negotiations for the purchase thereof from H. C. Morris, who was then the owner thereof. It was further agreed that upon the purchase of the land, the plaintiff, Hammonds, and Wolfe should become the owners of the land in common, each to own an undivided one-third interest therein, but that the land, for the sake of convenience, should stand in the name of James J. Cummings, who was to hold the same in trust, one-third belonging to the plaintiff, one-third to W. J. Hammonds and one-third to Thomas H. Wolfe. This latter agreement was reduced to writing and signed by Hammonds, Wolfe, and plaintiff. It further appears that, upon the purchase of said land by the parties just named, Hammonds took up his residence upon the land and continued in the possession thereof, although there had never been a conveyance by the plaintiff either to Hammonds or to Wolfe of the one-third interest to which each was entitled. For some reason, not explained by the findings, except that which is to be found in the general statement that it was "for convenience," the intervener Wolfe requested the plaintiff to transfer said property to some one to be held in trust for himself (plaintiff) and Hammonds and Wolfe, and that thereupon the plaintiff selected his brother, the defendant, Frank M. Cummings, as the person to whom he would transfer the property in trust for the purposes stated. The plaintiff having revealed to Hammonds and Wolfe the fact that he had selected his (plaintiff's) brother as the person to whom the title to the land would be transferred in trust for the owners thereof, Hammonds and Wolfe consented thereto after the purposes of the trust had been fully explained to the defendant and upon the latter's promise that he would reconvey the property to the plaintiff and said interveners at any time that they would make a demand therefor. Accordingly, on the 31st day of May, 1911, the plaintiff executed a conveyance of the premises in question to the defendant; the instrument having been prepared by the intervener Wolfe, and said conveyance was, on the 3d day of June, 1911, recorded in the office of the recorder of Stanislaus county.

The court found:

> "That said conveyance was made to said defendant without consideration, in trust for said interveners W. J. Hammonds and Thomas H. Wolfe, and that said defendant accepted said conveyance to be held by him in trust as aforesaid; that the plaintiff and defendant are brothers, and at the time of the conveyance of said property by the plaintiff to the defendant occupied the relation of great confidence to each other; that they had other dealings in properties of a similar nature calling for and exhibiting great confidence between them; and that the plaintiff relied on these relations in conveying said property to the defendant in trust for the said interveners W. J. Hammonds and Thomas H. Wolfe."

It was further found that—

> The defendant, Frank M. Cummings, "paid no taxes of any kind or nature levied or assessed against said property until after the institution of this action, and that said Frank M. Cummings never resided on said property and never received any rent, issues, or profits therefrom, and never demanded or accepted or received any accounting for rent or use of said property, and never claimed to either said W. J. Hammonds or Thomas H. Wolfe that he owned any interest in said property; that the said conveyance by the said plaintiff to the defendant, Frank M. Cummings, was made without any consideration passing from said Frank M. Cummings to the interveners W. J. Hammonds and Thomas H. Wolfe, or either of them, and that the said conveyance was made to said Frank M. Cummings in trust for the said interveners W. J. Hammonds and Thomas H. Wolfe as to their said two-thirds' interest therein, and that said Frank M. Cummings never denied or repudiated said trust until after the 1st day of August, 1917; that it was intended by the plaintiff and defendant and the said interveners Hammonds and Wolfe that said deed should grant, and said deed did grant, to the said defendant, Frank M. Cummings, an undivided two-thirds interest in said real property in trust for said interveners W. J. Hammonds and Thomas H. Wolfe, to be reconveyed to said interveners on demand, and an undivided one-third interest in said real property in fee to the said defendant, Frank M. Cummings."

As to the claim set forth by Mrs. Annie E. Cummings in her complaint in intervention, the court found that, while she did not sign or execute the conveyance of said property by James J. Cummings to Frank M. Cummings, she nevertheless had knowledge or the means of acquiring knowledge of said conveyance, "and is now estopped from claiming any interest in said property."

It further appears that all taxes levied against the property down to the date of the filing of the complaint in this action were paid by the plaintiff, James J. Cummings, and the intervener Annie E. Cummings; that since the institution of this action the defendant has paid taxes assessed against the property for the year 1918 aggregating $270.80; that the plaintiff and interveners Hammonds and Wolfe have offered in court to repay the same with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from the date of each payment to the date of trial, amounting in all to the sum of $283.32; that it was the understanding or the agreement that during the said trust the said Hammonds was to pay no taxes levied upon or assessed against said real property; that after the said conveyance by plaintiff to his brother the intervener Annie E. Cummings paid taxes assessed against said property amounting to the sum of $81.15.

The conclusions of law and the judgment harmonize with the findings. The plaintiff and the intervener Annie E. Cummings have not appealed.

The appellant, in supporting his appeal, finds what he conceives to be not only fatal inconsistencies between the pleadings of his adversaries, but like inconsistencies between said pleadings and the findings. As to the pleadings, he emphasizes the fact that, while the complaint alleges that the plaintiff is the owner of all the real property therein described, both the answer of plaintiff to the cross-complaint of defendant and the complaint in intervention of Hammonds and Wolfe allege that plaintiff and interveners were the owners in common of said property. As to the proposition that the findings are not supported by the pleadings just referred to, the appellant in his brief declares:

> "The findings declare both that defendant holds in trust one-third for plaintiff and two-thirds for Hammonds and Wolfe and that defendant holds in trust two-thirds for Hammonds and Wolfe and one-third in fee for defendant, and also find that the only agreement between plaintiff and Hammonds and Wolfe was that Hammonds would convey two-thirds to plaintiff and Wolfe, and also that it was intended that the deed by plaintiff to defendant should grant, and said deed did grant, to defendant two-thirds in trust for Hammonds and Wolfe and one-third in fee for defendant."

It is further contended by appellant that the trust alleged in the pleadings of the plaintiff and interveners Hammonds and Wolfe is not the trust found by the court, and "the judgment establishes a trust not alleged, and only one of the trusts found." This contention is founded on the theory that, since the plaintiff in his answer to the cross-complaint of defendant, and Hammonds and Wolfe in their complaint in intervention, allege that defendant received and accepted the deed from plaintiff in trust for plaintiff and Hammonds and Wolfe, the court found that the defendant was the owner of an undivided one-third interest in the property, and that as to the other undivided two-thirds interest therein he held the land in trust for Hammonds and Wolfe.

[1] The criticisms thus directed against both the pleadings of the adversaries of the defendant and the findings are devoid of legal force. It is obviously wholly immaterial that the plaintiff in his complaint, which, as we have seen, was for the quieting of his title to the land in dispute, therein claimed that he was the owner of all the land in controversy; and this would be true even if he had seriously claimed, by answer or otherwise, throughout the progress of the pleadings subsequent to his complaint, that he was the sole owner of all said land. That fact could not have the effect legally of precluding other persons, not made parties defendant to his complaint, from intervening and setting forth any claim or claims they might have to the property. Code Civ. Proc. § 387. But it is reasonably inferable from all the pleadings that the plaintiff, in instituting the action to quiet title to the land as against the defendant, was not only acting for himself, but also for his co-owners of the land, Hammonds and Wolfe. He might have assumed that, having been authorized as an agent of Hammonds and Wolfe to convey the property to some third party as a matter of convenience, and having in the exercise of the authority thus conferred upon him conveyed it to his brother, the defendant herein, he was still authorized to secure a reconveyance of the land from his brother to him through his action to quiet title, not only for his own benefit, but also for the benefit of Hammonds and Wolfe. But, be that as it may, it is true that the real issues which were finally submitted to the court for decision were made by the plaintiff's answer to the defendant's cross-complaint, the two complaints in intervention filed by Hammonds and Wolfe and Mrs. Cummings, and the answers thereto by the defendant, and the real issues thus presented were whether the land was owned in common by Wolfe, Hammonds, and the plaintiff and conveyed to the defendant by the plaintiff in trust for the said three parties claiming such ownership of the land, as alleged in the complaint in intervention as well as in the answer of the plaintiff to the defendant's cross-complaint.

[2] Nor are we able to discern a fatal inconsistency between the findings and the averments of the complaint of the said interveners and the answer of the plaintiff to the defendant's cross-complaint. It is true that the court found that the one-third interest which was claimed by the plaintiff was owned by the defendant, and it is true that so far the findings do not correspond with the pleadings of the said interveners and the plaintiff; but the court did find, as we have seen, that Hammonds and Wolfe were each the owner of a one-third interest in said land and that defendant took the same in his name with an agreement to reconvey it to them, and in so finding it found that the trust as alleged arose at least in part. There cannot be said to be any more of a variance between the pleadings and the findings here than there would be if A. should sue B. to recover upon a promissory note, the face value of which was $1,000, and had alleged that no part of the principal of said note or the interest had been paid by the maker, and the proofs and findings showed that, as a matter of fact, the maker had paid a considerable sum upon the principal and interest, thus reducing the judgment to an amount much less than that for which the plaintiff had prayed and to which he would have been entitled if the allegations of his complaint had been established. The whole issue as to the ownership of the land in dispute was before the court upon pleadings properly framed, and it was within the power of the court—indeed, its duty—to adjudicate the whole question of ownership according as the evidence might in its judgment justify and award to each of the litigants establishing his claim of part ownership a judgment for such interest as the proofs showed he had in the property.

[3, 4] But the more serious question is as to the legal nature of the transaction between these parties litigant. Concededly, the conveyance of the property by the plaintiff to the defendant upon the conditions stated involved an express oral trust to convey, and as to this, in the absence of other conceivable equitable considerations which would operate to remove the transaction from the ban of the statute of frauds, it is obvious that the trust cannot be enforced. Section 852, Civ. Code. That section provides, inter alia, that no trust in relation to real property is valid unless the same is created or declared by a written instrument, subscribed by the trustee, or by his agent thereto authorized by writing, or by the instrument under which the trustee claims the estate affected. But, further than this, since the alleged trust was created prior to the amendment of section 857 of the Civil Code by the Legislature of 1913 (Stats. 1913, p. 438), it is void, because it was a trust for the conveyance of real property, which was not allowed under said section prior to the amendment referred to. Estate of Fair, 132 Cal. 523, 60 Pac. 442, 64 Pac. 1000, 84 Am. St. Rep. 70. Nor clearly is it strictly a resulting trust, which arises by operation of law and "where the legal estate is disposed of or acquired, not fraudulently or in the violation of any fiduciary duty, but the intent in theory of equity appears or is inferred or assumed from the terms of the disposition, or from the accompanying facts and circumstances, that the beneficial interest is not to go with the legal title." 1 Pom. Eq. Juris. p. 155. See, also, section 853, Civ. Code. But that the transaction resulting in the creation of the trust grew out of and was founded upon a fiduciary relation, and is therefore a constructive trust, arising by operation of law (Civ. Code, § 852, subd. 3), we think the findings, educed from presumptively sufficient evidence, clearly enough show.

It is contended by the appellant, however, that, assuming that the findings sufficiently show that a fiduciary or confidental relation existed between the plaintiff and the defendant, still it is not alleged in any of the pleadings of the plaintiff and the interveners that any such a relation existed. It may be conceded that there appears to be some force in this contention. The answer of the plaintiff to the defendant's cross-complaint does not state facts clearly disclosing that a fiduciary or confidential relation existed prior to and at the time of the conveyance of the property to the defendant between the latter and the plaintiff. The complaint declares, as we have seen, that—

> "The plaintiff reposed great faith and confidence in the defendant, his brother, and believing that he would faithfully execute the trust created in him, and relying on defendant's promise to reconvey said premises when requested so to do, plaintiff made conveyance to defendant upon the trust aforesaid."

[5] This might be said to be an attempt to aver a confidental relation between the plaintiff and the defendant, and doubtless such was the intention of the pleader in inserting that averment in the complaint. There was no demurrer to the answer of the plaintiff to the cross-complaint—indeed, there was none interposed to any of the pleadings filed in the case. We will not, however, nor is it necessary to do so, express an opinion herein upon the question whether the averments referred to, in the absence of a demurrer to that pleading of plaintiff, were sufficient to show a confidential relation between the plaintiff and the defendant; for, as we have before declared, we are of opinion that the findings do sufficiently show such a relation, and the presumption is, upon this appeal from the judgment upon the judgment roll alone, that there was evidence received without objection, in addition to the fact that they are brothers, which is itself some evidence of such a relation, showing that prior to and at the time of the conveyance of the property by the plaintiff to the defendant a confidential or fiduciary relation existed between them, and that thus the defect in the plaintiff's pleading in that particular was cured at the trial. Myers v. Canepa, 37 Cal. App. 556, 174 Pac. 903, 906.

[6] But it might be contended that, conceding that it is made to appear that such a relation existed between the plaintiff and the defendant, there is no showing of any such relation between the defendant and Hammonds and Wolfe. The answer to this contention, though, would be that the plaintiff, in investing the defendant with the trust, was, under express authority conferred by Hammonds and Wolfe, acting as the latter's agent, and that the very essence of the terms of the trust agreement was that the defendant would, upon demand made by the beneficiaries of the trust, reconvey the property, not alone to plaintiff, but also to Hammonds and Wolfe. In other words, the trust was vested in and accepted by the defendant upon the express promise upon his part that he would execute it according to its terms, namely, that he would convey an undivided one-third interest in the land each to Hammonds and Wolfe and plaintiff. Thus it is clear that the confidential relation between the plaintiff and defendant extended and inured to the benefit of Hammonds and Wolfe. Indeed, inasmuch as the evidence, as we must presume, disclosed that the trust as described in the pleadings of the plaintiff and the interveners was created, and that the conveyance to the defendant of the corpus of the trust was without consideration, we think the case here comes clearly within the doctrine invoked in the case of Kimball v. Tripp, 136 Cal. 631, 69 Pac. 428.

In that case one Elizabeth L. Cook, being seriously ill and in great fear and peril of death and believing that she was about to die, conveyed to Tripp, the appellant in said case, certain of her real property, with oral instructions that, in the event of her death, he dispose of said property in certain designated ways and to certain designated individuals. The death of the grantor occurred shortly after the execution of the conveyance, and thereafter action was brought by one of the heirs of the deceased to set aside said conveyance and assignments of certain personal property and to have it declared that the defendant held the lands which were the subject of the conveyance and the personal property assigned in trust for the plaintiff and her coheirs or for the estate of the deceased. The complaint in said action did not proceed upon the theory that fraud characterized the transaction, culminating in the execution of the conveyance and the assignments by the deceased. It was contended in that case, as here, that since the trust was created orally the same could not be enforced, under the terms of section 852 of the Civil Code, supra. But the Supreme Court held with the plaintiff; and, as what is said therein has cogent application to the facts of this case, we quote from the opinion therein in extenso as follows:

> "The position of the appellant on this point is that, as there was no fraud in the procurement of the conveyances, the plaintiff can have no relief. But, assuming the absence of fraud (though, in view of the defendant's relation to the grantor as her agent, this can hardly be assumed), it does not follow that equity cannot afford relief. The deeds, it is found, were made to the defendant simply as her agent, and were therefore taken by him in trust for her; and though the trust was not expressed in writing, equity will not permit the defendant to convert the property to his own use, contrary to the intention of the parties and to the confidence reposed in him. 'The doctrine is both novel and startling which restricts, in matters of fraud, its jurisdiction over the operation of written instruments to those cases where the fraud has been committed in their creation. If maintained, it will sweep away its heretofore admitted jurisdiction in an infinite variety of cases, of almost daily occurrence, where the fraud alleged consists in the use of instruments entered into upon a mutual confidence between the parties. Fraud in their use is as much a ground for the interposition of equity as fraud in their creation. [Italics ours.] There is no distinction in the principle upon which the jurisdiction is asserted in the two cases. In both there is the same abuse of confidence, and from both the same injury results.' Pierce v. Robinson, 13 Cal. 127. In the case cited the instrument involved was a deed absolute in its terms, shown by parol evidence to have been intended as a mortgage. But the principle applies equally to other cases; as, for example, to the cases involved in Hultz v. Wright, 16 Serg. & R. 345, and Oliver v. Oliver, 4 Rawle, 144 (cited in the principal case), and in Thompson v. White, 1 Dall. 424. In the last—which is a very instructive case—the subject is fully discussed. Another example is that of the purchase of an outstanding title by a tenant in common, considered in Mandeville v. Solomon, 33 Cal. 43, where it is said: 'Where the circumstances of a transaction are such that the person who takes the title to property cannot be permitted to enjoy it, in whole or in part, without necessarily violating some principle of equity, a constructive trust will be raised for the party entitled in equity to its beneficial enjoyment'—which is the same principle that, at law, governs the action for money had and received. This principle has not always been consistently applied by the courts; but in this state it has been held applicable to cases where there were fiduciary relations between the parties, as in this case (Alaniz v. Casenave, 91 Cal. 46; Brison v. Brison, 75 Cal. 525; Feeney v. Howard, 79 Cal. 525); and the defendant comes directly within this restricted application of the doctrine. There is also another principle upon which the rule may be sustained, which is, that in such cases generally, and in this case especially, there is an entire failure of consideration. [Italics ours.] Civ. Code, § 1689, subd. 2 et seq.; Knight v. Tripp, 121 Cal. 681."

In Oliver v. Oliver, 4 Rawle (Pa.) 144, 26 Am. Dec. 123, cited in the above case, it is said, referring generally to such transactions as are involved in this litigation:

> "When the fairness of the transaction is impeached, it is immaterial whether the party intended a fraud, at the time of the contract, or whether the fraud consists in the fraudulent use of the instrument."

Again, in the same case, referring to Thompson v. White, 1 Dall. (Pa.) 447, 1 L. Ed. 206, 1 Am. Dec. 252, the court said:

> "The fraud consisted in Lawrence Saltar obtaining a conveyance of his wife's estate under a solemn promise to make a settlement, which he afterwards neglected to do. It has never been doubted that he entered into the contract with good faith. In his last sickness, he expressed uneasiness at leaving no will, because, as had always been supposed, he thereby intended to comply with his promise. The fraud consisted in the fraudulent use which was attempted to be made of the deed, in the exclusion under the general rule of law, of Mary Thomson, the sister of Mr. Saltar, and to whom Lawrence Saltar promised to assure the property."

See, also, Lyon v. Huntingdon Bank, 14 Serg. & Rawle, 283.

As stated above, it is conceived that, upon the principles enunciated by the foregoing authorities, the proposition submitted here may justly be solved and determined. In truth, the decree in the case at bar is amply supported by findings disclosing a case which should receive the positive sanction of a court of equity. Indeed, if it were true that there was no principle in equity upon which the decree here could be sustained under the findings supporting it, a handle would thus be furnished for a most regretable commentary upon that branch of our jurisprudence which, out of consideration for the impotency of the stubborn or inelastic rules of law so to extend their remedial power, has justly given wider range than otherwise it would have to the application of the salutary maxim that "for every wrong there is a remedy."

[7] Another point made by the defendant is that the action by the interveners was barred by the statute of limitations. We think that the point is clearly untenable. The trust found by the court to have been created was a continuing one, and the statute in such a case would not begin to run until there was a repudiation of the trust. The action here was brought, and Hammonds and Wolfe intervened therein, within due legal time after the defendant had declared his repudiation of the trust.

SEID PAK SING et al. v. BARKER et al.
(S. F. 9935.)

1. Mortgages 🔑575—Bond necessary on supersedeas to stay sale in foreclosure.

Code Civ. Proc. § 945, providing that upon an appeal from a judgment directing a sale of real property a bond must be given to stay proceedings, applies to a judgment in foreclosure, and hence supersedeas to stay sale under execution will not be granted in the absence of a bond; the fact that the judgment itself gave a stay of 70 days not justifying a stay on appeal without a bond, regardless of whether the judgment be considered interlocutory or final.

2. Appeal and error 🔑479(1)—Stay held not required by inconsistency between appeal and right to enforce judgment.

An appeal by plaintiff from a portion of a judgment denying recovery for loss of profits on failure to deliver land under an agreement is not so inconsistent with the right to enforce the judgment as would justify a stay of execution, where on the appeal the amount of the judgment could not be reduced below the sum already allowed.

3. Mortgages 🔑411—Sale under execution in foreclosure may be had before entire amount due is ascertained on appeal.

A sale under execution in foreclosure before the entire amount due is ascertained on appeal is not in violation of Code Civ. Proc. § 726, prohibiting more than one action for the foreclosure of a mortgage.

Action by Seid Pak Sing and others against Harry B. Barker and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants apply for a writ of supersedeas to stay sale under execution in foreclosure. Writ denied.

Elston, Clark & Nichols, of Berkeley, and Miller, Thornton & Miller, and Platt Kent, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

A. H. Ashley, of Stockton, and Sterling Carr, of San Francisco, for respondents.

WILBUR, J. The defendants apply to this court for a writ of supersedeas on two grounds: First, that their appeal is taken from an interlocutory judgment upon which they are not required to give a stay bond; and, second, that the plaintiffs, having appealed from a portion of the judgment, cannot take advantage of the portion in their favor not appealed from, because plaintiffs have by their appeal selected a remedy which is inconsistent with the enforcement of the balance of the judgment, because the portions of the judgment appealed from are inextricably interwoven with the portion from which no appeal is taken.

The plaintiffs' mortgage upon 970.93 acres of land was subject to a prior trust deed thereof given to secure an indebtedness of $35,000 and certain advances. Plaintiffs brought this action to enjoin the sale of the land by the trustees for nonpayment of the indebtedness secured by the trust deed, and to have the amount of the indebtedness so secured fixed so that plaintiffs could redeem the property from said trust deed. The trustees claimed the amount of the indebtedness so secured to be $186,000.

[1] By cross-complaint the defendant Grossman, who owned the mortgaged property, sought similar relief against the plaintiffs' mortgage, as the amount admittedly due thereunder was less than $25,000, and plaintiffs were claiming that more than $400,000 was due thereunder, as alleged in plaintiffs' answer to this defendant's cross-complaint. The trial court fixed the amount due upon the trust deed entitled to priority over plaintiffs' claim at $37,091.70, plus $305 taxes, and the amount due upon plaintiffs' mortgage at $133,452.27, and provided that the plaintiffs could redeem from the trust deed by paying the clerk of the court the amount due within 60 days, and upon deposit of said trust deed and note thereby secured, properly indorsed and assigned to plaintiffs. The decree further declared that the amount due on the mortgage was $133,452.27, and provided for the payment thereof by the owner within 70 days, and that if the amount of plaintiffs' mortgage was not paid within 70 days the property should be sold in satisfaction of the indebtedness found to be due to the plaintiffs, and that a judgment be entered for the deficiency, if any. The time for redemption has expired, and it is not contended that the mortgage has been paid or the amount due tendered. The Code provides that, upon an appeal from a judgment directing a sale of real property, a bond must be given to stay the proceedings, the amount thereof which must be fixed by the court. Code Civ. Proc., § 945. No such bond was given. This is such a judgment. The sale could be stayed or prevented by payment of the amount due within 70 days, or by giving a stay bond on appeal. The fact that the judgment itself in effect gave a stay of 70 days does not justify a stay on appeal without a stay bond. It matters not whether the judgment be considered as interlocutory or final. The defendants are not entitled to a supersedeas on their own appeal.

Notwithstanding defendants' failure to give a bond, they seek to have a writ of supersedeas issued by this court because of the plaintiffs' appeal from portions of the decree denying its claim for judgment for $260,000 more than was given. In order to more clearly present the defendants' position, it will be necessary to state other facts. The defendant Grossman's predecessor rented 970.93 acres of land to plaintiffs at the rental of $25.50 per acre for the year 1918 and $26 per acre for the year 1919. The plaintiffs were to pay the rentals in advance and have paid $35,000 in rentals. The land at the time of the agreement was swamp and overflowed land, incapable of cultivation without reclamation. Grossman's predecessor agreed to have a portion of the land ready for cultivation on February 1, 1918, and the balance March 1, 1918. Only 152.20 acres were ready for cultivation by the plaintiffs in 1918, and 382.90 acres in 1919. The mortgage was given to them to secure the performance by the landlord of the terms of the lease. Plaintiffs claim the return of $22,140.55 on the rental of land not delivered to them, expressly agreed to be refunded by the terms of the lease, and the sum of $7,565.43 for levee work, $410.06 for a siphon, $6,855.03 for expense of pumping, and $96,418.20 for damages to the plaintiffs' growing crop in 1918, due to flooding. These items were allowed by the trial court, aggregating $133,457.27. The court denied the plaintiffs' prayer for loss of profits due to the failure to deliver the land as agreed, amounting to over $250,000, and it is from this portion of the judgment only that plaintiffs appeal.

[2] It is claimed that to enforce the judgment for the amount found due by the court would be inconsistent with the prosecution of the appeal, for the reason that the allowance of damages for lost profits on the undelivered acreage is inconsistent with the allowance of a rebate of rents as provided in the lease for the same land. However that may be, on plaintiffs' appeal the amount of judgment cannot be reduced below the sum already allowed to them, and the only question is whether or not the amount of the judgment can be increased. If, as the plaintiffs claim, there is an inconsistency between the recovery by the plaintiffs of the amount provided in the lease for a failure to deliver to them the land leased, and the right to also recover damages because of loss of profits for such nondelivery, such question goes to the merits of plaintiffs' appeal, and, however determined, could not result in the decrease of the amount of the judgment in favor of the plaintiffs. There is therefore no such inconsistency between the appeal and the rights of the plaintiffs to enforce the judgment as would either justify or require a stay of execution.

It is unnecessary, we think, to review the many cases cited by the petitioners, as both parties agree that no writ can be issued unless there is such inconsistency between the right of appeal and the right of execution to enforce the judgment as require the plaintiffs to elect between the two remedies, and no such inconsistency exists.

[3] The petitioners contend that a sale under execution in foreclosure before the entire amount due is ascertained on appeal would in some manner violate section 726, Code of Civil Procedure, which prohibits more than one action for the foreclosure of a mortgage. There is nothing in this point, as this action will be the same single action after the sale as before, the sale being only one step in the foreclosure proceeding; the ascertainment of the deficiency, if any, being another. It should be said in this connection that it is not contended that the property is worth the amount of the liens thereon, as declared by the court.

If authority is needed for such obvious conclusions stated by us, the cases cited below will be sufficient, and, for the reason stated, we deem it unnecessary to enter into a detailed discussion thereof. PITMAN v. WALKER. (S. F. 9277.)

1. Corporations ⚷428(2)—Notice of fraudulent acts of agents not imputed to officer of corporation in private dealings.

A corporation is bound by the unlawful or fraudulent acts of its agents within the scope of their employment, and notice of such wrongful acts is imputed to the corporation, but this rule does not extend to the imputing of such notice to the officer of the corporation without actual notice or connection with the transaction, and in matters affecting his private and independent dealings with the corporation.

2. Bills and notes ⚷333—Notice of fraudulent acts of agents not imputed to officer of corporation purchasing note from corporation.

Notice of fraudulent and wrongful acts of agents of a corporation while selling stock and taking a note therefor is not imputed to an officer of the corporation, and where such officer purchases the note from the corporation for value and without actual notice of the fraudulent act, the maker is not entitled to set up the fraud in an action on the note.

3. Mortgages ⚷235—Instrument held mortgage which passed to assignee without formal assignment.

An assignment of an interest in the estate of a deceased person as security for a note is a mortgage under Civ. Code, § 2924, and passes to an assignee of the note without formal assignment under section 2936.

4. Bills and notes ⚷167—Mortgage security operates to destroy negotiability.

Mortgage security executed at the time a note is made operates to destroy the negotiability of the note in the hands of a purchaser with notice thereof.

5. Bills and notes ⚷167—Not rendered nonnegotiable by subsequently executed mortgage as security so as to give notice of defects.

Where a note is negotiable as first executed and delivered, but subsequently mortgage security is demanded and given, such note is negotiable in the hands of a subsequent purchaser with knowledge of the security so far as defects in the note are concerned, though the mortgage is binding upon him as to restrictions placed by Code Civ. Proc. § 726, upon actions to collect a debt secured by mortgage, in view of St. 1917, p. 1539, § 3128.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; D. A. Cashin, Judge.

Action by Eli E. Pitman against Agnes J. Walker. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Short, Lindsay & Woolley and Short & Sutherland, all of Fresno (F. W. Docker, of Fresno, of counsel), for appellant.

M. K. Harris and Geo. Cosgrave, both of Fresno, for respondent.

SLOANE, J. The plaintiff has appealed from a judgment in favor of the defendant in an action to recover $5,000 on a promissory note.

The note was executed by the defendant to the Boden Automatic Hammer Company, a corporation, in consideration for the purchase price of certain shares of the capital stock of the corporation, and was assigned to the plaintiff before maturity and for a valuable consideration. While the note was negotiable in form, it was assigned to plaintiff with security from the maker given after the execution of the note, but prior to the assignment, and consisting of an equitable mortgage upon the maker's interest in the estate of her deceased husband. It was claimed that, by reason of such security, the negotiability of the instrument had been destroyed, and that the plaintiff took it subject to any defense existing against the original payee.

The defenses pleaded were that there had been a failure of consideration in that the stock of the corporation received therefor was without value, and that the defendant had been induced to purchase the same and execute said note therefor by false and fraudulent representations, and that said sale of stock was void under the "blue sky" law by reason of the fact that no certificate or permit of the commissioner of corporations had been exhibited to defendant before the purchase of said stock and execution of said note therefor, as required by law.

The primary question to be determined is whether or not these affirmative defenses are available to the defendant; and this depends upon whether or not the note was negotiable, and the plaintiff a purchaser in due course.

That the note was negotiable in form, and was assigned for value and before maturity, is beyond dispute. Respondent contends, however, that the assignment was taken by plaintiff with notice of defendant's equities, or at least under circumstances imputing notice sufficient to put the purchaser on inquiry. Plaintiff was at all times covered by the transaction a stockholder, director, and vice president of the corporation, named as payee in the note. He was aware that the note was given on the purchase of the corporate stock. He knew that defendant had a made previous purchase of 5,000 shares of the stock and had paid $3,000 of the purchase price. She had, subsequent to the purchase, spoken to him about her investment, and asked him if he thought the stock was good. He replied that he thought it was; that he had invested in it himself, which was the fact. He testifies that he had no knowledge prior to taking the assignment of her note that she was dissatisfied, knew nothing of any representations that had been made to induce her to buy stock, and was not aware of any irregularity or failure in exhibiting to her the corporation commissioner's permit, which permit had been duly issued. There is nothing in the evidence in rebuttal of this testimony. The only theory upon which can rest the implied finding from the verdict of the jury in defendant's favor that plaintiff was not a purchaser in good faith and without notice of any infirmities in the note is that a presumption or inference arises against him from his connection with and general familiarity with the corporate business. To whatever extent this might be the rule as to transactions in the ordinary course of the corporation's business, it would not apply to irregular conduct or fraudulent acts of other corporate agents not actually brought to his attention. The presumption, if any such may be indulged by the officers of the company, is that the sales agents acted fairly and in accordance with law.

[1, 2] The corporation on familiar principles of law is bound by the unlawful or fraudulent acts of its agents within the scope of their employment, and notice of such wrongful acts is imputed to the corporation, but this rule does not extend to the imputing of such notice to an officer of the corporation without actual notice or connection with the transaction, and in matters affecting his private and independent dealings with the corporation. Washburn v. Inter-Mountain Min. Co., 56 Or. 578, 109 Pac. 382, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 357; Peckham v. Hendren, 76 Ind. 47; Cook on Stock and Stockholders, 727; 14A Corp. Jur. 100; Doane v. King (C. C.) 30 Fed. 106; King v. Doane, 139 U. S. 166, 11 Sup. Ct. 465, 35 L. Ed. 84.

It has been held that a director or a managing officer of a banking corporation may not claim the immunities of a purchaser without notice of the commercial paper of his bank, where the infirmity of the paper appears on the records of the corporation or arises within the scope of the officer's employment. McCarty v. Kepreta, 24 N. D. 395, 139 N. W. 992. This decision however rests upon the peculiar provisions of the banking laws, and the fact that the infirmity in the note in question appeared from the records of the bank's business.

Such doctrine of notice cannot be fairly applied to a director of a business corporation with relation to undisclosed representations of an agent of the corporation in the sale of its stock.

It remains to be determined if the note in question is entitled to the privileges of a negotiable instrument.

That it was negotiable at the time of its execution and delivery is conceded. It is claimed, however, that its negotiability was destroyed by the subsequent acts of the parties thereto in demanding and receiving from the maker a mortgage securing its payment.

[3] The facts as disclosed by the evidence are that, in the negotiation between the plaintiff and the corporation for the assignment of the note, the former demanded as a condition of the purchase that the corporation obtain from the maker of the note an assignment of her interest in the estate of her deceased husband as security for the note. The estate consisted of real and personal property. This instrument was executed, and assigned in turn to plaintiff with the note as a part of the same transaction. It does not appear at what precise date the transfer of the note was made to plaintiff, but it does sufficiently appear from the evidence that the obtaining of this security by the corporation and its assignment to the plaintiff was a condition precedent to his purchase of the note, and, as it was executed to the corporation as security for this note, it is to be presumed that it was made while the corporation still owned the note. The instrument creating this security is a mortgage under section 2924 of the Civil Code; and it passed to the assignee of the note even without formal assignment under the provisions of section 2936 of the Civil Code.

The plaintiff, then, purchased this note, not only with notice, but upon the express consideration that it was secured by a mortgage executed by the maker to the original payee.

[4] That such mortgage security would operate to destroy the negotiability of the note in the hands of a purchaser with notice thereof if it had been executed at the time the note was made is the settled law under the decisions of this court. National Hardware Co. v. Sherwood, 165 Cal. 1, 130 Pac. 881; Helmer v. Parsons, 18 Cal. App. 450, 123 Pac. 356; Metropolis, etc., Bank v. Monnier, 169 Cal. 592, 147 Pac. 265; Anderson v. Wickliffe, 178 Cal. 120, 172 Pac. 381; Crocker Nat. Bank v. Byrne & McDonnell, 178 Cal. 329, 173 Pac. 752.

[5] It will be noticed, however, that in every case in which this court has declared the nonnegotiability of a note secured by a mortgage, it has been with the qualification that the mortgage is executed contemporaneously with the note as part of the same transaction. In fact, we know of no instance in the decisions where a note duly executed as a negotiable instrument has been held to have lost that quality by a subsequent contract introducing some qualification or limitation which, if originally made part of the note contract, would have destroyed its negotiable character.

The rule as stated by Daniel on Negotiable Instruments is that, although an agreement be written upon the same paper that the note is written on, and yet if it be evident that it was not intended to incorporate the terms of the agreement within the instrument itself, the transferability and negotiability of the instrument will not be affected by it. Daniel, Neg. Inst. § 155; Odiorne v. Sargent, 6 N. H. 401; Ewing v. Clark, 76 Mo. 545; Am. Gas Co. v. Wood, 90 Me. 516, 38 Atl. 548, 43 L. R. A. 449; Bay v. Shrader, 50 Miss. 326; Parsons Bills & Notes, vol. 2, § 544; Randolph Com. Paper, §§ 190, 191.

The Negotiable Instruments Act, as adopted in this state in 1917, prior to the execution of this note, provides that:

> "An instrument negotiable in its origin continues to be negotiable until it has been restrictively indorsed, or discharged by payment or otherwise." Stats. 1917, p. 1539, § 3128.

This is, however, but the expression of the common-law rule. The doctrine is stated in Wettlaufer v. Baxter, 137 Ky. 362, 125 S. W. 741, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 804, as follows:

> "When a paper is started on its journey into the commercial world, it should retain to the end the character given to it in the beginning and written into its face. If it was intended to be a negotiable instrument, and was so written, it should * * * so remain. Then every one who * * * discounts or purchases it will need only to read it to know what it is and what his rights and liabilities are."

The laws distinguishing negotiable from nonnegotiable instruments are not based upon any inherent distinctions between the obligations assumed in the one class or the other of such contracts, but upon arbitrary rules established by the law merchant to create a form of commercial paper that, may pass from hand to hand unchalleneged by undisclosed defenses. The qualities of negotiability are therefore fixed and arbitrary, and cannot be enlarged or extended upon mere considerations of logic or even equity. The negotiable instrument is expected to go through its commercial life with the qualities it is born with and none other.

This does not mean that an instrument negotiable in its origin cannot be limited and modified by subsequent contract between the parties, so as to affect the rights of subsequent holders, but only, however, to the extent that they take the paper with notice of the specific limitation.

For instance, a contemporaneous memorandum on a promissory note authorizing its payment in merchandise, or from some particular fund, would render the instrument nonnegotiable, but such an agreement subsequently attached, while enforceable between the parties and against an indorsee with notice of the limitation, would not open the instrument to other defenses of which the purchaser had no notice.

So in the instant case the acceptance of this note by plaintiff, with knowledge that it is secured by mortgage made subsequent to the execution of the note, doubtless binds the plaintiff by all the restrictions which section 726 of the Code of Civil Procedure places upon actions to collect a debt secured by mortgage, and might have barred the action in its present form had it been pleaded, but does not render the note nonnegotiable to the extent that the maker may set up defenses of fraud in its procurement, or failure of consideration, of which the assignee has had no notice.

It follows from these conclusions that the note sued on was entitled to all the immunities of a negotiable instrument in the hands of an innocent holder for value, and it is unnecessary to determine whether as between the original parties the transaction was tainted with fraud either by reason of misrepresentations or failure to comply with the Corporate Securities Act.

McCASLIN v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO.
(L. A. 6918.)

1. Carriers ⟹184—Complaint for conversion held to require proof of relation of carrier of plaintiff's goods at time thereof, or contractual liability for loss by other carrier.

Under a complaint for a conversion by a carrier while goods were in defendant's possession as a carrier between the point of shipment and the point of destination, alleging that defendant was a common carrier, and that it unlawfully and wrongfully sold goods shipped by plaintiff, without his knowledge or consent, plaintiff cannot recover except on proof that defendant sustained the relation of a carrier of plaintiff's goods at the time of their conversion, or had so contracted with plaintiff as to be liable for loss by any other carrier or bailee.

2. Carriers ⟹177(3) — Carrier accepting goods for transportation over its own and connecting lines not liable by common law beyond its own lines.

A carrier accepting goods for transportation over its lines, and thence over connecting lines to destination, incurs no liability by common law beyond its own lines.

3. Carriers ⟹177(3) — Carmack Amendment did not apply to shipment to a foreign country, and neither does Cummins Act if shipment made before its enactment.

The Carmack Amendment,[1] making initial carriers liable for loss caused by them or any connecting carrier, did not apply to a shipment to a foreign country, and the Cummins Act,[2] extending the liability, does not apply to such a shipment before its enactment.

4. Carriers ⟹180(2)—Initial carrier limiting liability to its own line held not liable for conversion by connecting carrier.

Where the bill of lading issued by an initial carrier expressly limits liability to its own line, no recovery can be had against it for conversion by a connecting carrier.

5. Carriers ⟹184—Shipper held not entitled to recover for negligence in action based on wrongful conversion.

In an action against an initial carrier for conversion by a connecting carrier in selling the shipment for transportation charges on refusal thereof by consignee, the shipper cannot recover for negligence in failing to notify the connecting carrier that it held, as alleged in the complaint, an indemnity bond for payment of the freight, and that plaintiff was arranging to sell the goods to others; the allegation as to the bond being necessary to show that the sale by the carrier was wrongful.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frederick W. Houser, Judge.

Action by W. E. McCaslin against the Southern Pacific Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Henry T. Gage and W. I. Gilbert, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Nathan Newby, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

RICHARDS, Justice pro tem. The appeal is from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff in an action brought by him to recover damages for the loss of a carload of vegetables, delivered to the defendant for shipment to Regina Fruit Company, in the city of Regina, Canada.

The complaint is in form an action for conversion. The plaintiff, after alleging the corporate character of the defendant, and that it was a common carrier of freight and passengers, and, after alleging his ownership of the goods in question, proceeded to allege that on or about December 2, 1913, he delivered said carload of vegetables, the same being of the then value of $568.70, to the defendant to be by it shipped, transported, and delivered to said Regina Fruit Company at said place; that, prior to the time of making said shipment, the plaintiff, being a dealer and shipper of fruit and vegetables, had executed and delivered to the defendant his general indemnity bond, whereby, as a consignor of goods over the lines of said company and other connecting lines in conjunction with the said Southern Pacific Company, he bound himself to the payment of all freight charges which should become due to the said Southern Pacific Company, or any connecting lines over which any shipment made by him should be made and forwarded. It was also alleged in the complaint that it was agreed between the plaintiff and defendant that the freight on such shipment was to be collected from the said consignee, Regina Fruit Company, and that, if the Regina Fruit Company failed or refused to pay such freight, then the same was to be paid by the plaintiff, as provided in the indemnifying bond aforesaid; that said carload of vegetables reached its destination on or about December 15, 1913; that the consignee of said shipment refused to accept the said goods, and the plaintiff was thereupon notified of such refusal, and he immediately began negotiations for the disposal of said goods; that, while he was so engaged in negotiating for the disposal of the goods, the defendant unlawfully and wrongfully sold and disposed of the said vegetables without prior, or any, notice to the plaintiff, and without his knowledge, and contrary to the will and against the instructions of plaintiff; that plaintiff has demanded said goods, but the defendant has wholly failed and refused to deliver the same or any part thereof to plaintiff, to his damage in the sum of $568.70, for which sum the plaintiff has filed his claim with the defendant, but which claim has by it been wholly rejected, and said sum, together with interest thereon, remains and is wholly due and unpaid.

The defendant's answer to this complaint consisted of specific denials, based in the main upon want of information and belief, of its various averments. Subsequently the defendant amended its answer by setting forth a further and separate defense, alleging:

> "That at all the times mentioned in plaintiff's complaint, and particularly at all of the times during which said shipment of vegetables therein referred to was being transported, and until delivery or disposal thereof at destination, the Carmack Amendment to the Interstate Commerce Act was in force and effect, and that this defendant's liability as a common carrier terminated upon the delivery of said shipment by it to its connecting carrier in Canada, and that the alleged conversion of said shipment, and the damage, if any, sustained by plaintiff, occurred at Regina, Canada, and for which this defendant is in no way liable."

The plaintiff also amended his complaint, increasing somewhat the demand for damages, but not otherwise changing its form. The cause went to trial upon the issues as thus made, whereupon evidence was admitted showing without serious conflict that the carload of vegetables had been delivered by the plaintiff to the defendant at the city of Los Angeles, consigned at first to one Liddicott at Rosevale, Cal., but subsequently diverted, by the plaintiff's order, to the city of Regina, in the province of Saskatchewan, Dominion of Canada, under a bill of lading for their delivery to the Regina Fruit Company at said place, the freight charges to be collected from the said last-named consignee, provided that, if the said Regina Fruit Company failed or refused to pay such freight and transportation charges, the same would be paid by the plaintiff as provided in the indemnifying bond as referred to in plaintiff's complaint; that the railroad lines of the defendant did not extend into Canada, and in consequence said shipment of vegetables was transported beyond the lines of the defendant to its destination by other connecting carriers, the last of which reaching Regina was the Canadian Pacific Railway; that the Regina Fruit Company, upon notice to it from said last-named railway of the arrival of said carload of vegetables, refused to accept same, of which refusal the defendant was immediately notified; that the defendant did not notify the plaintiff of such refusal, but the plaintiff was informed by some outside party that his said consignee had refused to accept said vegetables, and he immediately proceeded to make arrangements by wire for the disposal of the same through a firm of brokers at Regina; that the defendant did not notify the Canadian Pacific Railroad that the plaintiff was making such arrangements, nor did it notify the latter railway that it was the holder of a good and sufficient indemnity bond for the payment by plaintiff of the freight and transportation charges on said car of vegetables; that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, having no notice of these facts, caused the said carload of vegetables to be sold for the freight and transportation charges, amounting to the sum of $357.50; that the reasonable value of the vegetables in the city of Los Angeles at the time of their said shipment was $568.70, and the reasonable value thereof in the city of Regina at the time of their arrival there, and thereafter during the month of December, was $1,039; that the bill of lading issued by the defendant to the plaintiff at the time of the shipment of said vegetables was in the usual form of bills of lading issued by said defendant under the interstate commerce regulations in force at said time, and that it had indorsed upon it the following provision:

> "Section 2. In issuing this bill of lading, the company agrees to transport only over its own lines, and except as otherwise provided by law, acts only as agent with respect to the portion of the route beyond its own lines. No carrier shall be liable for loss, damage or injury not occurring on its own road or its portion of the through route, nor after said property has been delivered to the next carrier, except as such liability is or may be imposed by law, but nothing contained in this bill of lading shall be deemed to exempt the initial carrier from any such liability so imposed."

The trial court upon the foregoing facts made its finding to the effect that the defendant was guilty of negligence in failing to notify the Canadian Pacific Railway that it held a good and sufficient indemnity bond from the plaintiff for the payment of the freight and other transportation charges on said carload of vegetables, and also in failing to notify the Canadian Pacific Railway that plaintiff was making arrangements for the sale of said carload of vegetables to other persons, and further found that the defendant had violated its duty as a common carrier and agent of said plaintiff in failing to notify the plaintiff that the carload of vegetables had been rejected by the Regina Fruit Company, and in failing to notify the said Canadian Pacific Railway Company to hold the said carload of vegetables subject to the order of the consignor. The court further found that, by reason of the violation of its obligation to the plaintiff as a common carrier, the said plaintiff had been damaged by the loss of said carload of vegetables in the sum of $568.70, with interest thereon from December 30, 1913, at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, no part of which has been paid. Judgment was accordingly rendered and entered for said sum with interest from said day, and from such judgment the defendant prosecutes this appeal.

[1] In discussing the questions presented on this appeal, it is to be noted at the outset that the cause of action, as set forth in the plaintiff's complaint, is one sounding in conversion of the plaintiff's goods, while they were in the possession and under the control of the defendant as a common carrier between the point of shipment and the point of destination of these goods. It is expressly alleged:

> "That said defendant, together with its connecting lines, was a common carrier of freight and passengers between the said two cities."

It is further alleged:

> "That the defendant unlawfully and wrongfully sold and disposed of said goods without prior or any notice to or knowledge of plaintiff, and contrary to the will and against the instructions of plaintiff."

The only breach of duty alleged to have been committed by the defendant is that just above quoted. Upon such a complaint it would seem to be clear that a recovery by the plaintiff could only be had upon proof either that the defendant, as a matter of law, sustained the relation of a carrier of the plaintiff's goods at the time of their alleged unlawful conversion, or that, if it did not stand in this relation at said time, it had so contracted with the plaintiff in relation to the carriage of said goods to their destination as to be liable for whatever wrong or loss was inflicted upon plaintiff by any other carrier or bailee of said goods.

[2] That the defendant by the acceptance of said goods from said plaintiff for transportation over its railroad lines to their destination, and thence over the connecting lines of other carriers to the destination of said goods, did not have imposed upon it by common law any liability as a carrier of said goods beyond the terminal of its own lines, would seem to be well settled. The rule is thus stated in 4 Elliott on Railroads, § 1432:

> "As a general rule no carrier is bound by law to accept and carry goods beyond the terminus of its own lines. In the absence of any agreement, either express or implied, for transportation beyond its own lines, the common-law liability of an independent carrier is performed by safely transporting the goods over its own lines and delivering them to the consignee or connecting carrier, as the case may be. If in such case goods are merely to be delivered by the initial carrier for further transportation, the former is considered as a forwarding agent, rather than a carrier, as to such further transportation, and is not liable for the default of subsequent carriers."

See 4 R. C. L. p. 896, and cases cited.

[3] Neither was the defendant under any liability as a carrier for the plaintiff beyond its own lines by any federal statute defining the rights and liabilities of carriers of interstate commerce beyond the boundaries of the United States. The so-called "Carmack Amendment" to the Hepburn Act (34 U. S. Stat. L., pt. I, p. 595 [U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8604a, 8604aa]) was in existence at the time of the shipment of the goods in question from a point in the United States to a foreign country, and it has been held that this act was by its terms confined in its application to strictly interstate commerce, and was not applicable to a case where the shipment was to a destination outside of the United States. Best v. Great Northern Ry., 159 Wis. 429, 150 N. W. 484; Chicago, etc., Co. v. Jewett, 169 Wis. 102, 171 N. W. 757; Hamlen v. Ill. Cent. Ry. (D. C.) 212 Fed. 324; Burke v. Gulf, etc., Ry. (Mun. Ct. N. Y.) 147 N. Y. S. 796. The Carmack Amendment was subsequently replaced by what is known as the Cummins Act, adopted in March, 1915 (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8592, 8604a), which did have the effect of extending the liability of the initial carrier so as to cover losses upon connecting lines; but the shipment in question, having been made in 1913, does not come within the terms of this act.

[4] If, therefore, the defendant was liable to plaintiffs as the carrier of his goods, or is responsible for their safe-keeping beyond its own lines, that liability must be found in some contract between the defendant and the plaintiff creating it. The first place to look naturally for such an agreement is to the contract of shipment as contained in the bill of lading issued by the defendant upon receipt of the plaintiff's goods. This bill of lading was introduced in evidence and is in the standard form of such contracts, approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission. The provision in said bill of lading defining and limiting the defendant's liability as a carrier is to be found in section 2 thereof, above quoted; and, in view of the express limitation of the defendant's liability as a carrier of the plaintiff's goods over its own lines, and of the further fact that whatever loss the plaintiff sustained was occasioned by the alleged conversion of said goods by another carrier beyond the defendant's own lines, it would seem to follow that, in so far as the plaintiff has counted upon the conversion of its goods by this defendant in the capacity of a carrier of said goods, he would not be entitled to recover damages for said conversion in this form of action, and, in so far as the findings and judgment of the trial court in the plaintiff's favor were predicated upon the existence of any such liability, the trial court was clearly in error.

[5] The plaintiff, however, seeks to sustain this judgment upon the ground that the trial court has found that the defendant was guilty of negligence in the specified respects above referred to in our résumé of the findings of fact. It would seem to be a sufficient answer to this contention to point to the fact that this is not an action for damages based upon negligence. It is simply an action for damages for conversion. The defendant is sued as a carrrier wrongfully converting the plaintiff's goods to its own use. The allegation in the plaintiff's complaint that the defendant at the time of such conversion held the plaintiff's indemnity bond guaranteeing the payment of the freight charges upon said goods in the event of the consignee's refusal to receive or pay for the same was a necessary averment in order to the showing that the defendant's alleged sale of said goods to pay the transportation charges thereon was a wrongful act. There is no other alleged breach of duty on the part of said defendant pleaded, or attempted to be pleaded, in plaintiff's complaint. The defendant's answer consisted simply in denials of the plaintiff's averments, with the added defense, by way of amendment thereto, setting forth that its liability as a carrier terminated, under the Carmack Amendment, with the delivery of said goods to connecting carriers beyond its own lines. Upon the issues as thus made up, the trial court proceeded to make findings as to the defendant's liability for the conversion of said goods as the carrier thereof, and also as to the defendant's liability for negligence in the respects above set forth. In so far as such findings refer to the defendant's liability as a carrier for the conversion of said goods, they are entirely unjustified by the evidence in the case, and in so far as said findings undertake to hold said defendant guilty of negligence, they are entirely beyond the issues in the case, and hence, upon either ground, could not have been made the basis of a judgment in plaintiff's favor.

At the close of the plaintiff's case the defendant made a motion for a nonsuit, specifying as one of the grounds thereof that, the suit being one for conversion, no cause of action against the defendant had been shown. This motion should have been granted. The motion of the defendant for a new trial was specifically made upon the ground that the evidence was insufficient to show any liability for loss occurring beyond its own lines. This motion should also have been granted. Both of these motions were denied by the trial court, and for these errors the judgment is reversed.

1. Gifts 🔑47(1)—Donor has burden of avoiding transfer of stock regular on its face.

In mother's action to recover shares of stock from son who claimed a gift from her, the production by him of a transfer regular on its face cast upon her the burden to show that the transfer was inoperative, or that the gift, if actually made, was avoidable on ground of fraud or undue influence.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1011(1)—Finding on conflicting evidence not disturbed.

Finding of trial court on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed, regardless of the appellate court's views as to the comparative strength of the testimony.

3. Gifts 🔑38—Mother who transferred stock to son without knowledge of character of transaction entitled to restoration of stock.

If a mother, as president of a corporation, frequently signed papers at request of her son, an officer and director and active in the management, and without knowledge as to contents signed a transfer of her stock to the son at his request, without consideration, she was entitled to restoration.

4. Evidence 🔑590—Weight to be accorded attorney's testimony for client dependent on inherent quality of testimony, attorney's interest in case, and his appearance on the stand.

The testimony of an attorney given in favor of his client, like the testimony of other witnesses, will be received and considered with a view to the inherent quality of the testimony, his interest in the case, and his appearance on the stand.

5. Witnesses 🔑67—Practice of attorney appearing as witness for client not to be encouraged.

The practice of attorneys appearing as witnesses for their clients is not to be encouraged, but conditions may exist where an attorney cannot justly or fairly withhold from his client either his legal services or his testimony as a witness.

6. Gifts 🔑49(1)—Evidence held to prove that mother did not make gift of shares of stock to son.

A mother's denial of having to her knowledge transferred her stock in a corporation to her son, and her testimony that, as president of the corporation, she frequently signed papers at son's request without reading them and without knowledge as to the contents thereof, held to sustain finding of trial court that she did not make gift of the stock.

7. Gifts 🔑48—Dividend checks not admissible to show familiarity with stock certificates.

In mother's action against son to recover corporate stock transferred to son, on theory that she, as president of corporation, frequently signed papers at his request without reading them and without knowledge of the contents, that she was not familiar with stock certificates and that the transfer was effected by procuring her signature to transfer by representing it to be a paper to be signed by her as president, dividend checks received by her did not tend to show her familiarity with stock certificates; hence were properly excluded.

8. Appeal and error 🔑1056(2)—Exclusion of immaterial evidence held harmless.

In an action involving the issue as to whether a mother made a gift of her corporate stock to son, in which there was testimony that the son in a letter to his brother stated that his will was in the brother's favor, exclusion of testimony as to contents of the will offered to rebut implication raised by declaration in the letter that the son had not provided for his mother in his will held harmless, since whether son had made provision for mother in his will was immaterial on issue of whether mother had given son her stock.

9. Appeal and error 🔑1057(1)—Exclusion of evidence held harmless in view of other undisputed evidence.

Where corporation was organized to administer decedent's estate, and stock therein issued to the surviving wife and children, the exclusion of unissued and canceled certificates showing that the original plan was to issue all the stock to the children, in mother's action to recover stock from son who claimed mother had made a gift thereof to him, offered by son to show mother's obligation to him on theory that he frustrated such a plan, held harmless in view of undisputed evidence that such a division of the stock was not attempted, and the mother's testimony that the plan was abandoned on her own objections.

10. Witnesses 🔑286(4)—Cross-examination of defendant as to whether he had claimed stock to persons connected with corporation did not warrant redirect examination as to statement to other persons.

In action involving ownership of corporate stock, cross-examination of defendant as to whether he had said anything to certain persons connected with the corporation relative to his ownership of the stock after mother's transfer thereof did not warrant redirect examination as to whether he had not informed other named persons not connected with the corporation that he was the owner of the stock.

11. Evidence 🔑273(5)—Declarations as to ownership of stock, in absence of adverse claimant, inadmissible as self-serving.

In action involving ownership of stock, defendant's testimony that he had claimed ownership of the stock to persons not connected with the corporation, in absence of plaintiff, held inadmissible as self-serving.

12. Evidence 🔑271(2) — When self-serving declarations are admissible.

Declarations made by a party in his own interest are commonly inadmissible, but may be admitted where a failure to assert a claim or right may be construed against the party as an implied negation, or where the assertion of such claim at a later date is attributed to conditions and exigencies which have arisen since the transaction in question, which motive would be disproved by showing earlier declarations to the same effect.

13. Appeal and error 🔑1056(2)—Exclusion of evidence cumulative of undisputed evidence as to collateral matter harmless.

The exclusion of evidence which was merely cumulative of other undisputed evidence, and which related merely to a transaction which was remote and entirely collateral in relation to the main issue, held harmless.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Lavinia J. Hotaling against Richard M. Hotaling, and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. H. Metson, E. J. McCutchen, and Peter F. Dunne, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

Gavin McNab, Nat Schmulowitz, and R. P. Henshall, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

SLOANE, J. This action was brought by the plaintiff, Lavinia J. Hotaling, to declare a trust in her favor and have restored to her 2,499 shares of the capital stock of the Hotaling Estate Company, a corporation, which stock at the time suit was begun stood on the books of the corporation in the name of the defendant Richard M. Hotaling.

The fact is undisputed that these shares of stock, with one additional share, had originally been issued to and belonged to the plaintiff as her interest in a family estate represented by the above-named corporation. The remaining stock was held in blocks of 2,500 shares each by her son, Richard M. Hotaling, the defendant, another son, Fred Hotaling, and a daughter-in-law, Ella Hotaling, the widow of a deceased son of plaintiff. The plaintiff was the president of this corporation, and she and her sons and daughter-in-law constituted its board of directors. The certificate representing these shares in plaintiff's name had been subsequently indorsed by the plaintiff and canceled, and a new certificate signed by the plaintiff as president of the corporation was issued in the name of Richard M. Hotaling.

On the face of the corporation records the shares in controversy had been transferred from the plaintiff, Lavinia J. Hotaling, to the defendant, Richard M. Hotaling. The plaintiff and Richard M. Hotaling, as already stated, are mother and son. The whole controversy in the case centers about the claim of the latter that his mother made him a gift of this stock on the 2d of September, 1913, the date of the transfer on the stock books, and some five and a half years before this action was begun. Richard testifies circumstantially to this transaction, and represents that it was unsolicited on his part, and was made on his mother's own initiative, and that she came to the office of the corporation, of which she was president, and of which he was an officer and director, and that the transfer was then and there made by delivering to him the indorsed certificate and issuing the new certificate over his mother's signature as president.

Mrs. Hotaling admits the genuineness of her signature upon written evidences of the transfer, but denies the gift, and disclaims any remembrance of the transaction which resulted in the transfer. There is no other direct evidence as to the transaction than that of the documents and the corporate records above referred to, and the testimony of these two principals.

All the other voluminous record in the case, comprising in all over 1,000 typewritten pages, is directed to evidence on collateral matters and events tending more or less strongly to corroborate one or the other of the parties as to the main issue.

The trial court found for the plaintiff on all the material issues presented, and it is from the judgment on these findings that the defendants have taken this appeal. The grounds of error relied on are insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings and the exclusion on the trial of certain evidence offered in behalf of defendants.

The one controlling fact in this case is in the finding of the court that the plaintiff, Lavinia J. Hotaling, did not make a gift of these shares to the defendant, Richard M. Hotaling.

As stated by the trial judge in reviewing the evidence:

> "The issue is the pivotal point and vital issue in this case. The plaintiff swears that she never made it; the defendant swears that she did; and, as no other person was present at either of the alleged conversations relating thereto, or upon the occasion when it is claimed the gift was made, the issue of veracity lies directly between mother and son, and this issue must be resolved by a consideration of the actual conduct, writings, declarations, motives and relations of the parties, the amount and value of the gift, the financial condition of the donor after such gift, and her ability to make it."

In passing upon this point the function of this court is much less complicated than was that of the trial court. The trial judge was called upon to delicately adjust the balance so as to determine upon which side, in this great mass of conflicting evidence and inference, the preponderance might lie, while upon this appeal our only duty is to ascertain if there was any substantial showing in behalf of the court's finding to give rational support to the conclusion reached.

It may be conceded that the defendants' evidence made a prima facie case in his behalf. The fact was shown that there had been a legal transfer of this stock from Lavinia J. Hotaling to Richard M. Hotaling on the corporate records. It is conceded that the mere fact of the existence of the relationship of parent and child between them does not create that confidential relation which raises a presumption of fraud in a voluntary transfer of property from the parent to the child.

[1] The plaintiff was therefore confronted with a transfer of this stock, regular on its face, which cast the burden upon her to show, in order to avoid the transaction, either that the transfer never operated to invest the ownership of the shares in the defendant, or that, if the gift was actually made, it was voidable on the ground of fraud or undue influence.

[2] The plaintiff here testified that she never gave this stock to her son, or knowingly transferred her title thereto. If there is any weight to be given to this testimony it will not be disputed under the established rules of law in this state that a finding of the court in accordance with such testimony cannot be disturbed, whatever views of the appellate court as to the comparative strength of the testimony to the contrary.

It is appellants' contention, however, that the plaintiff's testimony in this connection was so meager, vague and equivocal and so inherently improbable, as not to be entitled to consideration, and indeed did not constitute a denial of the transaction as claimed by defendants. The following is the testimony by question and answer as given by Mrs. Hotaling on this point:

"Q. (Mr. McNab): Mrs. Hotaling, I show you a certificate dated December 2, 1913, purporting to be a certificate for 2,499 shares, certificate No. 15 in the Hotaling Estate Company, and your signature, in favor of R. M. Hotaling; is this your signature (exhibiting signature to the witness)? A. Yes; that is my signature, all right.

"Q. Do you have any memory; have you any recollection? A. Of signing that?

"Q. Have you any recollection of ever signing this certificate? A. None whatever.

"Q. Did you ever, at any time, give 2,499 shares of your stock in the Hotaling Estate Company, or any other number of shares, to Richard M. Hotaling, your son, or to anybody else? A. Not that I know of—of the Hotaling Estate?

"Q. Of the Hotaling Estate Company? A. No.

"Q. Did you ever give any shares to Richard M. Hotaling, your son, or to anybody else, at any time? A. No."

Certificate No. 15, in words and figures as follows, was introduced in evidence:

"San Francisco, Cal., Dec. 2, 1913. No. 15. This certifies that R. M. Hotaling is entitled to 2,499 shares of the capital stock of the Hotaling Estate Company, incorporated Nov. 30, 1904, transferable on the books of the company by indorsement hereon and surrender of this certificate. [Signed] C. W. Conlisk, Secretary, Lavinia J. Hotaling, President."

Corporate seal attached, and indorsed: "R. M. Hotaling."

"The Court: I suppose it is admitted that that is the signature of the defendant, is it?

"Mr. Dunne: On the back; yes, sir.

"Mr. McNab: Will you let me have the certificate book showing the previous certificate to this?

"Q. Mrs. Hotaling, I show you this signature on the certificate of stock purporting to be Hotaling Estate Company for 2,499 shares, in which the figures are written on the upper line and the name 'R. M. Hotaling' on the lower line.

"Mr. Dunne: For the purpose of identification, bearing date?

"Mr. McNab: Bearing date December 2, 1913.

"Q. Is that your signature (exhibiting certificate of stock to the witness)? A. Yes.

"Q. Do you have any recollection—No. 14. I am going to have it read in after—do you have any recollection whatever of ever having signed this certificate? A. I have not.

"Q. Mrs. Hotaling, did you ever give this certificate, or any other certificate of any shares of stock in the Hotaling Estate Company to your son, Richard M. Hotaling, at any time? A. No."

The witness then had her attention called to the indorsement of her name on the back of the paper, and was asked if she signed it. After considerable quibbling over certain dissimilarities from her ordinary signature, she conceded that it was her signature.

"Q. Well, whether it is your signature or is not your signature, have you any memory of ever having placed your signature on the back of this certificate of stock? A. No. I don't in no way; it would be a funny thing for me to give away my stock.

"Q. There is a stub, showing a stub connected with the Certificate No. 1, December 6, 1904, in the Hotaling Estate Company. Is that your signature to the stub (exhibiting to the witness)? A. Let me look at that 'Lavinia' —I am a little suspicious of that—well, it looks like my signature; 'Lavinia' is written pretty well—better than I generally write it—but, however, let it go; say I signed it.

"Q. Have you any remembrance whatever of having signed this stub that I showed you the signature? A. Have I what?

"Q. Have you any remembrance of signing it? A. No.

"Mr. McNab: Q. I am showing you a certificate dated December 6, 1904, certificate No. 6, purporting to be for 2,498 shares, is the name of Lavina J. Hotaling, showing you the indorsement on the back of that, 'Lavinia J. Hotaling.' Is that yours (exhibiting to the witness)? A. I am suspicious of the 'Lavinia,' but, as I say, all right; say I signed it; the 'Hotaling' looks like my writing, and the 'J', that is too good; I do not write as even as that 'Lavinia'; that is written exactly the same; let it go; say 'Yes.'

"Q. Have you any remembrance of either having signed the stub of this certificate or the back of this certificate? A. Not the slightest remembrance; so it might just as well go I signed it, because they are all signed the same.

"Mr. McNab: Q. Mrs. Hotaling, did you ever give these certificates that I have last shown you, or any other certificates of your shares of stock, to the Hotaling Estate Company at any time to your son Richard M. Hotaling? A. Not to my knowledge.

"Q. Well, did you ever give them at any time? A. No."

The witness further testified that she first learned that Richard Hotaling made any claim to her stock some years later, shortly before the beginning of this action.

The testimony as quoted contains a bare denial by plaintiff that she made any gift or conveyance to her son Richard, qualified, however, by the admission that the signatures shown her are her signatures, and the repeated statement that she has no recollection of the event, of being shown the documents, of signing her name, or of any conversation between herself and Richard leading up to the transaction. Assuming that these statements of the witness are credible, and were believed by the court—and they evidently were so accepted—they are not lacking in probative force, as appellants assume.

Of course, if this transaction took place, as Richard M. Hotaling testified; if it was preceded by a conversation in which Mrs. Hotaling told Richard that, on account of the reckless character and disposition of her younger son, she had made up her mind to turn over all her stock to him (Richard); if she on the day in question went to the office of the corporation, and called upon Richard to produce her certificates that she might make the transfer they had previously talked about—it would be indeed incredible that she could not remember about it. On the other hand, if all that occurred was that, on an occasion of her visit to the office, Richard, as the active and responsible manager of the affairs of the company, brought to his mother certain papers and documents, and asked her to sign them as the corporation's president, and she signed them, as she testified that she was accustomed to sign such corporate papers, at his request and without reading them or having their contents explained, then it would be the most natural thing in the world that she would several years later retain no knowledge or memory of the event or anything connected with it.

Indeed, if it is true—and the trial court evidently accepted her statement to that effect as true in passing upon the sufficiency of this evidence to support the findings—that Mrs. Hotaling actually had no memory at the time of the trial as to the circumstances and conditions upon which she attached her name to these papers, it would afford very persuasive evidence that she was not at the time consummating a gift of $1,000,000 worth of stock to her son. If she was conscious of the fact that she was transferring this stock to Richard Hotaling with the purpose of making a gift of it to him, of course she, being a woman of sound mind, would have remembered it. If she did not remember it, it doubtless was because no such gift was made. She said she did not give the stock to her son. She said she had no recollection of the circumstances of signing the certificate. The trial court believed her. It is true that there is room for controversy as to the application of some of her averments of want of recollection. They might be open to the construction that she meant to say that she did not remember whether she made a present to Richard of her stock on that day, but, in the light of all the evidence, it is fairly apparent that what she was testifying to was that she did not give away her stock, that she was not aware of the fact that she was executing such a transfer as the records show, and that she had no recollection whatever as to the circumstances leading up to signing of the papers. If such was the case, and the court has so found, it of course follows, in the absence of any facts creating an equitable estoppel against her—and there are none—that Richard Hotaling could acquire no beneficial interest in this corporate stock as against his mother.

This conclusion is further supported by evidence sustaining the further finding of the trial court that the personal and business relations between Richard Hotaling and his mother were such as to establish the existence of confidential relations between them which called for the exercise of the strictest good faith on his part, and which would tend to corroborate her testimony that she had no intimate knowledge of the business of the corporation itself; that it was under the management of her son, Richard; that she had implicit confidence in him both as her son and as the managing head of the corporation, and was accustomed to sign all papers pertaining to the corporation at his request and without investigation or knowledge of their contents.

[3] It is unnecessary to go any further than this in defining the confidential relations between Mrs. Hotaling and her son Richard. They were at least such that he could not hold her to a transfer of her stock made inadvertently and without knowledge of what she was doing, and without consideration. This proposition is elementary. Counsel on both sides have ably and with great research compiled the decisions of the courts upon the degrees of confidential relations between parent and child and the conditions and circumstances under which a conveyance from a parent to the child will be avoided unless shown to have been made freely and voluntarily, with full knowledge of all the facts, and after the parent has had independent advice. It is not necessary to apply that rule here in all its strictness. It may be granted that, if Mrs. Hotaling made this transfer to Richard, as he testifies that she did, it would constitute a valid executed gift. Though 74 years of age, she was a mentally vigorous and competent woman, who evidently looked after her own private interests, and even dominated the affairs of the corporation in matters where she felt herself personally concerned. She was quite capable of forming an independent judgment where her son Richard was concerned, as well as in matters relating to other members of her family.

According to the story narrated on the witness stand by Richard Hotaling, the plaintiff told him one night, after her younger son had come home under the influence of liquor from a social function, where he had, it appears, made something of a scandal, that she was not going to bother with Fred any longer; that if he was going to conduct himself in that manner, and lose everything he had, she was determined that he was not going to lose any more than he now has. She then said, according to this testimony:

> "Now, Dick, I can rely on you. I have been thinking this thing over, and I want to give you all of my stock in the family estate, and then if Fred makes any trouble he will have you to deal with."
> "Then," the witness continues, "I said to her, 'Why, now, Mama, why you are excited now; just don't think any more about this.' 'Oh, no,' she said, 'this is not the only time; I have put up with him in this kind of thing for a great many years. He has promised me on many occasions that he would give up drinking, and he does not keep his word. * * * My mind is made up, Dick, and I think it is the best thing to do. You know how it was with Anson. When Anson passed away, he had made everything over to Ella, and there was no fuss and there was no trouble. I have a very bad heart, Dick; I get that from Mother. You see how my head shakes, and some day I may get one shock too many. Now, I am determined in this thing. I have made up my mind. I think it is the best thing that you should have my stock and I want to give it to you.'"

The witness testifies to more conversation of this nature, and says that he advised her to wait awhile; that he was going to Marin county to spend Thanksgiving, and when he came back next week they would see about it; that when he returned after Thanksgiving his mother renewed the topic, and reiterated her purpose to give him the stock, and it was finally agreed if she felt that way for her to come to the office the next afternoon and they would fix it up; that she came to the offices of the corporation the afternoon of the following day, and said, "I am here, Dick, to fix that matter up and give you my stock"; that he, at her suggestion, then procured the certificates, and the transfer was made as heretofore stated, Mrs. Hotaling at his suggestion retaining one share of the 2,500 shares she owned in the corporation to qualify her to remain as the president and a director of the corporation. Mrs. Hotaling at the time owned a considerable amount of other property, and it appears was fully aware of her financial condition.

If the facts could be accepted as thus testified to by Richard Hotaling, we are not prepared to say they would not establish a valid and binding gift of the 2,499 shares to the son Richard. The facts thus narrated would show a deliberate, independent transfer on the part of Mrs. Hotaling, with a full knowledge of all the consequences of her act necessary to make the gift complete and binding. But the trial court found that this version of the transfer was not true, and, unless we can disregard the finding of the court, and ignore the testimony of Mrs. Hotaling, together with such evidence as was produced in corroboration of her denials of having made a gift to Richard, the judgment cannot be disturbed for want of proof to support the findings as to the ultimate issue in the case.

It seems scarcely worth while to discuss the other evidence in detail. As we have stated, it is wholly concerned with collateral matters, bearing but indirectly and inferentially upon the primary facts testified to by mother and son. While the facts developed have evidentiary value on one side and the other, they are in sharp conflict both as to their substance and as to their probative effect. The trial court may have gone further than would be justified by the cold print, if it were our province to weigh the evidence, in accepting all the testimony on behalf of the plaintiff, and rejecting all that for defendants, but it had the witness before it, and received the evidence in detail through a trial lasting many days. There were circumstances testified to which give color to Richard Hotaling's story, and witnesses testified to statements made by Mrs. Hotaling in the years subsequent to the transfer which might fairly be construed as admissions of the gift of her stock.

On the other hand, it was shown that Mrs. Hotaling continued to deal with, and in some instances dictate, the affairs of the corporation, as if she were an interested stockholder, and transactions were had and statements made by Richard Hotaling apparently inconsistent with his claim of ownership of his mother's stock.

Subsequent to the alleged gift and transfer of practically all of the plaintiff's interest in the corporation, she is found disputing with Richard as to the retention of certain employees of the company, the management and disposal of some of the corporate property, the manner of conducting the business, in most of which matters Mrs. Hotaling succeeded in having her own way, and in the discussion of which no question was raised as to her having no beneficial rights in the premises. It is conceded that no person besides Richard Hotaling and the plaintiff is claimed to have had any direct knowledge of the transfer of this stock, and whatever indirect evidence was produced as to such a gift consisted of two or three casual conversations by the plaintiff testified to by Ella Hotaling and a Mrs. Sullivan, a former employee in the family, in which Mrs. Hotaling made reference to having divided her property between her sons. It appears that she had given to each of them property other than this stock, and the references to the gifts were to vague and uncertain to include definitely the transfer of the corporate stock. The same indefiniteness and inconclusiveness may be ascribed to a number of oral statements attributed by plaintiff's witnesses to Richard Hotaling, which were construed as admissions that his mother continued to be the owner of her original shares in the corporation.

As conceded by both parties, evidence of oral admissions, particularly where inferential rather than direct and explicit, is about the most unreliable and uncertain evidence that can be produced.

But on the part of plaintiff there were introduced in evidence certain letters of Richard M. Hotaling written subsequently to the alleged gift, which at least are not subject to the taint of uncertain memory, and which may be fairly held inconsistent with his claim of ownership of substantially the whole of his mother's stock. He refers in one letter, in connection with a reference to his mother, to "a list of the inactive properties that we have in San Francisco, as well as some of our outside properties." In another he alludes to his mother being "thoroughly acquainted with the change in the handling of our real estate, for it was discussed with her and thoroughly explained." Another, in response to a letter from Mr. McNab calling for a statement and report of certain of the corporate properties to be placed in the hands of Mrs. L. J. Hotaling, states that the report is being made and will be furnished, but that the writer "is very sorry that this request has been made, because I know that Mrs. Hotaling is surrounded by some persons into whose hands it will be just as well that detailed matters connected with our estate should not go." The statement in a letter to Frederick C. Hotaling that "Mother has told me that she is perfectly willing that Hind & Co. should look after our affairs." These quotations are not, in themselves, of special significance, but, covering a period of time and transactions affecting the corporate business, and containing no word in any instance to negative the mother's continued rights in the premises, they were matters which the trial court had a right to weigh in the consideration of the plaintiff's categorical denial that she had made the alleged gift of her stock.

A great volume of the testimony in the trial related to a transaction concerning the disputed right of Richard M. Hotaling to other property consisting of a ranch known as the Sleepy Hollow ranch, in Marin county, and to which he had obtained a conveyance from the corporation. It had no relation to the stock transfer, and is of such doubtful relevancy, and of so slight evidentiary value, that it does not require discussion.

[4] We are of the opinion that too much importance has been given, and too much irritation developed, over the fact that much of the evidence for the plaintiff was given by one of the attorneys in her behalf, as a witness in the case. So far as the court is concerned, such testimony is to be received and considered, as that of any other witness in view of the inherent quality of his testimony, his interest in the case, and his appearance on the witness stand.

[5] The propriety of a lawyer occupying the dual capacity of attorney and witness is purely one of legal ethics, largely to be determined by the attorney's own conscience. While it is not a practice to be encouraged, it may often occur that conditions exist in which an attorney cannot justly or fairly withhold from his client either his legal services or his testimony as a witness.

We have scarcely referred in this opinion to the elaborate and resourceful discussion of learned counsel of the questions of law involving confidential relations, and burden and degree of proof, and have but touched upon a review of the voluminous evidence, because of the fact that it is too manifest that any nice distinctions in these matters are foreclosed by the findings of the trial court on the outstanding issue as to whether or not Mrs. Hotaling ever made or attempted to make a gift of this stock to her son.

[6] The decision of the trial court that there was no act or purpose on the part of plaintiff to so dispose of her rights reduces the question before us to the simplest elements. Was there sufficient evidence to support the finding? We are clearly of the opinion that there was. Had a gift or intent to make a gift been proven, it may be conceded that such transfer could only be set aside on clear and convincing proof of fraud or mistake. But the finding here goes to negative the effect of the original transaction and holds that there was no gift.

[7] In supplement to the objection to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings, appellants allege certain errors of the trial court in the rejection of evidence offered in behalf of defendants:

First: The plaintiff had testified, in support of her claim of ignorance of the details of the corporate affairs, that to her knowledge she had never seen any stock certificates. In rebuttal of this statement defendants showed that Mrs. Hotaling had owned shares of stock in other corporations. There were also offered in evidence certain dividend checks on this stock that had been received by Mrs. Hotaling. These checks were excluded from evidence, and the ruling of the court is assigned as error. In making this ruling the trial judge said:

> "I admitted in evidence the certificates of stock just referred to as bearing upon the question whether or not this lady had any knowledge, or rather the extent of her knowledge, if any, as to what a certificate of stock was, its appearance, and the like. Consequently I don't see how these are relevant, and I will sustain the objection."

In other words, the court held that familiarity with dividend checks containing an order for the payment of dividends on her stock would not tend to establish any familiarity with the physical aspects or contents of the stock certificate itself, and that was the point to which the evidence was directed. The general familiarity of the plaintiff with corporate shares and the dividends therefrom was abundantly evident, and we do not think seriously disputed. In explaining how she may have signed the certificate transferring her stock to Richard Hotaling without knowing what it was, she had made this statement, that she did not know what a stock certificate looked like, and her knowledge of dividend checks would throw no light on this point.

Second: Question was raised on the trial whether, after the alleged gift by his mother of her interest in the estate of Richard Hotaling, he had made any provision for her possible future needs. He testified that he had provided for her in a will executed in August, 1914, but that this will had been destroyed. It was then brought out that a new will was made in August, 1918, some two months prior to the beginning of this action. He was asked by plaintiff's counsel if he had made any provision for his mother in this latter will, but, upon the objection of his own counsel that this would be incompetent, he was not permitted to answer. Counsel for plaintiff then demanded the production of the will, but when later it was produced refused to offer it in evidence. We find nothing to comment upon thus far under this head. Plaintiff's counsel were not required to offer the will in evidence, and defendants' counsel did not do so, and are not claiming that it contained anything relevant to the case.

Attention, however, is called to an offer on the part of defendants' counsel to prove the contents of the destroyed will in explanation of a statement brought out on cross-examination in a letter of Richard Hotaling to his brother Fred, in which it was stated:

> "My will, as you know, is in your favor. When I die you will get all I possess."

This was in apparent contradiction of the testimony that he had provided for his mother in such will. On redirect examination counsel for defendants offered to show, by proving the contents of the lost will, that the will in question left Richard's entire estate to his brother, Fred, in trust, to pay the proceeds to his mother during her life, then to Fred during his life, then the entire remainder to the children of the deceased brother. The court sustained an objection to this proof. We think this ruling was clearly erroneous if any significance is to be attached to the declaration in the letter that everything had been left to Fred. That declaration raised the implication that the statement in the former testimony, that he had provided for his mother by this will, was untrue, and the proffered proof of the contents of the will would have explained the apparent contradiction in the evidence.

[8] But we fail to see the materiality of the issue thus raised. What bearing does the question as to whether Richard Hotaling made subsequent provision for his mother have upon the question as to whether or not she made him a gift of her corporate stock? It is not claimed by any one that this was a condition or consideration for the transfer. If it stands upon any foundation whatever, it is upon a purported statement long subsequent to the transfer made by Richard to his mother that he would provide for her every need. At the time of the alleged gift Mrs. Hotaling had ample remaining property in her own right to support her.

The evidence as to the apparently contradictory statements of Richard Hotaling as to the provisions of his will were brought out by plaintiff's counsel without objection, so far as we have been able to discover, but it was a collateral and immaterial issue, and not the subject of impeachment. Its remoteness from the main issues of the case, we think, removes it from the class of prejudicial error.

Thirdly: In order to show the obligation to her son, Richard, under which Mrs. Hotaling rested, Richard had testified that, before the division and distribution of the interests in the family estate among the members of the family, which were then operated under an incorporation known as A. P. Hotaling & Co., a plan had been drawn up whereby the stock of the corporation was to be distributed in equal shares to the three sons, the elder son, Anson, since deceased, then being alive, and the mother was to be left out, with some indefinite provision for her support during her lifetime; that when this plan was presented at a family meeting for the purpose of considering it Richard, as soon as the proposal was made, protested against it, declaring that it was unjust to his mother, and that this was the first he had heard of such a scheme; that, as a result, this proposed settlement was abandoned, and the mother was given an equal share in the estate with each of the children, which adjustment resulted in her receiving full 2,500 shares in the estate company, afterwards incorporated, which is the stock involved in this action. In corroboration of this testimony the defendants offered in evidence certain canceled and unissued certificates of stock in the stock certificate book of the A. P. Hotaling Company showing the preparation of such certificates for issuance in blocks of one-third each, of the entire stock to the three sons, in connection with the alleged settlement, which Richard Hotaling claims to have frustrated.

[9] On objection of plaintiff's counsel, the trial court excluded this evidence. There was no prejudicial error in this ruling. It is not disputed that such a division of the stock was attempted. The plaintiff herself testifies that she was present at the meeting when this proposed settlement was presented; that she indignantly voiced her objection, and that the plan was abandoned. The only point in controversy is as to Richard's part in defeating it. These canceled and unissued certificates could throw no light on the proposition. The only evidence as to Richard Hotaling's agency in the matter is his own version, as already referred to, supported, as we remember, by the testimony of another witness as to admissions to the same effect by Mrs. Hotaling, and Mrs. Hotaling's own testimony, in which she agrees with Richard as to the preliminary facts, but gives a somewhat different version as to the nature and extent of his disclaimer and protest.

[10, 11] Fourth: Richard Hotaling was asked, on cross-examination, whether, "in the conduct of the corporation," or "in the various transactions of the business," he ever did anything or said anything either to Mr. McNab, Mr. Richardson, or Mr. Umbsen to inform them or either of them that he was the owner of this stock, to which he answered that he had mentioned said matter to none of these excepting to Mr. McNab, on January 18, 1918. Upon redirect examination counsel for defendants asked the witness if he knew certain persons, none of whom, excepting Ella K. Hotaling, appear to have had any connection with the Hotaling family, or the affairs of the parties to this action. He answered that he did know them. The following question was then put to the witness:

> "I will ask you, Mr. Hotaling, if subsequently to the 2d day of December, 1913, and during the years 1914 and 1915 you did not inform each and every one of the persons I have just named that your mother had given you her interest in the Hotaling Estate Company?"

The witness answered in the affirmative, but the answer was stricken out on plaintiff's objection that it was "self-serving, irrelevant, incompetent, and immaterial, and not shown to have been made in the presence of Mrs. Hotaling."

The testimony thus excluded cannot be said to have been properly offered in rebuttal of the matter drawn out on cross-examination. The question on cross-examination was directed to any claim of ownership of the stock, to persons connected with the corporation in matters relating to the transactions of the business.

One of the contentions of the defendants on the trial was that, subsequent to the date of the alleged gift, the affairs of the corporation were carried on precisely as though Mrs. Hotaling was a party in interest in the corporate affairs, and without anything to indicate Richard Hotaling's claim of ownership of this stock. The parties named in the question put on cross-examination were all persons in close relation with the corporate affairs during this period. The persons regarding whom the evidence on redirect examination was excluded, with the exception of Ella Hotaling, who was aligned with the defendants in the action, were strangers to the corporation and its business. Statements made to them would not constitute a challenge to Mrs. Hotaling's rights as a stockholder.

[12] Such declarations made by a party in his own interest are commonly inadmissible. Exceptions to this rule exist under circumstances where a failure to assert a claim or right may be construed against the party as an implied negation, or where the assertion of such claim at a later date is attributed to conditions and exigencies which have arisen since the transaction in question, which motive would be disproved by showing earlier declarations to the same effect. Calif. Elec. L. Co. v. Safe Deposit & Trust Co., 145 Cal. 124, 78 Pac. 372; People v. Rodley, 131 Cal. 240, 63 Pac. 351; People v. Doyell, 48 Cal. 85; Commonwealth v. Jenkins, 10 Gray (Mass.) 485, 40 Cyc. 2789. The declarations here excluded do not purport to have been made to parties or under circumstances to bring them within any of the recognized exceptions to the rule.

If the excluded testimony was offered on the broader ground that it was intended to rebut any implication that may have arisen on the trial that Richard Hotaling had tried to keep secret any claim of ownership of his mother's stock from the time of the transfer, it might be admissible for that purpose, even though not strictly redirect testimony, But, in view of the facts that none of the parties communicated with were concerned in the ownership of the stock, or were interested in or hostile to the witness' claim of ownership, and that the evidence but inferentially tends to prove a fact that, in itself, if proved, would only give rise to another inference, the error, if there was such, cannot be given such prejudicial weight as to justify a reversal.

It is true that Ella K. Hotaling, one of the persons named, was a member of the family and a stockholder in the corporation, but she has herself testified to facts showing her understanding that Richard Hotaling owned his mother's stock, and is a witness in his behalf. To show further that Richard had declared to her his claim of ownership would aid little in removing the stigma of secrecy, if any such existed.

[13] Fifth: The final exception to the court's rulings on the exclusion of evidence presented in appellants' brief arises on the rejection of a letter written by Fred C. Hotaling in which he confesses to the circulation of certain slanderous reports concerning Ella K. Hotaling. Appellants claim that this letter, written to the defendant, Richard Hotaling, is relevant and material in explaining Richard Hotaling's unfriendly relations with Fred, and the motive and inducement governing Richard in making certain alleged statements to his mother regarding the recording of the deed to the Sleepy Hollow ranch, which he had held without record for so many years, and in the making of his wills. The unfriendly relations of the two brothers are undisputed. Richard had already testified to the fact of the scurrilous stories circulated by Fred, and to the confession of the latter that he had circulated them, and to the breaking of all relations with Fred. The existence of these facts and conditions are undisputed; indeed, are conceded. The letter in question, though perhaps the best evidence of the fact of confession, was but cumulative. As we have already indicated, the Sleepy Hollow ranch transaction was remote and entirely collateral in relation to the main issue of this case. Any possible application of the acts of Fred Hotaling, either in making or admitting his insinuations against Ella K. Hotaling, was supplied by Richard's uncontradicted testimony as to his understanding of the matter, and does not depend upon Fred's confession. We can see no possible error or prejudice in its exclusion.

As already stated in this opinion, we find in this record on appeal many reasons for putting a more favorable construction upon the defendants' side of this controversy than were indulged by the trial court; but upon a review of the whole case, it is clear that the findings which support the judgment have substantial support in the evidence. And the alleged errors of law which counsel for appellants themselves refer to as "presented for argument's sake, and that alone," if they amount to error, do not, "after an examination of the entire cause including the evidence," indicate "a miscarriage of justice."

BUDD v. MORGAN. (L. A. 6246.)

1. Marriage 🔑50(2)—Provable by testimony of fact and subsequent living together.

In view of Civ. Code, § 57, Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 30, and Pen. Code, § 1106, testimony of a woman that she was married to a man and lived with him as his wife for several years was prima facie proof of marriage, without record proof.

2. Evidence 🔑260—Statements by conspirator held admissible.

In wife's action for alienation of husband's affections, where defendant claimed a conspiracy to get her into a false and apparently improper position with the husband, evidence held to be sufficient prima facie proof that one employed by plaintiff's counsel was a coconspirator to render admissible his declarations and statements prior to the consummation of the conspiracy and in furtherance thereof.

3. Criminal law 🔑423(7)—Conspirator need not have originated conspiracy.

It is not necessary for one to have been one of the original conspirators in order to be a member of a conspiracy.

4. Trial 🔑29(2) — Judge's remarks held not misconduct.

In wife's action for alienation of affections, where, on counsel's objection to the court's statement, "There is no question but what the wife lost the affections of her husband at the time at least when he said he was leaving, never to return," the court replied, "The court is not intending in any way to pass upon the facts; merely had reference to the statement made by the plaintiff that at a certain time her husband left her and stated he was never coming back," there was no misconduct.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Willis I. Morrison, Judge.

Action by Florence M. Budd against Ida Alys Morgan. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

H. C. Millsap and Ward Chapman, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Roland G. Swaffield and Swaffield & Swaffield, all of Long Beach, for respondent.

SHURTLEFF, J. This is an action by plaintiff for damages for the alleged alienation by defendant of the affections of one Orris O. Budd, the plaintiff's husband. The amended and supplemental complaint alleged that the plaintiff and said Orris O. Budd were, and ever since the 4th day of March, 1901, had been, husband and wife, and stated in detail the acts and conduct of the defendant alleged to have caused and resulted in such alienation. The defendant in her answer denied, for want of knowledge, information, or belief, that plaintiff was lawfully or otherwise married to said Budd, or that they are or at any of the times mentioned in the complaint were husband and wife, and also denied both the alienation of the husband's affections and the alleged means and acts by and through which it was claimed that the same had been accomplished. The answer further averred that the defendant was the victim of a conspiracy entered into by the plaintiff, her husband, the said Orris O. Budd, and certain other named persons, by and in pursuance of which the said Budd was to make love to defendant and was to intrap her into compromising positions with him in order to lay the foundation for, and further this action, and to extort money from the defendant.

The action was tried upon the issues thus framed before the court and a jury, and resulted in a verdict for $15,000 damages in favor of plaintiff, for which amount judgment was entered, and from which judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

The appellant does not contend that the evidence upon the issue of alienation was insufficient to support the verdict, but confines her claim for reversal to the following: First, that the marriage between plaintiff and the said Orris O. Budd was not sufficiently established; second, error in the exclusion of certain evidence; and, third, misconduct by the court in the use of certain language when ruling upon one of defendant's objections.

[1] The first of these contentions was, we think, correctly determined by the District Court of Appeal in the following language, which we approve and adopt:

> "The first * * * contention of the appellant is that the evidence which was offered by the plaintiff for the purpose of establishing the marriage between herself and Orris O. Budd was insufficient to establish such marriage, and that the objections of the defendant to the admission of the same should have been sustained. The evidence which was thus offered and objected to was, first, that of the plaintiff herself, who, after testifying to her age and place of residence, was interrogated as follows: 'Q. Whereabouts were you married? A. Kokomo, Ind. Q. To whom were you married? A. Orris O. Budd.' * * * The defendant hereupon interposed an objection to this evidence as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, as calling for the conclusion of the witness, and not the best evidence. The objection was overruled, whereupon the witness proceeded to testify that she had the certificate of marriage with her. * * * The plaintiff was then asked by whom she was married, a minister or an official, and, an objection to this question having been offered and overruled, she answered that she was married by the Rev. Mr. Floyd, a minister of the Christian Church in Kokomo. She was then asked whether a license had been issued to herself and husband prior to said marriage, which question she answered in the affirmative. She then proceeded to testify that from the time of this marriage in 1901 herself and husband had lived together as husband and wife in various places, and that a strong and mutual affection had existed between them up to about the year 1913, when the affections of her husband began to cool until a few months later, when they reached a point of estrangement without any fault on her part, but in spite of her efforts to retain her husband's affections. He finally left her, suggesting that she had better get a divorce. The plaintiff then proceeded to testify to the relations which she began to discover as existing between her husband and the defendant, and finally to the episode of surprising her husband at the mine, where he was employed, in a compromising position with the defendant. We are of the opinion that the evidence thus presented by the plaintiff in relation to her marriage to Orris O. Budd, and to the fact that for several years prior to the misconduct of the defendant resulting in the alienation of his affections the plaintiff and Orris O. Budd had been deporting themselves as husband and wife, was properly admitted by the trial court, and was sufficient to establish prima facie the fact that the plaintiff and Orris O. Budd were husband and wife. Conceding that the laws of Indiana with relation to the solemnization of marriages will be presumed to be the same as those of California upon that subject, it does not follow therefrom that in making proof of the existence of the marriage relation it would be necessary to establish the successive statutory steps to be taken prior to and including the solemnization of such marriage specified in sections 68 to 74, inclusive, of our Civil Code. Section 57 of the Civil Code provides as follows: 'Sec. 57. Consent to marriage and solemnization thereof may be proved under the same general rules of evidence as facts are proved in other cases.'
> "We are of the opinion that the intent of this section of the Civil Code was to enable parties to or persons present at the solemnization of a marriage to testify to the fact within their knowledge that such marriage actually took place; and, when to such testimony the additional evidence is educed showing that since said marriage the parties thereto have deported themselves as husband and wife, a prima facie case has been sufficiently shown. Subdivision 30 of section 1963 of the Code of Civil Procedure, dealing with disputable presumptions, specifies as one of these the presumption 'that a man and woman deporting themselves as husband and wife have entered into a lawful contract of marriage.' That it was the intent of our lawmakers to render such proof sufficient to make out prima facie the status of husband and wife would seem to be also deducible from the fact that even in criminal cases no higher form of proof is required in this state. Section 1106 of the Penal Code provides that 'upon a trial for bigamy it is not necessary to prove either of the marriages by the register, certificate, or other record evidence thereof, but the same may be proved by such evidence as is admissible to prove a marriage in other cases.' That the rules of evidence above stated are applicable to proof of the existence of the marriage relation in other states, see Barber v. People, 203 Ill. 543, 68 N. E. 93; Franklin v. Lee, 30 Ind. App. 31, 62 N. E. 78; Mathews v. Silvander, 14 S. D. 505, 85 N. W. 998; Jacobsen v. Siddal, 12 Or. 280, 7 Pac. 108, 53 Am. Rep. 360; Commonwealth v. Dill, 156 Mass. 226, 30 N. E. 1016; Murchison v. Green, 128 Ga. 339, 57 S. E. 709, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 702; Commonwealth v. Hayden, 163 Mass. 453, 40 N. E. 846, 28 L. R. A. 318, 47 Am. St. Rep. 468.
> "We are therefore of the opinion that the plaintiff, by the form of evidence which she presented to the trial court, sufficiently made out a prima facie case of the existence of the relation between herself and Orris O. Budd of husband and wife, that the objections of the defendant to such evidence were properly overruled, and that her present contention that the same was insufficient to prove the fact in issue cannot be sustained."

[2] Appellant's second contention is that the trial court erred in excluding certain statements and declarations made by one R. E. Fisher, claimed by appellant to have been a member of the conspiracy which she affirmed had been formed for the purpose, through a trick, of getting her in a false and apparently improper position with Budd. An understanding of this point requires a somewhat extended reference to the proceedings which occurred in reference thereto at the trial. John F. McClure, a witness on behalf of appellant, was asked this question:

> "Did you at any time during that year [1913] have a conversation with R. E. Fisher and Mr. Macy in the city of Los Angeles relative to any controversy or proceedings had or taken by Mr. Fisher in any case?"

An objection to the question was overruled and the witness answered, "I heard a conversation." He was then asked:

> "State when and where and the parties present at the time of the conversation"

—which question was objected to as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, calling for hearsay testimony. The court thereupon asked:

> "This is the same conversation taken up before as to acts of various conspirators and matters relating thereto, that is the purpose of the offer?"

To which appellant's attorney replied in the affirmative. A colloquy then followed between court and respective counsel, in which the court inquired if it was claimed that Fisher was a conspirator, and respondent's counsel replied that it was not so claimed in the answer, the averments of which did not in terms name Fisher as a conspirator as it did the plaintiff, Budd, and several others, but averred that respondent's attorney had employed Fisher "special deputy constable of the city of Long Beach" to serve a copy of the complaint and summons in this action upon defendant, and instructed and directed him to go to the Perris mine, where the defendant was living and Budd was working, and serve said copy of summons and complaint in the manner set forth in the answer. Thereupon the court said:

> "The court * * * is going to hold that any act or declaration of Mr. Fisher relative to matters arising out of, and within the scope of his employment, are admissible in evidence. * * * I am only holding that they can prove what they aver in the answer, * * * that they can prove, the employment of Fisher being admitted, that they can prove the allegations of the answer concerning that employment."

Thereupon counsel for defendant made a comprehensive statement of what he offered to prove by the witness, which included that the declarations of Fisher, which he desired to put in evidence, were made on March 10, 1913 (the day following the discovery of defendant and Budd in a compromising position in defendant's room at the Perris mine); that the return of the summons had not then been made; that Fisher had not then been paid his compensation; that in pursuance of his employment Fisher had telegraphed plaintiff's attorney, who employed him, to meet him either at Long Beach or at Los Angeles on the morning of March 10th; that on that morning, and before Fisher had reached the office of plaintiff's attorney, Fisher, in the presence of one Macy and the witness, stated he had been to the Perris mine and had gone there under the instructions and directions of plaintiff's attorney "for the purpose of executing a frame-up, and that it had been agreed between Mrs. Budd, Whealton (plaintiff's attorney), Burroughs (plaintiff's brother), and other parties at the mine that Budd should enter the room of Mrs. Morgan at a time and place to be agreed upon, and that the whole deal was carried out as planned; that it took him to frame up and pull off a deal like that; that the house of Mrs. Morgan was entered on the night of March 9th, and that he held a gun on Mrs. Morgan and compelled her to submit to the taking of a flash light picture; that a demand was made for a settlement or a payment of money; and that Mrs. Morgan did then and there agree to pay, and that he (Fisher) would get his, to wit, $3,000." Plaintiff objected to the introduction of this testimony on the "ground that it was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, calling for hearsay testimony, especially that portion * * * as to what the conspiracy was, and that it is prejudicial," calling for the recital of transactions by an officer, made after he had made the service for which he was employed, and that any statement or remarks made by him after he had performed his services as an officer could in no way bind any of the parties to the action. The court, in ruling upon this objection, said, "The court will hold no declarations, except those made during the pendency of the conspiracy and in furtherance of its objects, are admissible as against the coconspirators;" which would mean that the statements made by Fisher, after returning to Los Angeles, relative to the things he went to the mine to do, were not admissible, "in so far as all proof is concerned at the present time the court does not see there is sufficient before it to justify it in holding that the employment was in effect after March 9th or 10th, whatever it may be." The result was that the proffered evidence was rejected, which ruling we think was error, and that defendant should have been permitted to introduce the declarations. At the time they were made the objects of the conspiracy had not been fully accomplished, nor was Fisher's active participation in it at an end. He had not at that time made his final report to plaintiff's attorney, neither had he received the $3,000 which he stated was to be paid him out of the money which might be forced from the defendant by threats to send a copy of the flash light picture showing defendant in bed with Budd, taken by those acting with and for plaintiff at the mine, on the night of March 9, 1913, to each of the heirs of defendant's deceased husband, all of which was fully known to Fisher, he being one of the party that took the photograph and having taken an active part not only in what transpired that night, but in planning and carrying out the invasion of defendant's room. It is apparent that the trial court correctly regarded Fisher as a member of the alleged conspiracy. Conceding that he may have been employed to serve the summons and complaint upon the defendant, the record shows that his connection with the matter went beyond that of an officer engaged for the sole purpose of serving legal papers. The evidence established prima facie that in reality he was a member of the alleged conspiracy, rather than an employee thereof. It was not necessary for Fisher, in order to make the aforementioned service, to spend two days and nights in the vicinity of defendant's mine before making such service, and to make it at nighttime, under the circumstances which he did, when it clearly appears that it could have been made at a much earlier date in the daytime and in the usual way. It was not necessary that he should become a member of a party organized for the express purpose of forcibly entering the defendant's room in the nighttime upon receipt of a signal that Budd had entered it, such entrance not to be made without such signal. It was not necessary that, upon accomplishing such entrance by force, he should read the complaint to the defendant. It was not necessary that he should, on the night of March 8, 1913, accompany plaintiff and others of the alleged conspiracy to a barn upon defendant's said mine and near the room occupied by defendant, stay there about an hour, and finally return to the Death Valley mine, where the party, including Fisher, were staying, without making the service, because they were advised that nothing would be going on that night. It was not necessary that, when making the service of the papers in this action, he should read the names of the heirs of defendant's deceased husband to the defendant in her room on the night of March 9th. Add to the foregoing the statement of the plaintiff, that she knew Fisher carried a pistol, and of the defendant, made under oath, that on the night of March 9th, while the plaintiff and others were in her room, that some one (probably Fisher) pointed a revolver at her (defendant's) head, and the further testimony of the defendant that she was innocent of each and every act of misconduct charged against her, that there had been no improper relations between her and Budd, we think there was, as we have said, sufficient prima facie proof that Fisher was a coconspirator to admit in evidence his alleged declarations, made during the existence, and before the consummation, of the conspiracy. As said in Del Campo v. Camarillo, 154 Cal. 647, 653, 98 Pac. 1049. 1052–1053:

> "The rule is that * * * declarations of one conspirator, made while the conspiracy is pending and during the progress of the plan adopted for its accomplishment, are admissible against both."

While the plaintiff testified that the purpose of the incident of March 9th was to secure evidence in support of her alienation suit, the facts showed, prima facie at least, that its main and real object was to force defendant, through fear of disgraceful exposure, to pay plaintiff a large amount of money to keep the matter quiet and suppress the photograph so frequently referred to herein, which object (the collection of money) had not been accomplished at the time the alleged declarations of Fisher were made. Of course, the formation of the conspiracy itself could not have been proved as against his alleged coconspirators by the declarations of Fisher (Barkly v. Copeland, 86 Cal. 483, 25 Pac. 1, 405; Del Campo v. Camarillo, supra), but such was not the purpose of the offer; it was to show what Fisher, as one of the conspirators, had done and said after its formation and before its consummation in furtherance thereof, and in connection therewith.

[3] Nor was it necessary for Fisher to have been one of the original conspirators in order to become a member thereof. If he knew of its existence, as he unquestionably did, he became a party thereto as completely as he would had he been one of its original organizers. People v. Kizer, 22 Cal. App. 10, 133 Pac. 516, 521, 134 Pac. 346; U. S. v. Cassidy (D. C.) 67 Fed. 698.

[4] We discover no ground for reversal in appellant's final claim that the following remarks, made by the trial court when ruling upon one of defendant's objections, amounted to misconduct. The court said:

> "I think, in so far as the alienation is concerned, there is no question but what the wife lost the affections of her husband at the time at least when he said he was leaving, never to return. * * * If she did not possess his affections at that time, why, certainly they could not thereafter be alienated."

Thereupon the appellant's counsel asked the court to instruct the jury that—

> The "court does not mean to say as a matter of fact it has been established, as your honor's words would indicate, that beyond doubt the alienation has been proved."

To which the court replied:

> "The court is not intending in any way to pass upon the facts; merely had reference to the statement made by the plaintiff that at a certain time her husband left her and stated he was never coming back."

While these last-quoted remarks were not cast in the form of an instruction, they were in effect the equivalent thereof, and substantially told the jury that the court was not passing upon the facts, and that that was their function.

For the reasons already stated, the judgment is reversed.

BLACKWOOD v. McCALLUM et al.
(S. F. 9441.)

1. Principal and surety 🔑155—Act of obligee releasing sureties affirmative defense, and complaint need not allege plaintiff's performance.

In order to fasten prima facie liability on sureties on contractor's bond, it was not essential for plaintiff owner to allege that he had performed the contract upon his part, since, if plaintiff was guilty of any act which would release in whole or in part the obligation of the sureties, it was an affirmative defense to be specially pleaded by them.

2. Pleading 🔑8(7)—Allegation in answer of sureties held mere conclusion of law.

In action against sureties on bond of building contractor who failed to pay claims for materials, an averment in the answer that the building was erected "in accordance with and pursuant to a new and different contract or agreement with plaintiff" was not the statement of an ultimate fact, but of a mere conclusion of law, and in this connection the burden rested upon the defendants to allege the covenants and conditions of the claimed new contract with sufficient particularity and detail to acquaint plaintiff with its terms.

3. Principal and surety 🔑100(4)—Provision in bond held waiver of consent of owner and contractor.

A provision in a construction contract that there should be no changes or modifications in the plans unless agreed upon and fixed in writing, signed by the owner and the contractor, could be waived as between the owner and the contractor, and such waiver as to a minor change would bind sureties under a provision in the bond that changes involving decreased expenditure or increased expenditure of less than $1,000, or not involving any change in cost, could be made without the consent of the sureties.

Action by Harry T. Blackwood against J. H. McCallum and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and certain defendants appeal. Affirmed.

J. W. Henderson, of Eureka, and Hartley F. Peart, of San Francisco, for appellants.

G. T. Wright and Wright, Wright & Stetson, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHURTLEFF, J. This is an appeal by the defendants, J. H. McCallum and E. O. Benner, from a judgment against them and their codefendant, Hansbrough-Johnson Company, the latter not joining in the appeal.

The complaint alleges that on June 5, 1916, the plaintiff, as owner, entered into a building contract with the defendant Hansbrough-Johnson Company, whereby the latter agreed, for the price of $9,712, to erect for plaintiff a two-story frame residence upon a lot of land in San Francisco; that to secure the performance of said contract the Hansbrough-Johnson Company, as principal, and the appellants McCallum and Benner, as sureties, executed and delivered to plaintiff a bond in the penal sum of $4,856, conditioned that said Hansbrough-Johnson Company would in all respects comply with all the terms, covenants, and conditions of said contract and furnish the materials and perform the work according thereto, free of liens or claims arising out of materials furnished or work performed thereunder; that said bond further stipulated that, in the event of any liens being filed upon the building or land upon which it was erected, arising from the performance of the work or furnishing of the materials, or in the event of plaintiff being compelled to pay any sums of money, for said work or materials, by reason of the failure of Hansbrough-Johnson Company to pay the same, then the said McCallum and Benner would repay plaintiff said sums, not exceeding the amount of the bond; that said building was completed on or prior to September 18, 1916, and that on said last-mentioned day notice of completion and acceptance was filed for record in the office of the county recorder of the city and county of San Francisco (this date is evidently a clerical error, and should be December 15, 1916); that on January 17, 1917, two claims of lien against the building and land for materials furnished and used in the construction of said building were filed for record, and actions were commenced to foreclose them; that in each of these actions the plaintiff and Hansbrough-Johnson Company were named as defendants and were respectively served with the summons and a copy of the complaint in each of them; that the plaintiff appeared and answered in each action; that Hansbrough-Johnson Company made no appearance in either of said actions; that the actions were consolidated and tried; judgments rendered in favor of the claimants, the liens foreclosed, and the property ordered sold; that plaintiff was compelled to pay $250 for the services of attorneys in defending said actions; that prior to the commencement of said actions to foreclose said liens plaintiff had paid the defendant Hansbrough-Johnson Company all sums due and owing by him to said company for the work, labor, and materials furnished by it in the construction of said building, "save and except the sum of $746.30, which sum constituted a fund in plaintiff's possession applicable to the payment pro tanto of said "final" judgments; that on December 4, 1918, in order to protect said building and property from an execution sale, plaintiff paid said judgments in full, amounting to $2,846.49, for which amount, and the said sum paid for the services of attorneys, less said $746.30, plaintiff asked judgment against the defendants.

The appellants did not demur to the complaint, but answered, admitting, either expressly or by failure to deny the same, all the allegations of the complaint, except the following: Denied that the building was completed in accordance with said contract, but alleged that it was completed by said company in accordance with and pursuant to a new and different contract with plaintiff; denied that there is anything due or owing on account of the payment of said judgment or on any other account; denied that said $746.30 constitutes a fund in plaintiff's possession for the purposes alleged in the complaint. The answer contains the further denial that the company completed the building "on the 18th day of September, 1916," which is, in effect, an admission that it was completed upon some other date.

When plaintiff rested, the appellants moved for a nonsuit upon the ground that the building was not completed in accordance with the contract for the faithful performance of which they became sureties, but in accordance with or pursuant to a new and different agreement made between the plaintiff and the Hansbrough-Johnson Company, which motion was denied, and we think properly so.

The court found upon all the issues raised by the answer as follows: That the building was completed on December 15, 1916, and "was not constructed or completed in accordance with or pursuant to a new contract with plaintiff, nor a contract different from the one of June 5, 1916, set forth in said complaint"; that there is due and owing from the defendants, J. H. McCallum and E. O. Benner, and each of them, on account of the payment of the judgments referred to in plaintiff's complaint, after crediting said sum of $746.30 thereon, a balance of $2,100.19 and interest. For these amounts, together with the said sum of $250, paid for attorney's fees, as alleged and not denied, judgment was ordered and entered in favor of plaintiff, in accordance with the findings and conclusions of law.

Defendants raise the point in this court, and for the first time, that the complaint fails to state a cause of action, in that it does not allege, either by setting forth the facts showing the same or in the manner permitted by the Code (section 457, Code Civ. Proc.), that plaintiff has duly kept and performed the covenants and stipulations of the building contract which by its terms are to be kept and performed by him, and which performance appellant claims must be established in order for plaintiff to successfully maintain the action.

[1] But in order to fasten prima facie liability upon the defendants' sureties under their bond, it was not essential for plaintiff to allege that he had performed the contract upon his part. Their undertaking was that Hansbrough-Johnson Company, not the plaintiff, would perform the agreement. Furthermore, they by the express terms of their bond agreed to pay all liens placed upon plaintiff's property arising from the performance of the work or the furnishing of materials in connection therewith, and it is the alleged breach of this condition that forms the foundation of the complaint, and which breach we think is sufficiently pleaded to state a cause of action. If plaintiff was guilty of any act which would release, in whole or in part, the appellants' obligation as sureties, it was an affirmative defense to be specially pleaded by them, which was not done.

[2] The answer wholly failed to plead any facts showing that the original contract had been modified in a material or in any respect. It did, however, attempt to allege a new contract, but was fatally defective in that regard. The averment that the building was erected "in accordance with and pursuant to a new and different contract or agreement with plaintiff," which is all the answer contains upon the subject, is not the statement of ultimate fact but of a conclusion of law. Moreover, if treated as an allegation of fact, there is no evidence to support it. If appellants claimed that a different contract had been entered into between plaintiff and their principal, they should have stated its covenants and conditions with sufficient particularity and detail to acquaint plaintiff with its terms, which we have seen they omitted to do. The contract is not pleaded either in the complaint or answer, nor do the findings set it out or state its effect, nor was there any defense pleaded based on premature payments, from which it follows that these questions were not in the case—they were not presented by the pleadings. In short, the appellants made no adequate attempt in their answer to bring themselves within the provisions of sections 2819 and 2840 of the Civil Code, or to show any exoneration by reason of the suspension or impairment of their remedies or rights against Hansbrough-Johnson Company, and their case cannot be "better proven than alleged."

[3] Appellants make the further contention that certain extra work claimed to have been performed by the Hansbrough-Johnson Company was not "added to the contract" in the method by it prescribed, and that such departure exonerated them, but the pleadings present no such issue, and, in any event, the claim is without merit. The contract provided that the owner or architect could request changes, alterations, or deviations in or omissions from the contract or plans or specifications, and that it should not render it void, and that the rule of practice to be observed in accomplishing such changes and modifications should be that they "be agreed upon and fixed in writing, signed by the owner and the contractor, prior to execution," which in some instances, as appellants claim, was not done here. The contract further declared that—

> "No such change or modification shall release or exonerate any surety or sureties upon any guaranty or bond given in connection with this contract."

The foregoing provisions could have been waived, as between the plaintiff and the Hansbrough-Johnson Company, which was the case where modifications were made without first agreeing upon them in writing; but they could not bind the appellants by such waiver without their consent, and the consent is found in the bond, and is as follows:

> "And their [sureties] written consent must be secured to any change or alterations made in the original drawings or specifications by the said obligee costing in excess [of] one thousand dollars, but any change in the original drawings or specifications involving decreased expenditure on the said contract or an increased expenditure therein of less than one thousand dollars, or not involving any change in cost, may be made without the consent of the sureties and shall not release the sureties from liability hereunder."

The case was tried and decided upon the pleadings as framed and the evidence supports the findings.

Judgment affirmed.

MOREY v. PALADINI. (S. F. 9114.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑648—Supreme Court properly permitted motion in lower court to secure relief from failure to notify clerk to prepare transcript.

Where on motion to dismiss an appeal it was shown that the clerk, without the notice required by Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, prepared the transcript, and the trial court approved the transcript with the qualification that no notice was given, it was proper for the Supreme Court, having acquired jurisdiction by the notice of appeal from the judgment which was duly given, to continue motion to dismiss, and permit appellant to apply to lower court for relief under section 473, on ground of mistake; and, on lower court granting the relief on affidavits filed, the motion to dismiss is properly denied.

2. Contracts 🔑138(1)—Void contract not basis of action.

A void contract, a contract against public policy or the mandate of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8820–8823, 8827–8830) may not be made the foundation of any action, either in law or equity.

3. Contracts 🔑138(6) — Court discovering fact of illegality, on own motion will instigate inquiry.

When the court discovers facts indicating the contract sued on is illegal, it will, of its own motion, instigate inquiry.

4. Monopolies 🔑17(1)—Contract to deliver lobster from Mexican waters, giving exclusive sale north of parallel 36 degrees, held in restraint of trade.

Contract to deliver lobster from April 2, 1917 to October 15, 1917, from Mexican waters at a time when under Pen. Code, § 628, no lobster could be taken in California waters, giving defendant exclusive sale north of parallel 36 degrees, held illegal, as violating the Sherman Anti-Trust Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8820–8823, 8827–8830) and Civ. Code, § 1673.

5. Monopolies 🔑12(1)—Agreement having direct effect on interstate commerce within Sherman Anti-Trust Law.

An agreement which has some direct or immediate effect on interstate commerce is within the inhibition of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8820–8823, 8827–8830), and it is not essential that the result should be a complete monopoly.

6. Monopolies 🔑12(1)—Contract in partial restraint of trade, where terms nonseverable, wholly void.

Civ. Code, § 1673, makes no exception in contracts only in partial restraint of trade, and a contract that secures defendant a monopoly in selected territory and nonseverable is wholly void.

7. Evidence 🔑437—Admissible to show contract was in restraint of trade.

In an action on contract to deliver lobster from foreign waters during the closed season in California, evidence that plaintiff had monopoly of the lobster business held admissible to show the contract one in restraint of trade, but not under the rule that ambiguities of the contracts could be explained by parol.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by J. Morey against A. Paladini. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

C. V. Riccardi and Hoefler, Cook & Snyder, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Wm. H. Chapman, of San Francisco, and Geo. T. Kerr, of Watsonville, for respondent.

WASTE, J. This action is one brought to recover damages for the breach of a contract. Plaintiff had judgment, and the defendant has appealed. After final judgment the trial court made an order relieving the defendant from his default and failure to file the notice and request for transcript required by the provisions of section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure. The respondent has appealed from that order, and has presented the questions thus raised in a motion to dismiss the appeal of the defendant.

[1] The facts germane to the preliminary motion and appeal are: Judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant on February 4, 1919. On February 10th the defendant filed his notice of intention to move for a new trial, which motion was made and denied on February 28th. The defendant gave notice of appeal from the judgment, which was filed March 6th. During the proceedings on motion for a new trial the court reporter had made and delivered to the defendant a transcript of the testimony in the case. Upon the denial of the motion the defendant handed back the transcript to the reporter, and orally requested him to also prepare the clerk's transcript, and to file both transcripts with the clerk of the superior court. This the reporter did, although no such written notice and request for such transcript had been given to him, or to the clerk, as required by the provisions of section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure. Thereafter, and on April 12th, the plaintiff moved the trial court for an order disapproving and declining to certify to the truth and correctness of the reporter's transcript, upon the ground that the defendant had failed to file with the clerk of the court any written request for the preparation of such transcript, as required by the above section of the Code. Upon the hearing of that motion, the trial court made an order refusing to certify to the reporter's transcript on said ground, but later, and on the 17th day of June, as appears from the transcript filed in this court upon the appeal from the judgment, the court did append to the transcript its certificate to the correctness of the same. In so doing it also found and certified that there had never been any request to cause said transcript to be prepared in conformity with the requirements of the Code. Thereupon the plaintiff moved the Supreme Court for an order dismissing the appeal, upon the ground that no notice requesting a transcript of the record, such as is required by section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure, had ever been given. Upon the hearing of the motion it was suggested by the Supreme Court that the defendant should apply to the superior court for relief, under the provisions of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and the motion to dismiss the appeal was continued to allow the defendant an opportunity to make such application. Thereafter the defendant filed in the superior court a notice of motion to be relieved from his failure to file the request for the transcript, accompanying his notice with affidavits intended to bring the matter within the provisions of said section 473. Upon the hearing of said motion the superior court made an order permitting the defendant to file the request for the transcription of the record, and relieved him from the effect of his failure to file the same at an earlier date upon the ground of mistake, inadvertence, surprise, and excusable neglect. A certified copy of the order was filed in the Supreme Court on September 3, 1919. The cause having been thereafter transferred to the District Court of Appeal for the First Appellate District, Division 1, for hearing and determination. That court first considered the question presented by the foregoing facts, and, speaking through Mr. Justice Richards, said:

> "It is conceded that the defendant's notice of appeal from the judgment herein was duly given, and that a timely and proper undertaking on appeal was duly filed. This being so, the Supreme Court thus acquired jurisdiction to hear and determine the appeal from the judgment. The preparation and filing of a proper record upon which said appeal should be heard was a matter of after consideration, and was one which in most cases still required action on the part of the trial court or of the judge thereof, notwithstanding the taking and perfection of the appeal. That portion of section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure which refers to the request of the appellant for the preparation and filing with the clerk of the trial court of the transcript has reference to such subsequent proceedings in the trial court as shall result in the preparation and proper certification of the transcript which is to be used upon the appeal, and hence all of these matters are matters entirely within the jurisdiction of the trial court, notwithstanding the taking of such appeal, and are not matters which affect the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court to hear and determine the appeal. This being so, we are of the opinion that when the motion to dismiss the appeal from the judgment in this case was presented to the Supreme Court, based as it was upon the ground that no such written request for a transcript as is required by the provisions of section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure had ever been filed with the clerk of the trial court, the suggestion of the Supreme Court that the appellant's remedy for such defect or default was by way of an application for relief made to the trial court was in all respects a proper and timely suggestion; and that the appellant in acting thereon was pursuing the only method which was open to him for remedying his defective record; and that the trial court, upon his motion for such relief under the provisions of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, had jurisdiction, upon a proper showing, to grant him such relief.
> "The showing which the defendant there made, supported as it was by affidavits was deemed sufficient by the trial court to entitle the defendant to the relief asked; and since the granting of such relief was within the powers of the trial court, and since its order made in that behalf enables this court to hear and dispose of the appeal from the judgment herein upon its merits, we shall not inquire too closely into the efficiency of the affidavits presented to the trial court upon the hearing of said motion. The record as thus finally made up, is sufficient in form to satisfy the requirements of the statute; and, this being so, we are of the opinion that the motion to dismiss the appeal from the judgment should be denied, and that the order of the trial court permitting the defendant to amend his record in the respect indicated should be affirmed. It is so ordered."

We approve and adopt the foregoing conclusion of the District Court of Appeal.

This brings us to a determination of the merits of the appeal from the judgment. The facts necessary to a complete understanding of that matter may also be gleaned from the clear and succinct statement of Mr. Justice Richards:

"The action was one brought to recover damages for the breach of a contract entered into between one W. E. Zander, plaintiff's assignor, and the defendant, by the terms of which said Zander agreed to deliver to the defendant, f. o. b. San Diego, live lobsters at 17 cents per pound, and boiled lobsters at 19 cents per pound, to the extent of five tons per week, from the date of said agreement, to wit, April 2, 1917, to October 15, 1917, to be paid for upon presentation of shipping receipts showing that the goods were received in good order by the transportation company. The agreement contained a clause to the effect that the defendant should have 'the exclusive right to sell these lobsters in California north of parallel 36 degrees north latitude, and in the states of Oregon, Washington and Nevada.' The defendant received certain shipments of these lobsters between April 2 and May 15, 1917, but on or about the latter date refused to order or receive or accept any further shipments of said lobsters or to further comply with his said agreement, to the plaintiff's damage, according to the averments of the complaint, in the sum of $5,579.41. The defendant in his answer, while admitting the making of said agreement, made certain denials as to his refusal to accept said lobsters under said agreement, and also as to the profit which would have accrued to the plaintiff or his assignor as a result of the keeping of said agreement. In addition to these denials the defendant filed an amendment to his answer, in which he affirmatively averred that at the time of entering into said contract the said W. E. Zander represented to defendant that he was the sole agent for a certain fisheries company at San Diego, Cal., of which said company one M. Kondo was the manager, and that said fisheries company would control the entire supply of lobsters which could be shipped into California from Mexican waters during the term of said contract, and that if said defendant would agree to take the number of tons of said lobsters per week from said Zander, during said time, the said Zander or the said fisheries company would supply no lobsters during said period to any other person or persons north of the thirty-sixth parallel, and that the defendant would have the exclusive right to sell such lobsters in the territory named in said contract north of said parallel of latitude. He further alleges that he relied upon said representations in entering into said contract, but that he at no time received or had the exclusive right to sell said lobsters north of said parallel, nor did the said Zander live up to or perform his part of the agreement in that regard, and for that reason said defendant refused to order or receive any lobsters from said Zander after the 15th day of May, 1917."

Upon the issues as thus made up the cause proceeded to trial, and upon such trial plaintiff's assignor, Zander, testified to an agreement between himself and the fisheries company represented by said Kondo, by which Zander was to receive the lobsters, which in turn he was to sell to the defendant. He testified also that so far as he, Kondo, and the fisheries company were concerned, it was understood that during the pendency of the contract Kondo would not ship lobsters into the territory, and consequently they did not, nor did either of them, sell or supply lobsters to any other person than said defendant for delivery or use north of the thirty-sixth parallel of latitude; that he deemed himself obligated not to sell lobsters to any other parties than the defendant in that territory. There was some testimony offered on behalf of the defendant to the effect that the fisheries company violated this understanding. Upon the submission of the cause findings were waived, and the court rendered judgment in plaintiff's favor for the sum of $4,500 and costs. From such judgment the defendant has prosecuted this appeal.

[2, 3] The appellant in his reply brief makes for the first time the contention that the contract, upon which the plaintiff seeks to recover, is illegal and void for the reason that it is such a contract in restraint of trade as would constitute a violation of the terms of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8820–8823, 8827–8830). The respondent objects to a consideration of the point upon the ground that objection comes too late. But a void contract, a contract against public policy or against the mandate of the statute, may not be made the foundation of any action, either in law or in equity. Santa Clara Mill & Lumber Co. v. Hayes, 76 Cal. 387–390, 18 Pac. 391, 9 Am. St. Rep. 211; Estate of Groome, 94 Cal. 69–72, 29 Pac. 487; Chateau v. Singla, 114 Cal. 91–94, 45 Pac. 1015, 33 L. R. A. 750, 55 Am. St. Rep. 63. As the appellant comes now into court pleading that he has violated the law, and is seeking relief based upon his own unlawful acts, respondent contends that the court should leave him where it finds him. But neither the silence nor the consent of the parties justifies the court in retaining jurisdiction of such an action. Ball v. Putnam, 123 Cal. 134–140, 55 Pac. 773. Any one sued upon a contract may set up a defense that it is a violation of an act of Congress, and if it is found to be so, that fact will constitute a good defense to the action. Bement v. National Harrow Co., 186 U. S. 70–88, 22 Sup. Ct. 747, 46 L. Ed. 1058. The burden ordinarily rests upon the party asserting the invalidity of the contract to show how and why it is unlawful (Harbison-Walker Co. v. Stanton, 227 Pa. 55–63, 75 Atl. 988), and, as a general rule, cases will not be reversed upon points which the respondent has not had an opportunity to discuss, but in cases of this kind it matters not that no objection is made by either party. When the court discovers a fact which indicates that the contract is illegal and ought not to be enforced, it will, of its own motion, instigate an inquiry in relation thereto. Kreamer v. Earl, 91 Cal. 112–118, 27 Pac. 735; Pac. Wharf & Storage Co. v. Dredging Co., 192 Pac. 847. In this case, however, appellant raised the objection as to the invalidity of the contract in his closing brief in the District Court of Appeal, and the point was discussed by both parties to the appeal in the petition and answer on application for hearing in this court.

[4] The contract entered into by the parties to this controversy is contained in two written documents reading as follows:

"San Francisco, April 2, 1917.

"A. Paladini, San Francisco, Cal.—Dear Sir: I agree to deliver to you f. o. b. "San Francisco, April 2, 1917.

"W. E. Zander, San Francisco, Cal.—Dear sir: I agree to take from you or your shipper at least four tons of lobsters a week from date to October 15, 1917, in lots of boiled and live lobsters as I shall require, at the price quoted to me in your letter of this date, and on the terms and conditions therein contained. I am to have the exclusive right to sell the lobsters in California north of parallel 36 degrees north latitude, and also in the states of Oregon, Washington and Nevada.

"Yours truly, A. Paladini."

During the year 1917 the defendant was engaged in the fish trade in San Francisco. Part of his business consisted in buying and selling lobsters. At that time, as now, under the fish and game laws of the state the months from March 1st to October 14th constituted a closed season during which no lobsters may be taken in California, or in waters lying south for a distance of 10 miles from the international boundary line between the United States and Mexico, extended westerly in the Pacific Ocean. Pen. Code, § 628. W. E. Zander, plaintiff's assignor, had contracts with fishing companies operating in Mexican water south of the prescribed boundary line. He entered into the foregoing contract with appellant, and supplied the lobsters under its terms until the latter part of May, or first part of June, when the appellant refused to accept any further shipments upon the ground that, according to Zander's testimony, the market was overstocked, and he could not sell them as fast as they were to be delivered under the contract. The evidence for the appellant was that he refused the shipments because Zander refused to stop the fisheries companies from selling lobsters to other persons in his exclusive territory.

Whatever may have been the reason for appellant refusing to go forward in the performance of the agreement, it seems to be conclusively established that in the inception of the transaction it was contemplated by the parties that the contract was one which would result in at least a partial restraint of trade. In that connection it appears that Zander obtained from the companies supplying him the exclusive right to sell lobsters in the northern two-thirds of California and in the states of Oregon, Washington, and Nevada. He testified that under his agreement with appellant he was obligated not to, and did not, sell any lobsters in that territory to any one else than the defendant, and that the fisheries company understood, and were bound by, his contract. The evidence for the appellant is to the same effect, but went further and tended to establish a breach of this agreement on the part of the fisheries companies. The plain terms of the contract itself confirm the intent of the parties to prevent either Zander or the parties supplying him from engaging in the business of selling lobsters to any one but appellant within the specified territory. There can be no escape from the conclusion that, underlying the agreement, and as part of the consideration for the contract, was the purpose of putting it into the power of the appellant to control the lobster market within the limits of the states mentioned, so far as lay within the power of Zander and the fisheries companies, by restraining themselves from exercising their own lawful business of supplying the market generally. The result would tend toward a monopoly of the trade in appellant and a restriction of the trade of the other parties to the contract. We think the contract is illegal, not only as being in violation of the federal statute (Sherman Anti-Trust Law), but also as being contrary to the provisions of our own Code section, which provides that every contract by which one is restrained from exercising a lawful profession, trade, or business of any kind, otherwise than relating to exceptions in favor of sales of good will and in favor of partnership arrangements, is to that extent void. Civ. Code, § 1673. This last objection to the contract was not raised by either party, but it suggests itself so logically in relation to the transaction that we have considered it in connection with the point raised by the appellant.

[5] The Sherman Anti-Trust Act, by the first section, declares that—

> "Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several states, or with foreign nations, is * * * illegal." 26 U. S. Stats. at Large, 209; Fed. Stats. Ann. vol. 7, p. 336; U. S. Comp. Stats. of 1918, Compact Ed. § 8820.

The act was passed for the purpose of protecting trade and commerce among the several states, or with foreign nations, from unlawful restraints and monopolies. An agreement which has some direct and immediate effect upon interstate commerce is within the inhibition of the statute. Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 221 U. S. 1–66, 31 Sup. Ct. 502, 55 L. Ed. 619, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 834, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 734. It is not essential that the result of the contract should be a complete monopoly in order to vitiate the agreement. It is sufficient if it really tends to that end and deprives the public of the advantages which flow from free competition. United States v. Knight Co., 156 U. S. 1–16, 15 Sup. Ct. 249, 39 L. Ed. 325. The effect of the contract at bar may be well understood in view of the fact that its duration was only for the closed season for lobsters in the state during which the supply for the trade must of necessity come from an outside source. It seems to us to be very plain that the agreement was intended to effect a virtual monopoly of the lobster trade in the central and northern portions of this state, and so far as shipments to Oregon, Washington, and Nevada were concerned. It was therefore within the provisions of the federal act. Addyston Pipe & Steel Co. v. United States, 175 U. S. 211–241, 20 Sup. Ct. 96, 44 L. Ed. 136. So far as our own statute is material, we think argument on the question is concluded by the decision of this court in Santa Clara Mill & Lumber Co. v. Hayes, 76 Cal. 387, 18 Pac. 391, 9 Am. St. Rep. 211, which approved and followed Arnot v. Pittston & Elmira Coal Co., 68 N. Y. 559, 23 Am. Rep. 190. The case had to do with a combination among manufacturers of lumber, limiting the amount to be manufactured, and giving the plaintiff in the action control of the supply for one year within certain territory. The action was one to recover damages for a breach of the agreement. The trial court gave judgment for the defendants. In affirming the judgment this court said:

> "Plaintiff had an undoubted right to purchase any or all of the lumber it chose, and to sell at such prices and places as it saw fit, but when as a condition of purchase it bound its vendor not to sell to others under a penalty, it transcended a rule the adoption of which has been dictated by the experience and wisdom of ages as essential to the best interests of the community, and as necessary to the protection alike of individuals and legitimate trade.
> "With the results naturally flowing from the laws of demand and supply the courts have nothing to do, but when agreements are resorted to for the purpose of taking trade out of the realm of competition, and thereby enhancing or depressing prices of commodities, the courts cannot be successfully invoked, and their execution will be left to the volition of the parties thereto."

[6] The desire and the intention of the parties to secure to defendant, so far as possible, a monopoly of the lobster business in the selected territory, and the consequent covenant in restraint of the trade, entered so fundamentally into the inception and consideration for the transaction as to render the terms of the contract nonseverable, and it is wholly void. Santa Clara Mill & Lumber Co. v. Hayes, supra, p. 393; Arnot v. Pittston and Elmira Coal Co., supra; Prost v. More, 40 Cal. 347. Whether or not the defendant obtained what he sought, an entire monopoly of the trade, is immaterial. The statute (Civ. Code § 1673) makes no exception in favor of contracts only in partial restraint of trade. Chamberlain v. Augustine, 172 Cal. 285–288, 156 Pac. 479. That the covenants of the contract are illegal as being in restraint of trade, and against the express mandate of the law of the United States and of this state, we entertain no doubt. Getz Bros. & Co. v. Federal Salt Co., 147 Cal. 115–118, 81 Pac. 416, 109 Am. St. Rep. 114.

[7] The appellant offered to show by parol testimony that, under the terms of the contract, it was meant by the parties to the agreement and was intended that he should have the exclusive right to sell lobsters within the restricted territory; that at the time the contract was made Zander represented to him that the M. Kondo Fisheries Company and M. Kondo would control the entire supply of lobsters which could be shipped into California from Mexican waters, thus assuring appellant the exclusive control and a monopoly of the lobster trade on the Pacific Coast. The court excluded the evidence. Appellant now contends that it was admissible upon the ground: First, under the general rules that ambiguities in written contracts may be explained by parol; and, second, to show that the contract was illegal as being one in restraint of trade. As to the first of these grounds, the only one assigned in the trial court, we think the evidence was properly excluded. On this point the District Court of Appeal correctly held that—

> The "only exclusive right which the defendant obtained under the terms of this contract was one which was exclusive only so far as it bound the other party to the contract, and possibly also the fisheries company, not to ship or sell lobsters in said territory in competition with the defendant; and, as we have seen, the evidence showed that the contract was kept by the plaintiff's assignor in this regard. The contention of the appellant that the seller of the product bound himself and the company from which he purchased said lobsters to see to it that no other persons whatever shipped or sold lobsters within the specified territory in competition with the appellant would be a strained construction, to which the language of said contract taken in its ordinary signification is not susceptible; and the trial court, therefore, committed no error in refusing to the defendant the right to introduce oral evidence which would have the effect of varying and contradicting the terms of the written agreement."

On the second ground suggested, however, for the first time on this appeal, the evidence was admissible in support of appellant's offer to show that the contract was one in restraint of trade. Buffendeau v. Brooks, 28 Cal. 642; Benicia Agricultural Works v. Estes, 3 Cal. Unrep. Cas. 855, 32 Pac. 938, 940; Daw v. Niles, 104 Cal. 106–118, 37 Pac. 876; McMullen v. Hoffman, 174 U. S. 639, 19 Sup. Ct. 839, 43 L. Ed. 1117. The rule is thus stated in Williston on Contracts, vol. 3, § 1753, p. 3060:

> "Parol evidence is always competent to show that a written contract, though lawful on its face, was illegal or part of an illegal transaction; and illegality, if serious, need not be pleaded or urged to enable the court to act upon it."

The evidence was not offered for that purpose, and the lower court did not have the point in mind when ruling on its admissibility. Consequently we would not be justified in reversing the judgment on this ground alone, for, as already pointed out, sufficient evidence was presented to show the nature of the contract. The additional testimony offered would merely serve to emphasize the point.

The appellant contends that there is no testimony as to the market value of the lobsters at the time of delivery at San Diego under the contract, and that therefore the evidence is insufficient to support the judgment fixing the amount of damages suffered by the plaintiff. The respondent's first reply to the contention is that the denials in that respect, contained in the answer, are framed in the objectionable form of the negative pregnant which raised no issue. Assuming that to be so, the cause proceeded to trial upon the theory that the issue had been properly tendered, and respondent's objection should not now be considered. The contract called for delivery f. o. b. San Diego. Considerable evidence was presented by the plaintiff as to the cost of lobsters to him during the time the contract was being performed by the appellant, and as to what would have been their cost during the entire term of the agreement had the appellant on his part continued to perform. No objection was offered to this testimony. Under section 3311 of the Civil Code the measure of damages suffered by the respondent was "the excess, if any, of the amount due from the buyer, under the contract, over the value to the seller," and it has been decided by this court that under similar circumstances the value to the plaintiff for the purpose of fulfilling his agreement to sell personal property would be, prima facie, the cost thereof to him. Thompson v. Hamilton Motor Co., 170 Cal. 737–739, 151 Pac. 122, Ann. Cas. 1917A, 677.

The judgment is reversed.

HOUGHTON v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR ALAMEDA COUNTY et al. (S. F. 9951.)

Continuance ⚷10—Court may properly continue action pending appeal from judgment pleaded as set-off.

Where the trial of an action involves a consideration of a previous judgment rendered between the parties to the action, which, if final, would be res judicata on some or all of the issues involved in the trial, the trial court, in the exercise of a sound discretion, may continue the trial of the case until a final adjudication of the matter in the other action; and court did not abuse its discretion in granting a continuance in an action on a promissory note, where defendant, by way of set-off, pleaded a joint judgment against the plaintiff in favor of the defendant and a third person for an amount greatly in excess of the balance unpaid on the note, to await the outcome of an appeal from such judgment.

In Bank.

Application by C. S. Houghton for writ of mandate to be directed to the Superior Court in and for the county of Alameda, and Dudley Kinsell, Judge thereof, to require the latter to proceed with the trial of a certain action. Writ denied.

Courtney L. Moore, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Fitzgerald, Abbott & Beardsley, of Oakland, for respondents.

WILBUR, J. The petitioner seeks a writ of mandamus to require the respondent Dudley Kinsell, judge of the superior court, to proceed with the trial of an action entitled C. S. Houghton v. Franklin A. Kales. That action is one to recover $2,538.60, the balance due upon a promissory note of F. A. Kales for $3,538.60. The defendant Kales, by way of set-off, pleads a joint judgment in favor of F. A. Kales and Jasper S. Connell for $36,230.59, upon which $8,039.38 has been paid. The case came on for trial March 9, 1921. Thereupon counsel announced that they were ready to proceed.

Upon the trial it was stipulated that no part of the promissory note sued upon by the plaintiff had been paid except the sum of $1,000. This stipulation, in the absence of any set-off, would entitle the plaintiff to a judgment for the full amount claimed. Thereupon the defendant offered in evidence the judgment pleaded as a set-off. Plaintiff objected to the introduction of this judgment on the ground that it was not a final judgment, and the court sustained said objection on the ground that an appeal from said judgment was then pending and undetermined. Thereupon the defendant moved for a continuance of the trial, pending the final decision of the case on appeal, upon the ground that the judgment pleaded as a set-off is not final because an appeal is pending therefrom and because the plaintiff objects to the introduction of the judgment or the consideration of it as a set-off while the appeal is pending. The plaintiff objected to the continuance upon the ground that at the time of the filing of the action and at the time of the trial the defendant had no defense and that the court is without jurisdiction to grant the continuance. The lower court thereupon granted the motion and continued the trial until June 6, 1921, at 10 o'clock a. m. On June 6, 1921, and thereafter from time to time, the trial has been continued, over the objection of the plaintiff, pending the determination of the appeal.

The petitioner therefore seeks a writ of mandate to compel the trial court to proceed with the trial and thus enable him to secure a judgment for $2,538.60, together with interest at 6 per cent. from June 21, 1916, against the defendant, who holds a judgment for nearly ten times that much against him. It is obvious that the action of the trial court was in furtherance of justice and the proper exercise of discretion, if authorized by law. The action of the trial court is amply sustained by authority. In the case of Smith v. Jones, 128 Cal. 14, 60 Pac. 466, a petition for writ of mandamus was sought in this court to compel a judge of the superior court to render judgment in an ejectment suit. The defendant in that case pleaded the rendition of a prior judgment between the same parties wherein said defendant was adjudged the owner of the premises; that an appeal had been taken from the judgment and remained undetermined. Upon the trial of that action plaintiffs had offered evidence in support of their complaint and demanded judgment according to the prayer of their complaint, but the defendant asked that the cause be stayed until the judgment pleaded in his answer should become final. The motion was granted, the submission of the case set aside, and all proceedings stayed until the further order of the court. In determining the matter this court in bank said:

> "The jurisdiction of the trial court in a case like the one recited is unquestioned, and the power of the court in a proper case to set aside a submission and postpone final determination is also unquestioned. Many cases may be supposed wherein it would not only be the right of the judge to do so, but it would be his duty in the interest of justice and to promote the substantial rights of the parties. To justify this court in interfering with and controlling the action of the trial courts in proceedings of this nature, it would require a clear showing that the act complained of was an abuse of discretion. In this case no such showing has been made; on the contrary, from an inspection of the petition and the return thereto, it would appear that the order of the court complained of, under the circumstances, was one very proper to be made."

In the case of Brown v. Campbell, 100 Cal. 635, 35 Pac. 433, 38 Am. St. Rep. 314, the court in bank had under consideration an action to recover from trustees a surplus in the hands of such trustees derived from the sale of certain real property and being the balance due after satisfying the indebtedness for which the trust deed was given. The amount was claimed both by plaintiff, the record owner of the property, and by one Priest, who based his claim upon a judgment in an attachment suit against Joseph Brown and the claim that the conveyance from Joseph Brown to A. M. Brown, the plaintiff, of the attached property was in fraud of creditors. Plaintiff, A. M. Brown, pleaded in bar of the right of the defendant Priest a judgment rendered November 24, 1888, in an action wherein Priest was plaintiff and Brown defendant, wherein it was adjudged that the conveyance made by Joseph Brown to A. M. Brown was not made with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors. The defendant pleaded the pendency of that action in abatement. The latter plea was stricken out on plaintiff's motion.

In ruling on the questions thus presented, the court in bank stated:

> "That judgment was not a bar to the matters alleged in the defendant's answer as a defense, nor to the same matters set out in the cross-complaint, and upon which he demanded the relief given him by the court below. It had not become final when the cross-complaint was filed, nor yet when the action was tried, and the doctrine of res adjudicata only applies to final judgments. The time to appeal from the judgment of November 24, 1888, had not expired when the cross-complaint was filed, and, although no appeal had been taken therefrom the action was still pending within the legal meaning of that term (Code Civ. Proc. § 1049), and the judgment was not a bar to a retrial of the matters alleged in the cross-complaint, under the rule announced by this court in Harris v. Barnhart, 97 Cal. 546; Naftzger v. Gregg, 99 Cal. 83; Estate of Blythe, 99 Cal. 472.

"But, while the judgment in Priest v. Brown et al. was not, for the reason stated, a bar to the cause of action alleged in the cross-complaint, still the pendency of that action would have been good ground for the continuance of this until the final determination of the former action, or would have been a sufficient basis for an order dismissing the present action upon motion of the plaintiff, notwithstanding the affirmative relief demanded by the defendant Priest in his cross-complaint, and the refusal of the court to have granted either of such motions would, perhaps, have been erroneous; but no such motion was made by the plaintiff, and the trial proceeded without objection, the plaintiff still insisting upon the judgment in Priest v. Brown et al. as an estoppel, and as ground for a judgment in his favor. Under these circumstances we cannot say that the court erred in proceeding to the trial, although it might well have continued the case of its own motion until the final determination of the former action."

It will be observed that the judgment in the former action was pleaded by one side as a bar and by the other in abatement. The court proceeded to render final judgment in favor of Priest, who had pleaded the judgment in abatement; consequently the failure to abate the action on his plea was not prejudicial to him, so that the question considered on appeal was the duty of the trial court with reference to the plea of the judgment in bar, and it is suggested that, although the plaintiff did not request a continuance, the court might well have continued the case of its own motion. The same day that the Supreme Court affirmed the judgment in Brown v. Campbell, it also affirmed the judgment in Priest v. Brown, 100 Cal. 626, 35 Pac. 323; thus, in one day affirming a judgment holding that a conveyance from A. M. Brown to Joseph Brown was fraudulent and void (Brown v. Campbell, supra), and a judgment that it was valid (Priest v. Brown, supra). Upon the going down of the remittiturs in these two cases, Brown moved for an order setting aside the judgment and granting a perpetual stay of execution upon the theory that the first judgment rendered, that in the case of Priest v. Brown, supra, should control. The Supreme Court, in department 1, in passing upon this claim (Brown v. Campbell, 110 Cal. 644, 43 Pac. 12), held that because of the failure of the plaintiff Brown to secure a continuance of the case of Brown v. Campbell, supra, and because of preventing Priest from securing a judgment in abatement by having that defense stricken out of his answer, he could not have the relief asked, but was bound by the judgment in Brown v. Campbell, supra.

From the foregoing decisions it is clear that a judgment which would be res adjudicata of matters involved in an action may be availed of during the pendency of an appeal from such judgment, either by a plea in abatement upon proof of which a judgment may be rendered that the action abate (Connor v. Bank of Bakersfield, 174 Cal. 400, 163 Pac. 353), or by a continuance of a second action until the result of the appeal has been determined (Brown v. Campbell, supra, and Smith v. Jones, supra).

The petitioner here relies upon the case of Dunphy v. Belden, 57 Cal. 427. In that case a writ of mandamus was sought to compel the trial of the issues in a case then pending in the superior court. The court there said:

"* * * It appears that the issues awaiting trial in the court below have been formed in a new and independent action, to the complaint in which a plea of the pendency of another actioin has been interposed. It will be observed that it is no part of our duty now to decide whether or not the plea is maintainable."

Upon the authority of Avery v. Superior Court, 57 Cal. 247, it was held that the trial court had no power or discretion to refuse to try the action until the conclusion of the action pending. Justices Thornton and Morrison dissented, saying:

"Certainly the court below is invested with the discretion to postpone the trial of the cause last named until the former appeal is determined in this court, thus saving expense to the parties. If the party appealing should fail to bring on the hearing on this appeal within a reasonable time, the court would and should proceed to hear the cause, and no doubt would do so. The order of the court below merely postpones the hearing of the cause, but it is in the power of the court to order a trial at any time, and no doubt it would do so on a showing of facts indicating such a course to be proper."

It thus appears that the court was divided as to whether it was the duty of the trial court to proceed and determine the plea in abatement, as held by the majority, or whether the case might be continued until the determination of the action thus pleaded in abatement, as held by the minority. The decision of the majority of the court in Dunphy v. Belden, supra, is in effect overruled by the case of Smith v. Jones, supra, decided by the court in bank in March, 1900, for there the action of the trial court in continuing the case rather than rendering a judgment of abatement was approved and a writ of mandamus refused. In any event, we now expressly overrule the case of Dunphy v. Belden, supra, and hold that, where the trial of an action involves the consideration of a previous judgment rendered between the parties to the action, which, if final, would be res adjudicata on some or all of the issues involved in the trial, the trial court, in the exercise of a sound discretion, may continue the trial of the case until the final adjudication of the matter in the other action. It follows that the respondent in this case was justified in its order postponing the trial of the action of Houghton v. Kales until the determination of the former action on appeal, for if the judgment in the former action is affirmed on appeal and is a proper set-off, it would follow that the plaintiff is not entitled to the judgment which he seeks to secure by forcing this action to judgment before that appeal can be determined.

Writ denied.

We concur: SHAW, C. J.; WASTE, J.; LENNON, J.; RICHARDS, Justice pro tem.

SLOANE, J. I concur in the decision, although I am of the opinion that the trial court was in error in excluding the judgment pleaded by defendant as a set-off and should have admitted it in evidence and proceeded with the trial, since although an appeal had been taken from the judgment, no stay bond had been filed, and, under section 942 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the judgment continued in effect for all purposes of its enforcement, and defendant had a right to use it as a set-off against the plaintiff's claim. Dowdell v. Carpy, 137 Cal. 333, 70 Pac. 167; Sewell v. Price, 164 Cal. 265, 128 Pac. 407. However, as it was excluded from evidence upon petitioner's objection that it had not become final, he is not in a position to protest a postponement of the trial to await the determination of the appeal.

BISINGER v. SACRAMENTO LODGE NO. 6, B. P. O. E. (Sac. 3173.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑1170(1)—Elevator operator, allowing injury to occupant, being negligent as matter of law, reversal not permitted for minor errors.

Where a woman tenant, after going to basement to ascertain why water would not run, rang for elevator and on entering it fell, whereby one leg was crushed between cab and floor above on the operator starting the car, evidence held to disclose such negligence as rendered defendant liable as a matter of law, whatever the relation of the parties, and the case to be within Const. art. 6, § 4½, forbidding reversal for errors in charge; evidence, pleading, or procedure not resulting in miscarriage of justice.

2. Landlord and tenant 🔑169(11)—Evidence held to show that contributory negligence in stumbling in elevator cab was not proximate cause of injury, and was properly withdrawn from jury.

In a tenant's action against her landlord for injuries sustained in an elevator, through her leg being crushed between the car and the floor above after she had stumbled and fallen to the floor of the cab, where the fall of plaintiff was not as a matter of law the proximate cause of the injury, withdrawal of the issue of contributory negligence from the jury was not error.

3. Damages 🔑132(6) — $28,191.91 held not excessive for injury to leg.

Where a woman sustained a fracture of the left leg and also an injury in the right foot through being crushed between an elevator cab and the floor of defendant's building, so that after two years she was still able to get about only by the use of a wheel chair, and it was agreed that her injuries were total and to some extent permanent, a verdict of $39,975, reduced to $28,191.91 held not excessive.

4. Trial 🔑112—Allowing plaintiff to address jury after waiver of argument by defendant held not error.

Where in a personal injury action it was stipulated that the parties should have an hour each in which to present their case to the jury, and where plaintiff had consumed one-half hour in opening, and defendant thereafter waived argument, it was within the discretion of the court to allow plaintiff the remaining half hour in which to address the jury, the court having offered to allow defendant to withdraw its waiver.

5. Evidence 🔑5(2)—Judicial notice not taken that story of person injured was false as involving a physical impossibility.

Where a tenant in defendant's building was injured by having her leg caught between the floor of an elevator cab and the floor above, and claimed that the elevator made several trips up and down, crushing her leg between the car and the floors each time, the court could not take judicial notice that her testimony was false, because the space between the cab and the wall of the shaft was insufficient, and that therefore her story involved a physical impossibility.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

Action by Bessie Bisinger against Sacramento Lodge No. 6, Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, to recover for personal injuries. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Irving D. Gibson and J. W. S. Butler, both of Sacramento, for appellant.

William A. Gett and O. F. Meldon, both of Sacramento, for respondent.

WILBUR, J. The facts are thus stated by the appellant:

"This is an appeal of defendant, Sacramento Lodge No. 6, Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, from a judgment upon a verdict in favor of plaintiff for damages for personal injuries sustained by her on June 22, 1918, while attempting to enter an elevator in the basement of defendant's building in Sacramento, and alleged to have been received through the negligence of an elevator operator employed by defendant. A jury returned a verdict for $39,975, but afterward, upon an order of the trial court that unless the sum of $11,783.09 be remitted from the judgment, a new trial would be granted on the sole ground that the verdict was excessive, plaintiff by stipulation remitted that amount. As reduced by stipulation the actual amount of the judgment, from which this appeal was taken, is therefore $28,191.91.

"Statement of Facts.

"At the time of her injury plaintiff was a tenant of 24 rooms on the third and fourth floors of a building owned by defendant and known as the Elks' Building. Plaintiff had become such tenant by assignment of a written lease made by defendant to one Mrs. M. Brown on May 31, 1911. The term of the lease had expired prior to plaintiff's injury, but plaintiff continued to hold over, and occupied the premises under the same tenancy, and was in such occupancy at the time of her injury.

"Defendant gave its written consent to the assignment of the lease to plaintiff and coincidentally with the assignment of the lease, on January 6, 1915, Mrs. Brown, the predecessor of plaintiff, executed to her a bill of sale of 'all the furniture and household goods contained in those twenty-four (24) rooms and halls connected therewith' described in the original lease. The bill of sale makes reference to the lease 'for the purpose of description and location of the rooms and building where the said furniture and household goods are situated.' Afterward, on February 24, 1916, plaintiff also executed to defendant, as security for her performance of the lease, a chattel mortgage embracing 'all of the upholstery, furniture and household goods,' etc., contained in the 24 rooms on the third and fourth floors of defendant's building, 'during the continuance of that certain lease agreement * * * for those certain premises consisting of the 24 rooms on the third and fourth floors of the said Elks' Building, which is hereinbefore particularly described. * * *'

"The building in which plaintiff was tenant and where she was injured consists of four floors and a basement, or, including the roof, a portion of which is used by defendant for its own purposes, five floors. An ordinary passenger elevator and shaft runs from the basement to the roof. The first or ground floor is occupied by stores and the lobby or entrance to the upper floors. The lodge and clubrooms of defendant occupy the whole of the second floor. The third and fourth floors consist of offices and rooms rented to various tenants, including plaintiff. Practically the only use of the elevator is to carry persons from the entrance or lobby of the building on the first or ground floor to the upper floors. The elevator, however, can be taken to the basement floor of the building. There is a light well in the center of the building over a part of the rooms on the fourth floor included in plaintiff's tenancy.

"Plaintiff was injured about 7 o'clock in the evening, as she was attempting to enter the elevator from the basement floor, after she had gone to the basement of her own accord and for her own purpose to satisfy her curiosity as to the reason that water would not run on the roof. Plaintiff testified that her maid had previously gone up on the roof to sprinkle the roof and the light well from a hose attached to a faucet on the roof, for the purpose of cooling the rooms occupied by her tenants on the fourth floor. Having been informed by the maid that the water would not run from the hose, plaintiff telephoned to one Ward, defendant's janitor, who was then alone in the clubroom of defendant on the second floor, concerning the failure of the water to run on the roof, and asked him to see to it. Ward responded that he could not do so just at that time, as he was alone, but that he would see to it later, as soon as some one came to relieve him. Plaintiff then asked Ward the location of the faucet or valve in the basement connected with the water pipe that ran to the roof, and went herself to the basement in the elevator, examined the faucet, and in attempting to enter the elevator from the basement on her return tripped on the edge of the floor of the elevator, fell and was injured, plaintiff alleges, through the negligence of the elevator operator.

"According to the testimony of her surgeon, plaintiff sustained a severe crush of the left leg, above the ankle, with a compound fracture of the tibia."

The respondent, in stating the facts, adds the following:

"In order to reach the basement, respondent signaled for the elevator, and was carried therein to the basement floor; the elevator being at the time under the control of, and operated by, an employee of appellant. After respondent had completed her mission she returned to the point where the elevator could be taken on return to her own apartments in the building on the fourth floor thereof. The usual means of ingress and egress to and from the elevator, and device for signaling the elevator, were provided for at the basement floor.

"Respondent signaled for the elevator; in other words, respondent rang the bell provided for the purpose, in response to which the elevator was brought to the basement. The operator stopped the elevator some distance above the floor, and then, after lowering it some more, opened the door for respondent to enter. According to plaintiff's version of what then happened, the operator, just as respondent stepped into the elevator, started it suddenly upwards, throwing respondent off her balance and causing her to fall upon the floor of the elevator with her left foot extending beyond the edge of the elevator floor. The elevator continuing in its ascent, respondent's left foot was caught between the floor of the elevator and the casing of the first floor of the building, crushing and breaking the tibia and fibula of respondent's left leg just above the ankle. The operator then ran the elevator up to the fourth floor and back to the basement several times, the respondent still lying upon the floor, unable to rise, suffering intense pain and her foot hanging by the skin and stretched tendons under the floor of the elevator. Upon one of these obviously needless and uncalled for passages of the elevator up and down the elevator shaft, respondent, in her agony, changed her position, and her right foot was also caught, as the left had been, and the toes thereof were crushed and broken."

The only dispute in the testimony is as to the manner in which plaintiff was thrown to the floor. Plaintiff testified that after she entered the elevator it started with a sudden jerk, which threw her to the floor in a sitting posture, with her left foot extending beyond the edge of the elevator. The elevator man, J. W. Allen, testified that he had stopped the elevator slightly above the basement floor, and that plaintiff started to step in the elevator just as he started to lower, and that plaintiff caught her foot under the elevator floor and stumbled into the elevator with her foot extending beyond the edge; that he saw her lying on the floor of the elevator with her foot extending beyond the edge of the elevator. The testimony of the elevator man was given by deposition, and, acting under the instruction of defendant's counsel, he refused to answer all questions as to what occurred thereafter. The only evidence as to what occurred in the elevator after she was on the floor with her foot extending over the edge of the elevator is that of the plaintiff, who testified as above stated, and that, after her leg was broken, the operator continued up to the fourth floor and returned to the basement, went from the basement to the third floor and back and from the basement to the second floor twice, and then finally stopped the elevator while it was between the first and second floors. According to plaintiff's testimony, each time they passed a floor her leg was struck in such fashion that she suffered great agony. This occurred about 23 times. During this entire period she was crying in agony and begging and beseeching the operator to stop the elevator.

[1] We have stated the facts somewhat fully because of the constitutional provision which prohibits us from reversing the case unless there has been a miscarriage of justice. In view of the fact that it can be said as a matter of law from these facts that the elevator operator was guilty of negligence, and that the defendant was liable for such negligence, whatever her relation to the defendant may have been, many questions raised by the defendant and appellant are immaterial. The appellant claims that the complaint does not state a cause of action because it does not allege the relation of passenger and carrier; that the court erred in denying defendant's motion for a nonsuit; that plaintiff had no right by virtue of her tenancy to go to or from the basement in the elevator; that plaintiff's failure to show she was a "passenger" is fatal to her cause of action; that plaintiff was a trespasser, and only entitled not to be wantonly injured; that plaintiff failed to show permission to use the elevator; that the instructions that plaintiff was a "passenger" and entitled to the highest degree of care were erroneous; that the use of the basement by consent or acquiescence made plaintiff a licensee only; that if plaintiff was not a trespasser she was a mere licensee, and defendant was required to use only ordinary care toward her; that the defendant owed only ordinary care for the further reason that it was a carrier without reward; that the issue as to plaintiff's right to be in the elevator was withdrawn from the jury by the instructions; that whether plaintiff was a passenger was a question of fact for a jury, and was made an issue by the pleadings; that the court erroneously refused to instruct that unless plaintiff's right to be in the basement was shown she could not recover; that the jury were erroneously instructed that plaintiff could recover even if guilty of contributory negligence; that the attempted instructions as to last clear chance failed to embrace all the elements, and were erroneous; that the last clear chance rule was not applicable to complaint or evidence; that the instruction as to measure of damages was erroneous; that the court erred in admitting evidence of statements by plaintiff's predecessor and of conversations between plaintiff's predecessor and the janitor of defendant; that the court erred in permitting plaintiff to testify as to the present use of the basement and elevator; that the court erred in permitting a former janitor of defendant to testify concerning the use of the basement; that the court erred in refusing to permit the secretary of defendant to be asked whether plaintiff had any permission to go to the basement to attend to the water supply; that it was error to admit evidence of loss of profits from farming certain lands; that the court erred in stating that it would instruct the jury as to facts proven; and that it was reversible error to permit plaintiff's counsel to make a second argument to the jury after defendant had waived its argument.

In view of the constitutional rule (art. 6, sec. 4½) that "no judgment shall be set aside, or new trial granted, in any case, on the ground of misdirection of the jury, or of the improper admission or rejection of evidence, or for any error as to any matter of pleading, or for any error as to any matter of procedure, unless, after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice," the case cannot be reversed for these reasons.

All the errors complained of relate to the right of the plaintiff to recover for the injury which she suffered, and, in view of the fact that she was invited to enter the elevator and accepted the invitation to enter therein and was thereafter injured by the negligent management of the elevator by the employee of the defendant, who knew that she was lying helplessly in a position which must necessarily have resulted in her injury if the elevator was moved before she had an opportunity to withdraw her foot from a position of danger, it is unnecessary to consider in detail the points made by the defendant, for it is clear that there has been no miscarriage of justice in holding the defendant liable for plaintiff's injuries.

[2] The defendant claims that certain instructions given by the court to the jury withdrew the defense of contributory negligence from their consideration. Defendant had pleaded that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in that she entered the elevator while it was in motion. The only evidence in that regard is the evidence of the elevator man that he had stopped the elevator a short distance above the floor of the basement, and that just as she was stepping in he lowered the elevator and her foot caught under the floor of the elevator, so that she stumbled into the elevator. Assuming that this evidence is true, neither her entry into the elevator while it was in motion, if it was, nor her fall, was the proximate cause of the injury. The injury was caused by plaintiff's leg coming in contact with the floors of the building above the point where she stumbled, and resulted, not from the descent of the elevator at the time she stumbled, but the ascending of the elevator after she was lying upon the floor of the elevator. It can be said as a matter of law that the fall of the plaintiff into the elevator was not the proximate cause of the injury. Therefore, even if the instructions complained of had the effect asserted by counsel of withdrawing the issue of contributory negligence from the jury, they were not erroneous.

The other questions raised by the appellant relate to the measure and amount of damages.

At the time of the trial, more than two years after the time of the accident, the plaintiff was still able to get about only by the use of a wheel chair. She was unable to bear her weight upon her left leg, and suffered some pain when she bore her weight upon her right leg. The physicians who testified in the case agreed that for the time being that her injuries were total, and were to some extent permanent. The witnesses agreed that, in the absence of an operation to correct the disability, she would not be able to put her left heel to the floor. The physician called by the defendant testified that, while she would suffer some permanent limitation of the functions of the left foot and ankle, such defects could be so far cured by an operation that the total disability of the left leg would be less than 10 per cent.—that is to say, she would ultimately recover more than 90 per cent. of the function of the limb. On the other hand, the plaintiff's physician testified that the limb was permanently injured and it was impossible to tell how long it would be before she would be able to walk upon the limb, but that she might at some time be able to walk with the aid of a cane. The jury were at liberty to accept the testimony most favorable to the plaintiff, and evidently did so.

[3] It is claimed that the judgment is excessive. The rule on that subject on appeal is thus stated in Hale v. San Bernardino, etc., Co., 156 Cal. 713, 715, 106 Pac. 83, 84:

> "The amount of damages in such cases is committed first to the sound discretion of the jury, and next to the discretion of the judge of the trial court, who, in ruling upon the motion for new trial, may consider the evidence anew, determine anew the facts, and set aside the verdict if it is not just. Upon appeal, the decision of the trial court and jury on the subject cannot be set aside unless the verdict is 'so plainly and outrageously excessive as to suggest, at the first blush, passion or prejudice or corruption on the part of the jury.'"

We cannot say that the verdict is excessive as a matter of law.

[4] It had been stipulated that both parties could have an hour in which to present their case to the jury. After plaintiff had closed its opening argument, the defendant waived its argument, and the court permitted the plaintiff to further argue to the jury. This is claimed to be error. The plaintiff had evidently planned to have Mr. Meldon open and Mr. Gett close the argument, each to take one-half hour, and was undoubtedly surprised by the defendant waiving argument. The plaintiff thereupon requested that William A. Gett be permitted to address the jury for one-half hour. The court thereupon stated that he would grant the request, and offered to allow the defendant to withdraw its waiver of argument and to proceed with its argument for one hour, in accordance with the stipulation, if defendant desired to do so. After consultation, defendant's counsel declined to argue the case, contenting themselves with an objection to the plaintiff's further argument. The court, over defendant's objection, thereupon permitted plaintiff's counsel to argue the case further to the jury. If, after stipulating that each side should have an hour for argument before the jury, the defendant, without previous notice to the plaintiff, waives argument, and thus takes the plaintiff by surprise, the court, in the exercise of a sound discretion, should allow the plaintiff whatever argument to the jury is necessary in order to overcome the effect of the surprise. And, similarly, should allow the defendant whatever argument was necessary in order to prevent any prejudicial result flowing from the fact that it waived argument before it knew that the court would permit further argument by plaintiff. This was done in this case. The ruling of the court was not erroneous, but proper.

[5] In the appellant's reply brief we are asked to take judicial notice that an elevator is fitted so closely into the shaft as to leave practically no space between the edge of the floor and the wall of the shaft, and that it was a physical impossibility to run the elevator to the top story and back again, as described by plaintiff, because there was barely room enough for clearance of the elevator itself. Appellant states:

> "Plaintiff's recital of the accident was manifestly not only grossly exaggerated, but actually untrue, as it is clear that her injury must have occurred through her limb striking the ceiling of the basement. These embellishments were obviously added by her for the purpose of arousing the prejudice and sympathy of the jury."

As no punitive damages were asked or allowed, the question of how many times the elevator was moved up and down is immaterial except as it indicates the amount of suffering inflicted upon the plaintiff and the degree of negligence of the elevator man, and the truth or falsity of the plaintiff's testimony was to be determined by the jury. We cannot take judicial notice that it was false.

Judgment affirmed.

MILLER et ux. v. FERGUSON et al.
(Civ. 4047.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 2, 1921.)

1. Fraud 🔑44 — Complaint by husband and wife for deceit held not to charge duress in procuring her signature.

In an action by a husband and wife for damages for deceit in an exchange of land, a complaint which does not allege that she was confined by anybody is insufficient to show that she signed the contract under duress as defined by Civ. Code, § 1569, subd. 3.

2. Fraud 🔑44—Complaint held not to allege undue influence in procuring wife's signature.

In an action by a husband and wife for deceit in the exchange of land, allegations that one of the defendants and the plaintiff husband annoyed and oppressed the wife until she signed the contract without knowing its contents is insufficient to show undue influence in obtaining the wife's signature, especially since the charge would rest against the husband, who was not being sued by the wife.

3. Fraud 🔑44—Allegations of conspiracy add nothing to complaint for deceit.

In a complaint against defendants for deceit in the exchange of lands, allegations of conspiracy by the defendants do not add strength to the complaint, since a conspiracy gives no right of action, unless it results in damage to the plaintiff.

4. Fraud 🔑20 — Complaint held not to show reliance on representations as to value.

A complaint, alleging that defendants misrepresented the value of the property which they conveyed to plaintiffs in exchange for plaintiffs' property, but which showed that one of the plaintiffs had examined the property before signing the contract, does not show reliance by plaintiffs on the alleged misrepresentations as to value, especially where the contract claimed an express provision that the parties had examined the respective properties, and that defendants were released from all responsibilities regarding valuation of the same and representations of any nature.

5. Evidence 🔑10(6)—Court takes judicial notice of distance between two cities in different counties.

The court takes judicial notice that the distance between El Centro in Imperial county and Venice in Los Angeles county is short.

6. Fraud 🔑9—Contract by vendor disclosing want of title not fraudulent.

A complaint for deceit in the exchange of lands, which alleged that the defendant, who agreed to convey the property to plaintiff, did not own it at the time, and that defendants represented the title was in another one of the defendants, does not show fraudulent misrepresentations, but rather a statement of the fact as to the title to avoid the charge of fraud.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action by O. N. Miller and wife against J. M. Ferguson and others for damages for deceit. Judgment for the defendants on sustaining demurrer to the complaint, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Robt. G. Hill, of El Centro, for appellants.

Conkling & Brown, of El Centro, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiffs commenced an action against the defendants to recover damages for alleged deceit. The defendants appeared and demurred, the demurrer was sustained, and the plaintiffs declining and neglecting to amend, judgment was entered in favor of the defendants. The plaintiffs have appealed under section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure.

[1-3] In their complaint the plaintiffs allege that O. N. Miller, the husband, signed an agreement to exchange lands, and they set forth the agreement; that Margaret Miller, the wife, later signed a paper agreeing to the terms of the paper signed by her husband; that the lands of the plaintiffs are located in Imperial county, and that the other lands are located at Venice in Los Angeles county; that the defendants represented that the latter properties were worth $35,000; that said representations were false; that defendants represented that said lands were owned by J. E. Combs, and so read the written paper to O. N. Miller; that Margaret Miller learned that said lands were owned by Ira N. Combs; that O. N. Miller had had confidential relations with the defendants Delozier and Colvin, and therefore acted on their representations as to value; that Margaret Miller signed under the following circumstances:

> "That the said Colvin and O. N. Miller, her husband, and coplaintiff herein, annoyed her, and persisted throughout the said day on her signing the same, and finally, under the influence of being harassed and oppressed, she signed the said writing, approving the said contract without ever having seen it or knowing the contents thereof, and that the same was signed under duress."

The plaintiffs further allege that at the time the exchange agreement was executed the defendant Ferguson did not own the property at Venice in Los Angeles county, and that the value of the property at Venice is $16,000, and no more; that before signing the agreement O. N. Miller went to the property at Venice to examine it; that plaintiffs believed all of the representations of the defendants, and acted thereon. The appellants have filed a brief; the respondents have not filed a brief. As we understand the appellants, they contend that their complaint shows actual damages and exemplary damages which they are entitled to recover; that fraud was practiced upon them, and they are entitled to rescind; that they are the victims of a fraudulent conspiracy; and that the wife signed acting under duress and undue influence. It is not necessary to discuss the contention regarding damages because, if the appellants are entitled to relief, it is not necessary to determine the amount thereof at this time. The complaint does not allege that Margaret Miller was confined by anybody, hence the complaint may not stand on the theory of duress as defined by subdivision 3 of section 1569 of the Civil Code. The averments regarding the inducement to obtain the signature of Margaret Miller do not show undue influence. In re Langford, 108 Cal. 608, 622, 623, 41 Pac. 701. Furthermore, even though it did, the charge would rest against O. N. Miller, but the wife is not suing her husband at this time. The allegations on the subject of conspiracy neither add to nor detract from the strength of the case made on behalf of the appellant. In Bowman v. Wohlke, 166 Cal. 121, at page 124, 135 Pac. 37, 39 (Ann. Cas. 1915B, 1011), the court quotes from an earlier California case as follows:

> "A simple conspiracy, however atrocious, unless it results in actual damage to the party, never was the subject of a civil action; and though such conspiracy is charged, the averment is immaterial and need not be proved. Where two or more are sued for a wrong done, it may be necessary to prove previous combination in order to secure a joint recovery, but it is never necessary to allege it, and if alleged it is not to be considered as of the gist of the action. That lies in the wrongful and damaging act done."

[4, 5] The actionable fraud on which the appellants rely is that the defendants represented the value of the property at Venice to be $35,000, whereas its value was $16,000. The court will take judicial notice that the distance between El Centro in Imperial county and Venice in Los Angeles county is short. The appellants alleged that before signing the agreement in question, O. N. Miller went to Venice to examine the property which he was to receive in exchange. Under these circumstances, without any other fact entering into the controversy, the representation as to value was the expression of an opinion which the appellants did not rely on and it is not sufficient to support their cause of action. Hackelman v. Lyman, 195 Pac. 263. Furthermore, the agreement was signed by O. N. Miller on May 15, 1919; it was signed by the defendant Ferguson on May 26, 1919. It is not alleged that Ferguson was present when the alleged false representation was made. It is consonant with appellants' pleading that the representation, if any, was made by the other alleged conspirators during the existence of the conspiracy and in this connection it is important to note that the written instrument contains the following provision:

> "It is presumed and understood that all principals to this agreement have investigated the respective properties and J. G. Delozier and B. E. Colvin is hereby released from all responsibility regarding valuation of same, and representations of any nature."

[6] The appellants rely in some way upon the fact that Ferguson did not own the property at Venice at the time that the agreement was executed. They allege, nevertheless, "that the defendants represented to the plaintiff O. N. Miller, before the signing of the said contract, that one J. Ellsworth Combs owned the said property to be exchanged for plaintiffs' property." If the last fact occurred as it is alleged, the very nature of the act seems to negative rather than to sustain anything in the nature of fraud. It is not alleged that O. N. Miller can neither read nor write; it is not alleged that he did not read the paper before he signed it, nor is there an allegation to the effect that he signed it in the dark, nor that he was prevented by any one of the defendants from reading it. In the face of these facts appellants' complaint is not made any stronger by inserting "that the defendants prepared the said written contract and read it to the said Miller, in the name of the said Combs, and not in the name of the defendant J. M. Ferguson." Under these circumstances, we think the instant case is controlled by Brimmer v. Salisbury, 167 Cal. 522, 530, 140 Pac. 30, 34, where the court says:

> "* * * Where the dealings between the parties are open-handed and where, as is the general rule, the vendee is charged with the duty of acquiring his own knowledge of the condition of the vendor's title, such contracts will be enforced upon the theory that the vendee contracted with his eyes open and contracted not in the belief that the vendor did have title, but in the expectation that he would be able to make title."

In other words, under the facts as pleaded, the respondent Ferguson was agreeing to deliver to the appellants title to a certain piece of property for a certain price, at a certain time, but in advance he was stating to the appellants that he was not the then owner of the property. Instead of being a fraud, this act was in the nature of taking due precaution to prevent fraud being charged against the respondent.

(55 Cal. App. 391)

LEE et al. v. UNITED STATES FIRE INS. CO. et al. (Civ. 2368.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 26, 1921.)

1. Money lent 🔑1—Promise to repay implied.

The law implies a promise to repay borrowed money.

2. Mortgages 🔑298(4)—Obligation to reconvey land deeded as security merely upon payment of debt.

Where land is conveyed as security for a loan, the law imposes an obligation to reconvey upon payment of the indebtedness secured in view of Civ. Code, § 2941.

3. Appeal and error 🔑1011(1) — Mortgages 🔑38(2)—Deed must be clearly shown to be a mortgage; province of trial court to determine on conflicting evidence whether deed is shown to be mortgage.

Clear and convincing evidence is required to show that a deed is a mortgage, but where there is a substantial conflict it is primarily for the trial court to determine whether the evidence in favor of claim of mortgage is clear and convincing.

4. Mortgages 🔑38(1)—Finding that deed was mortgage sustained.

Evidence held to support a finding that a deed absolute on its face was a mortgage merely.

5. Insurance 🔑328(7)—Where right to reconveyance retained, there is no change of title.

An absolute deed was not a "change of title" avoiding insurance policy by the fact that the grantor authorized the grantee to sell and pay the owner's indebtedness to the grantee and on a prior mortgage, and, if there was any proceeds left, give it to the grantor's wife, since such authorization was not irrevocable before a sale by the grantee.

6. Insurance 🔑282(2)—Equitable title compliance with condition that insured must have sole and unconditional ownership.

An equitable title in the insured is a sufficient compliance with a condition of the policy avoiding it if insured's interest is other than sole and unconditional ownership.

7. Insurance 🔑328(7)—Deed constituting a mortgage merely held not to avoid policy.

That insured has conveyed property covered by a fire policy under absolute deed does not avoid the policy on the ground that insured has relinquished sole and unconditional ownership, where the deed is a mortgage merely, and only creates a lien incident to the secured debt.

8. Insurance 🔑558(2)—Failure to make proof of loss no bar to recovery where prevented by insurer.

Where insurer's agents prevented insured from making proof of loss, failure to make such proof did not bar a recovery under the policy.

9. Insurance 🔑559(1)—Denial of liability on another ground held waiver of proof of loss.

Denial by insurer of all liability under the policy because of alleged change of ownership, made prior to the expiration of time to make proof of loss, is a waiver of the policy condition requiring such proof.

10. Insurance 🔑556(2)—Adjuster may waive proof of loss.

Notwithstanding policy provision that no representative of the company "shall have power to waive any provision or condition of this policy," an insurance adjuster had authority to waive proof of loss.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Action by J. F. Lee and others against the United States Fire Insurance Company and another to compel conveyance of real property. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Miller, Thornton, Miller & Watt, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Lamberson & Lamberson, of Visalia, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J. Judgment was rendered requiring the defendant United States Fire Insurance Company to convey certain real property to plaintiff C. W. Carey upon payment by the latter of the indebtedness found to be due the company from Carey.

The company issued its policy to Carey, insuring the dwelling house on the property against loss by fire in the sum of $2,000. At that time the property was incumbered by a trust deed securing the payment to Charlotte E. Miot of an indebtedness due her from Carey of $2,500. The policy made the loss, if any, payable to Mrs. Miot as her interest might appear, and provided that, as to her, the insurance should not be invalidated by any act or neglect of Carey. After the issuance of the policy Carey and his wife deeded the property to plaintiff J. F. Lee. Thereafter the dwelling house was totally destroyed by fire. Mrs. Miot made proof of loss, and the company paid her the full amount of the insurance and took an assignment from her of the trust deed and the indebtedness secured thereby to the extent of $2,000, and later paid her the remainder due her from Carey, and took an assignment of the whole indebtedness. The company then demanded of Carey the payment of the whole indebtedness which the trust deed was given to secure, and, on his failure to make payment thereof, caused the trustee to give notice of sale of the property. Thereupon the plaintiffs commenced this action, and caused summons to be duly served upon defendants. After such service the trustee sold the property to the company for the sum of $3,220.50, the whole amount of the original indebtedness with interest, costs, and attorney fees. The court gave judgment requiring the company to convey the property to Carey upon his payment of the amount due under the trust deed, after crediting him with the $2,000 for which the dwelling house was insured. The court found that Carey did not offer to pay the company the amount so found due prior to suit, but that such an offer would have been unavailing.

Appellants contend that—

> By the deed from Carey to Lee "there was a change in the title and interest of the insured in violation of the provisions of its policy, which precluded him from making any recovery thereon."

The policy provided that—

> "This entire policy shall be void * * * if the interest of the insured be other than unconditional and sole ownership."

Respondents meet this contention with the claim that the deed was given to Lee only as security for money loaned by him to Carey. Lee testified:

> "Mr. Carey was sick a couple of years * * * and he had to have an operation performed on him, and he had to be sent to San Francisco to the hospital, and he didn't have any money, and he deeded this land to me in lieu, as security, and if I had a show to sell the land, I was to sell it and pay Mrs. Miot, the mortgagor, and myself, and if there was any left after that, why I was to give it to his wife," and that he loaned the money to Carey.

The Careys kept possession of the property, and had the full use and control thereof. Carey testified to the same effect as Lee, and further:

> "I never made any note because I had been in the habit of getting money from him any time I wanted it; I never did give him a note for security, and I told him I would, being they had raised me since I was three years old, and I guess they figured they didn't need a note"; that he always did business with them "that way; * * * any time I needed any money, I always went over and got it"; that Mrs. Lee is his aunt.

[1-4] There is no evidence that Carey expressly promised to repay Lee the money loaned him, but the law implies such a promise. Couts v. Winston, 153 Cal. 688, 96 Pac. 357; Todd v. Todd, 164 Cal. 258, 128 Pac. 413. Neither does the evidence show a direct promise by Lee to reconvey to Carey, but the law imposes such obligation upon payment of the indebtedness secured by the deed. Civ. Code, § 2941. There is no conflict in the evidence other than such inferences as may be drawn from the facts stated and the additional facts that revenue stamps to the value of $1.50 were attached to the deed, such stamps not being required on a mortgage, and the statement of Carey, hereinafter considered, that he had deeded the property to Lee. Clear and convincing evidence is required to show that the deed is not what it purports to be, but "where there is a substantial conflict, it is primarily for the trial court to determine whether the evidence in favor of the claim of mortgage is clear and convincing." Todd v. Todd, supra. It cannot be said that the trial court was not justified in concluding that the deed was intended as a mortgage.

[5, 6] Appellants urge that, even if the deed was intended as a mortgage, Carey had parted with all dominion over the property by his authorization to Lee to sell and deliver the net proceeds to Mrs. Carey. Such authorization, however, was not irrevocable, and Carey retained the right, on payment of the indebtedness to Lee before a sale by the latter—and no such sale was in fact made or attempted—to a reconveyance of the property.

> "The clause of the policy providing that it shall be void if the insured's interest is other than sole and unconditional ownership, * * * is designed to remove from him the temptation to profit by the willful destruction of property not entirely owned by him. * * * 'It therefore follows that the clause is in most cases held to refer to the character and quality of the title—to the actual and substantial ownership, rather than to the strictly legal title.' * * * An equitable title in the insured is a sufficient compliance with the condition in question." McCollough v. Home Ins. Co., 155 Cal. 662, 102 Pac. 815, 18 Ann. Cas. 862; Raulet v. Northwestern, etc., Ins. Co., 157 Cal. 213, 107 Pac. 292; Ramirez v. United Fireman's Ins. Co., 189 Pac. 309.

[7] Since the deed to Lee was intended as a mortgage it transferred no interest in the land, but created a lien only "which was an incident of the secured debt." Anglo-California Bank v. Cerf, 147 Cal. 389, 81 Pac. 1077; Chapman v. Hicks, 41 Cal. App. 158, 182 Pac. 336.

[8] Carey did not make proof of loss, and it is urged that by such failure he lost all right of recovery under the policy. The court found that he "was prevented from making such proof of loss by the special agent of the said insurance company who had the adjustment of such loss in his hands and by Fred D. Steele, the local agent" thereof. Steele testified that proofs of loss were made out by Mr. Reddling, the adjuster of the company, and, as Carey "was going to sign the proofs of loss," Reddling "asked him if he was the sole owner of the property, and he said no, he wasn't, hadn't owned it for something like a year or year and a half." Reddling testified to like effect, and that he then said to Carey that he had no further use for him, and put the prepared proofs in his pocket. Carey testified:

> "I started to explain to them just the situation of the case. I am no attorney or anything, and I didn't know just how it should be, and I started to explain the case to them, about it, and he just threw up his hands, and said they didn't owe me or Lee anything in the case. * * * He says, 'I have those proofs here for you to sign.' Then I says, 'Well, now I better go get my uncle, as he is interested in this proposition;' and he says, 'In what way is he interested in it?' * * * And so I started to explain how it was; * * * told him that I had given my uncle a deed to the property. * * * I thought they were interested in it, and in fact I didn't get it, go through with the talk, because when I told him that, he threw up his hands and says, 'Well, * * * we don't owe you or Mr. Lee'—something to that effect—'any insurance.'"

The testimony is sufficient to support the finding that Carey was prevented from making proof of loss by the company's agents.

[9] The statement of Reddling, together with the subsequent acts of the company, was a denial of all liability on other grounds than failure to furnish such proofs. Before the expiration of the 60 days allowed Carey in which to furnish such proof, the company took an assignment from Mrs. Miot, subrogating it to her rights under the trust deed to the extent of $2,000. The instrument recited that the policy of insurance provides that it "shall be void * * * if the interest of the insured be other than unconditional and sole ownership"; that Carey had conveyed the property to Lee, and that the company claimed that, by reason of such conveyance, "as to the said C. W. Carey and/or J. F. Lee no liability therefor exists." The company had no right to subrogation under the policy except upon its "claim that, as to the mortgagor or owner, no liability therefor existed." Its act in taking the assignment of the trust deed was in itself a denial of liability to Carey. At the trial and on this appeal the company has continued to deny all liability to Carey because of his deed to Lee. The denial of such liability prior to the expiration of the time to make proof of loss is a waiver of the condition of the policy requiring such proof. Farnum v. Phœnix Ins. Co., 83 Cal. 263, 23 Pac. 869, 17 Am. St. Rep. 233; Royal Ins. Co. v. Martin, 192 U. S. 149, 24 Sup. Ct. 247, 48 L. Ed. 385.

[10] Appellants contend that under the provisions of the policy to the effect that no representative of the company "shall have power to waive any provision or condition of this policy" the adjuster was without authority to waive proof of loss. The cases are all to the contrary. McCollough v. Home Ins. Co., 155 Cal. 663, 102 Pac. 814, 18 Ann. Cas. 862; J. Frank Co. v. New Amsterdam C. Co., 175 Cal. 293, 165 Pac. 927; Ramirez v. United Fireman's Ins. Co., 189 Pac. 309.

The court admitted evidence to the effect that after the fire Carey made an agreement to sell the property. The testimony was apparently offered for the purpose of showing acts of ownership by Carey. Whether properly admitted or not, the evidence was of slight importance. The uncontradicted evidence, independent of that to which objection is made, shows that, at all times after the execution of the deed to Lee, Carey had the full possession, use, and control of the property. The evidence in dispute could show no more.

There is no suggestion of bad faith or wrongful conduct on the part of the plaintiffs, and the defense interposed is purely technical and wholly without support in natural justice.

The judgment is affirmed.

(55 Cal. App. 511)

Ex parte KNIGHT. (Cr. 594.)

1. Counties ⊂⊃55—County ordinance on prohibition enforcement held not to apply within limits of municipality.

A municipality and a county are separate government entities, and each being supreme within its own territorial limits, the operative force of a county ordinance which involves the exercise of police powers directly granted to cities, towns, and counties by Const. art. 11, § 11, cannot be so extended as to apply to persons violating within the limits of a municipality the provisions of a prohibition enforcement ordinance.

2. Municipal corporations ⊂⊃55—Municipality organized within territory of county withdrawn from county control on all matters cognizable by municipal authorities.

When a municipality is organized within the boundaries of a county, the territory embraced within the limits of such municipality is withdrawn from the legislative control of the county as to all subjects which the charter of such municipality declares shall be cognizable by authorities of the municipality.

3. Municipal corporations ⊂⊃592(2)—If not conflicting with state law, municipality may make penal an act already penal by state law.

A municipal corporation has the power to make penal an act already made penal by state law, so long as the ordinance does not conflict with state law, and when this is done the act becomes a separate offense against the state and municipality.

4. Habeas corpus ⊂⊃29—Writ granted for arrest on county ordinance for act within municipality in county.

An arrest under Prohibition Ordinance No. 307, county of Butte, for an act committed within the limits of the city of Oroville, is illegal, and accused will be released on writ of habeas corpus.

Application by Eugene Knight for a writ of habeas corpus to secure release of petitioner from custody on a charge of violation of prohibition enforcement ordinance. Writ granted.

J. A. McGregor and George F. Jones, both of Oroville, for petitioner.

J. R. Robinson, of Chico, for respondent.

HART, J. The petitioner is held in custody by the sheriff of Butte county upon an order made by a justice of the peace of said county, sitting as a committing magistrate, holding him to trial in the superior court of said county for the violation of Ordinance No. 307, passed and adopted by the board of supervisors of said county of Butte on the 2d day of August, 1921. The avowed purpose of said Ordinance No. 307 is the enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment to the federal Constitution, prohibiting the sale, manufacture, transportation, etc., of alcoholic liquors within the limits of said county. Section 2 of said ordinance provides:

> "All acts or omissions prohibited or declared unlawful by said Eighteenth Amendment, or by the said Volstead Act, are hereby prohibited and declared unlawful; and any such act or omission is hereby declared to be a violation of this ordinance and is hereby made a misdemeanor. Any such violation of this ordinance is punishable by a fine of not more than $600, or imprisonment in the county jail for not more than seven months, or by both such fine and imprisonment. All fines collected under this ordinance shall be paid into the county treasury."

The specific charge against the defendant is that he sold intoxicating liquor within the limits of the county of Butte. It is admitted, however, that the offense of which the petitioner is accused was committed, if at all, within the limits of the city of Oroville, which is a municipal corporation organized as such under the municipal corporation act of 1883 (St. 1883, p. 93), and is of the fifth class. And it was also admitted that the city of Oroville had passed several ordinances regulating the traffic in intoxicating liquors. These ordinances were, at the oral argument, introduced as a part of the record in this proceeding. The first of said ordinances required the payment of a license of $50 per month for engaging in the sale of alcoholic liquors, and contained a number of provisions prescribing certain conditions upon which the license would be issued. The second ordinance merely restricted the business of retailing alcoholic liquors within a certain described district within the city of Oroville, making it unlawful for any person to engage in that business in any other portion of said city. The third was an initiative ordinance submitting to the electors of the city of Oroville the question whether it should become the local law of that municipality, and which limited the number of licenses to be granted for retail liquor establishments to not to exceed 3 until the population of said city should be at least 5,000 in number and an additional license to be allowed and issued for each 1,000 increase in population, etc. The last-mentioned ordinance, having been ratified by the electors, of course superseded the preceding ordinances referred to above.

[1] The petitioner contends that his restraint by the sheriff of Butte county is illegal, for the reason that the order of the magistrate upon the authority of which said sheriff claims the legal right to hold him was beyond the power or jurisdiction of the magistrate to make, and is therefore absolutely void. The basis of the contention is that, a municipality and a county being separate and distinct governmental entities or agencies, and, within the scope of its powers, each being supreme within its own territorial limits, the operative force of an ordinance enacted by the governing board of the latter and which involves the exercise of any of the police powers directly granted to cities, towns, and counties by the Constitution (Const. art. 11, § 11), cannot be so extended as to affect or apply to persons violating within the limits of a municipality the provisions of such ordinance.

There can be no doubt that, under the decisions, the position of the petitioner is sound and must be sustained. A reference to some of the cases in which the precise question here was considered and decided and a quotation or two from the decisions therein will be sufficient to confirm this statement.

In Ex parte Roach, 104 Cal. 272, 37 Pac. 1044, the petitioner was held by the sheriff of Kings county under a warrant of arrest issued by a justice of the peace of said county charging him with having sold at his saloon in the city of Hanford intoxicating liquors, in violation of an ordinance of the board of supervisors of said county. The city of Hanford was then a municipal corporation of the sixth class, having been organized under the municipal government act of 1883, and had, prior to the time at which the petitioner was alleged to have violated the county ordinance, passed an ordinance providing for the issuance of licenses for the sale of intoxicating liquors. The petitioner had received from the city of Hanford a license to carry on the business of retailing liquors within that city, which license was in force at the time of his arrest. It was contended by the petitioner in that case, as it is contended by the petitioner here, that his arrest under the county ordinance was illegal because the supervisors of the county of Kings were without any police power within the city of Hanford; "that the ordinance passed by that body under which he was arrested is limited in its operation to those portions of the county not included within the boundaries of any municipality therein." After quoting in the opinion section 11 of article 11 of the Constitution and referring thereto, the court says:

> "The power to make these regulations is by this section conferred upon the city as well as upon the county, and must be held to be equally authoritative in each. It is a portion of the lawmaking power which the people through their Constitution have conferred upon these respective bodies, and its exercise is entitled to the same consideration and to receive the same obedience as that portion of the same power which by the same instrument has been conferred upon the Legislature. The regulations made under this authority are none the less a part of the law because the authority to make them is conferred immediately by the Constitution, than if it had been conferred mediately through an act of the Legislature. The only limitation upon the exercise of the power is that the regulations to be made under it shall not be 'in conflict with general laws.' As this limitation applies equally to regulations of the county and the city, it cannot be held by the terms of the limitation that the regulation of either of these bodies is a general law for the other, and it is held that an ordinance passed by a county is not a 'general law' within the meaning of this section of the Constitution. Ex parte Campbell, 74 Cal. 25, 5 Am. St. Rep. 418."

Again, in the same case, the court makes these further pertinent observations:

> "It is not to be supposed that it was the intention of the people through their Constitution to authorize a county to exercise the same power within the territory of the city as the city itself could exercise, or to confer upon the county the right to interfere with or impair the effect of similar legislation by the city itself. Mr. Dillon says (1 Dillon on Municipal Corporations, § 184): 'There cannot be at the same time within the same territory two distinct municipal corporations exercising the same powers, jurisdictions, and privileges.' Full effect can be given to the section by holding that each has been given the exclusive right of legislation within its own particular boundaries. By the organization of a city within the boundaries of a county the territory thus organized is withdrawn from the legislative control of the county upon the designated subjects, and is placed under the legislative control of its own council; and the principle of local government which pervades the entire instrument is convincive of the intention to withdraw the city from the control of the county [italics ours], and to deprive the county of any power to annul or supersede the regulations of the city upon the subjects which have been confided to its control."

Ex parte Mansfield, 106 Cal. 400,[1] and Ex parte Pfirrmann, 134 Cal. 143, 66 Pac. 205, refer to Ex parte Roach, supra, and expressly approve and affirm the doctrine of that case. In the Pfirrmann Case the petitioner was charged with violating an ordinance of the county of Los Angeles requiring a liquor license of $15 per month to be taken out by persons engaging in the retail liquor business. He was a resident of the city of Los Angeles, and his liquor business was conducted therein and he paid the license demanded by the ordinance of said city for carrying on such a business. The court in that case said:

> "Whether or not the license fee or tax demanded by the county of Los Angeles under its ordinance be considered a fee or tax for revenue or for regulation of the business, is an immaterial matter; for, by virtue of the provisions of an act of the Legislature (Stats. 1901, p. 635), a county has no power to demand a license fee or tax, either for purposes of revenue or regulation, from persons carrying on business within the limits of municipalities. Among other matters, that act provides: 'Boards of supervisors of the counties of the state, and the legislative bodies of the incorporated cities and towns therein, shall, in the exercise of their police powers, and for the purpose of regulation, as herein provided, and not otherwise, have power to license all and every kind of business not prohibited by law, and transacted and carried on within the limits of their respective jurisdictions.'

"Prior to the passage of the aforesaid act, it may be stated that the law was settled to the effect that within municipalities a board of supervisors had no power to enact police and sanitary measures, and therefore had no power therein to impose a license fee or tax for the purpose of regulating the liquor business, or any other business. In the absence of some direct and explicit constitutional provision, this court would not declare the existence of such a power; for difficulties and confusion arising from a clash of jurisdictions would be the only result to follow, if both the county and the municipality possessed the power of enacting police and sanitary measures within the confines of a municipality."

[2] It will be observed that in the cases to which we have just referred, and from which we have taken the above excerpts, there existed in the municipalities involved therein at the time of the proceedings against the petitioners ordinances regulating the retail liquor traffic within the limits of those municipalities. In the present case there were also municipal ordinances existing in the city of Oroville, purporting to regulate the business of selling intoxicating liquors by retail, which, however, were enacted long before the adoption into the federal Constitution of the Eighteenth Amendment. Whether the effect of the said amendment to the federal Constitution, as the same is interpreted by the Volstead Act (41 Stat. 305), was to nullify the force of these ordinances, is a question which it is not necessary for us to consider herein, for the reason that, as the decisions above referred to clearly show, when a municipality is organized within the boundaries of a county, the territory embraced within the limits of such municipal corporation is withdrawn from the legislative control of the county as to all the subjects which the charter of such municipality declares shall be cognizable by the governing board or other authorities of such municipal corporation. Since, therefore, a municipality is a distinct governmental entity, entirely independent of the county as such, and is, consequently, subject to no local legislation which it is within the power of the governing board of the county to enact, it is wholly immaterial whether or not the municipal authorities exercise or put into operative effect all the powers conferred upon it by its charter and the Constitution. The county, in brief, has no legal right to legislate for a municipality located within its limits upon any subject which is within the scope of the powers granted to the municipality, and particularly upon any matters involving the police power of the state.

[3] Counsel for respondent cites many authorities (28 Cyc. 696, and cases from other jurisdictions), which he insists support the theory, vigorously pressed in resistance to the position of the petitioner, that an ordinance by the supervisors of a county dealing with subjects as to which a municipality is empowered to enact prohibitory or regulatory ordinances cover and effect the entire county, and so may be enforced as against penal acts in violation thereof committed within the limits of such municipality. These cases need not be named herein. It is sufficient to say that they all agree that a municipal corporation has the power to make penal an act which has already been made so by a state law, so long as there is nothing in the ordinance making the act penal in conflict with a general law of the state, and that, when this is done, such act becomes a separate offense against the state and the municipality; and, "in that case, the penalty imposed by the municipality is superadded to that fixed by the general law on account of the additional wrong done to it, and the wrongdoer is not twice punished for the same offense." Van Buren v. Wells, etc., 53 Ark. 368, 14 S. W. 38, 22 Am. St. Rep. 214; City of Kansas City v. Grubel, 57 Kan. 436, 46 Pac. 714. We have no dissent from that rule to suggest; but it does not, in its application, involve an analogous situation to the one presented here. As is said in Ex parte Roach, supra, citing Ex parte Campbell, 74 Cal. 25, 15 Pac. 318, 5 Am. St. Rep. 418:

> "An ordinance passed by a county is not a 'general law' within the meaning of this section [section 11, art. 11] of the Constitution."

Moreover, as the cases above cited declare, when a municipal corporation is organized within the limits of a county, then so much of the territory of such county as is comprehended within the municipal limits of such corporation is, so far as local government is concerned, withdrawn from the county, and any ordinances passed by the latter can have no binding or any force upon the municipality as to any matters or subjects as to which the latter is vested with the power to enact prohibitory or regulatory local laws.

[4] Our conclusion is that the petitioner, having committed the act for which he is now being restrained of his liberty within the limits of the city of Oroville, is not subject to prosecution under Ordinance No. 307 of the county of Butte, and that his restraint is therefore illegal.

Accordingly, the writ is granted, and the petitioner is discharged from the custody of the sheriff of Butte county.

CONTINENTAL NAT. BANK OF LOS ANGELES v. DOYLE. (Civ. 4043.)

1. Parties 🔑7(2)—Plaintiff held proper party to maintain action on note.

Where stockholders of bank, in order to avoid an involuntary assessment, subscribed certain amounts to be paid trustees to purchase from the bank securities which bank examiner had directed it to dispose of, and where stockholder gave note for amount subscribed to the bank for which the bank gave trustees credit on price of securities which the bank thereafter delivered to the trustees, the bank was the legal holder of the note, and the only proper party to maintain an action thereon.

2. Appeal and error 🔑174 — Objection that plaintiff was not a proper party to sue on note must be first appeal raised in answer.

In action on note, defendant cannot claim on appeal that plaintiff was not a proper party to maintain the action, where such defense was not raised in the answer.

3. Bills and notes 🔑92(8)—Note held based on good consideration.

Where stockholders of a bank, to avoid an involuntary assessment, subscribed certain amounts to be paid trustees to enable them to purchase securities from the bank that bank examiner had directed the bank to dispose of, note for amount subscribed, executed by a stockholder to the bank, for which the bank gave the trustees credit on price of securities thereafter delivered to the trustees, held based on a good consideration.

4. Contracts 🔑227—Stockholder by payment of subscription after expiration of specified period waived condition requiring payment by other subscribers during such period.

Where stockholders of bank, to avoid involuntary assessment pursuant to agreement, subscribed certain amounts to trustees to enable them to purchase securities from bank which bank examiner had directed bank to dispose of, and such agreement provided that money paid was to be refunded unless holders of specified number of shares paid subscribed amounts within 10 days from date of agreement, a stockholder, who gave note for amount subscribed after 10 days to the bank, for which bank gave trustees credit on price of securities, thereafter delivered to trustees, waived condition requiring payments in cash rather than through notes of the other parties to the transaction.

5. Bills and notes 🔑98 — Beneficiary under trust could not avoid payment of note for which bank gave trustees credit on ground of failure of consideration.

Where stockholders of bank to avoid involuntary assessment subscribed certain amounts to be paid to trustees to enable trustees to purchase securities from bank which bank examiner had directed bank to dispose of, a stockholder could not set up failure of consideration to avoid payment of note to bank for amount subscribed, for which bank gave trustees credit on purchase price of securities thereafter delivered by bank to the trustees, since, being a beneficiary under the trust, he could not retain the full consideration for which the note was executed and at the same time say that there was a failure of consideration.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Action by the Continental National Bank of Los Angeles, a corporation, against Boyd W. Doyle. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Ray E. Nimmo and M. M. Starr, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Kemp, Mitchell & Silberberg, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued on a promissory note executed by defendant and delivered to the bank in payment of defendant's pro rata of a subscription agreement whereby defendant undertook to pay to trustees named therein a sum equal to the face of the note. The agreement was drawn at the instance of stockholders of the plaintiff bank. of which defendant was one, for the purpose of enabling the trustees to purchase from the bank certain collateral which the bank examiner had directed the bank to dispose of. A voluntary subscription was agreed to in order to avoid an involuntary assessment by the bank upon its stockholders. Among other things, the subscribers agreed to pay to the trustees therein named $30 per share on the stock owned by each for the purpose of enabling said trustees to purchase the assets and securities from said bank. The trustees were also authorized to collect said assets and securities as rapidly as possible, and reimburse the subscribers for the sums advanced by them for the purpose of said purchase. The money was to be immediately refunded unless the holders of at least 2,500 shares paid said amounts within 10 days from the date of the agreement, which was the 5th day of December, 1918. Two thousand five hundred and three shares subscribed to the agreement, and the subscriptions were paid in cash, checks, or notes. The cash and checks were thereupon turned over to the trustees, and the notes were taken up by the bank, which in turn credited the trustees therefor as so much cash and accepted them at their face value. Upon the full credit thus given to the trustees the assets and securities were delivered to them by the bank according to the arrangement made with the subscribers. Defendant was one of those who gave his note in payment of his subscription. The bank assumed the note, the trustees gave him credit for payment of his subscription in full, and the bank collected from him three regular interest payments in accordance with the terms of the note. This note was dated January 3, 1919, which was some 19 days after the expiration of the time set in the contract for the payment of the subscriptions. It is admitted that 2,500 shares had not paid in cash within the 10 days from the date of the agreement, but it is not disputed that at some time more than that number had paid in the manner herein outlined, and that the bank had actually transferred the assets and securities to the trustees, who held them for the benefit of the subscribers. From the fact that the defendant executed and delivered his note some time after the expiration of the period set in the subscription contract, it is argued that he waived that condition. In this connection it is argued that at the time of the execution and delivery of the note defendant was fully informed of all the circumstances, and knew that his note was being taken in lieu of a cash payment to the trustees, and the bank was giving him full credit therefor, and that a number of other subscribers were making payment in the same manner. It is also argued that he knew, or had every reason to know, that the full 2,500 shares had not paid their pro rata in cash within the 10-day period. The trial court found that all the allegations of the complaint were true, and that the allegations of the answer were untrue, and these findings are sustained by ample evidence.

[1, 2] The appeal is brought up under the new method without any assignment of error, and it is difficult to understand upon what grounds appellant relies for reversal. It is argued that the respondent is not a proper party to maintain this action, but the respondent is the payee named in the note. It was the present holder thereof, and gave the credit to the trustees whereby the appellant met his subscription and became a beneficiary under the trust agreement. From this transaction the respondent delivered the securities to the trustees, and thereby became both the legal and beneficial holder of the note. Respondent was therefore not only the proper party, but the only party, to maintain the action. Furthermore, if this was a defense to the action, it should have been raised in the answer, and this was not done.

[3-5] It is also argued that there was a failure of consideration for the note. In this connection it seems to be appellant's contention that the consideration failed because all subscriptions were not paid in cash to the trustees before December 15th. But it is admitted that, notwithstanding this condition of the agreement, the trustees obtained the securities for which the subscriptions were made, and held the same for the benefit of the subscribers, of which appellant is one. It is admitted that this was the consideration for which the note was executed. How, therefore, can there be a failure of consideration if the maker of the note obtains the full consideration which was agreed to? Furthermore, the subscription agreement having been made for the purpose of purchasing the securities, and this purpose having been effected by the transactions above outlined, it is apparent that when appellant executed his note after the 10-day period had expired, he either waived that condition in full or waived so much of it as required the payment in cash rather than through the note transactions in which he participated. In any event, being a beneficiary under the trust, he cannot retain the full consideration for which the note was executed and at the same time say that there is a failure of consideration for the note. Other points argued do not require consideration. There is no merit in the appeal.

PEOPLE v. CLARK. (Cr. 978.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Nov. 2, 1921. Rehearing Denied Nov. 26, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 29, 1921.)

1. Criminal law 🔑520(2)—Statements by police held to amount to inducement making confession inadmissible.

Where a prisoner is denied the benefit of counsel, and is repeatedly assured by the police officers and matrons that they are her friends, and will do nothing to harm her, and is brought to a weak physical and mental condition by long-sustained examination, without food or other nourishment, the statement by one of those in authority that it is the best thing for her to tell the truth, must give the impression that, by telling the truth, those who professed to be her friends would aid her in getting lighter punishment, and the confession so obtained is inadmissible.

2. Criminal law 🔑406(3), 516—Evasive explanations held admissions, not confessions.

Evidence of statements of wife, accused of murder of husband, which were evasive explanations of how her husband met his death, is admissible without a showing that they were voluntary, because they are merely "admissions" and not "confessions."

3. Witnesses 🔑204(2)—Life history written by accused, confidentially delivered to counsel, held inadmissible.

In prosecution of wife for murder of husband, the state should not have been permitted to demand production of and introduce in evidence a life history of the accused, which was delivered as a confidential communication to her counsel, and used by a physician to make a professional examination of her, and to testify as to her sanity, being introduced for no other purpose than to show that accused had lived a life of depravity and immorality from early childhood, and not for the purpose of contradicting the witness.

4. Homicide ⚷163(1), 166(1)—Letters written to accused admissible to show motive, but not loose character of accused.

In a prosecution of a wife for murder of her husband, letters written by and addressed to the accused would be admissible if they showed a motive for the crime, but are not admissible where they merely tend to place accused before the jury as a woman of loose moral character, who has led an immoral life.

NOURSE, J. Defendant was convicted of murder in the second degree, and appeals from the judgment and from the order denying her motion for a new trial.

The defendant and deceased had intermarried on the 25th of March, 1920, through the aid of a matrimonial correspondence bureau. They lived together in apparent harmony until August 14, 1920, when they went with friends to a public dance, returning to their home at about 1 a. m. They retired to their bed, and at about 5 o'clock of the morning of the 15th several shots were heard by a neighbor, accompanied by the voice of defendant, crying, "Daddy, Daddy, what have you done?" The defendant went to the bedroom window and called her neighbor, Mrs. Brown, who immediately came to the apartment. She found defendant telephoning for a physician, and, in going to the bedroom, found deceased lying upon the bed, and close by him, also lying on the bed, was an automatic pistol. The deceased did not recover consciousness, and died while being taken to the hospital. Subsequent examination disclosed that he had been shot four times, once in the head, once in the chest, once in the abdomen, and once in the left hand. Defendant stoutly maintained that deceased had himself fired the shots, but on the same day she was placed under arrest, and, covering a period of two weeks, subjected to several severe and grueling examinations by the police culminating in a signed confession on the 1st of September. The autopsy surgeon testified that from his examination of the nature and location of the wounds he believed that they had not been self-inflicted, but defendant's answers to questions during these examinations and the signed confession of September 1st are the only evidence offered by the prosecution directly implicating her in the commission of the crime.

Her story of the shooting as given in the statement prepared by the police and signed by her is as follows:

> "On the evening of August 15, 1920, my husband, Chester J. Clark, and I came home at 1 a. m., and went to bed about 2 a. m. We laid in bed and talked until 3 a. m. * * * We had a long session of sexual intercourse, and he remained on top of me so long he wore me out, and I gently pushed him off. He resented it, and grabbed me and hugged me, and bit me on the lip and on the breast and on the side and on the thigh, and I got mad and tried to get away from him, but I could not, as he got uncontrollable."

She then stated that her husband attempted to commit the crime now denounced by section 288a of the Penal Code, as added by St. 1915, p. 1022; that she resisted, and finally called him a name which caused him to desist. Her statement follows:

> "I don't think I said another word, but reached under his pillow and got the gun, and I was on top of him and began to shoot. * * * He or I did not sleep that night at all. * * * I want to say, and it is God's truth, that I had no intention of harming my husband when we went to bed on the morning of August 15, 1920, in any manner, shape, or form, and I would not have harmed him if he did not do what he did. The thought of killing my husband never entered my mind, but I automatically shot him when I realized the nasty position he was in. * * * The whole thing happened so suddenly it is hard for me to describe it in detail."

Appellant makes several assignments of error, and these will be considered in the order assigned:

lessness. It is conceded by appellant that no specific promises of reward were made, but it is argued that the frequent assurances of the police matron that "she [the defendant] would feel better if she told the truth," and that "I said that was the best thing for her to do; to tell the truth," bring the case within the rule of People v. Barric, 49 Cal. 342, 345, People v. Gonzales, 136 Cal. 666, 668, 69 Pac. 487, and People v. Thompson, 84 Cal. 598, 606, 24 Pac. 384. When a prisoner is told by one in authority that it will be better for him to make a full disclosure, or that it will be better to tell the truth, the confession so obtained is not voluntary, and is inadmissible. Such assurances are not of the same class as mere exhortations to tell the truth, or the statement to the prisoner that the truth would not hurt him. These statements, unaccompanied by words of inducement, do not render the confession inadmissible. But where, in a case such as this, a prisoner is denied the benefit of counsel, and is repeatedly assured by the police officers and matrons that they are her friends, and will do nothing to harm her, and is brought to a weak physical and mental condition by long-sustained examination without food or other nourishment, the statement by one of those in authority that it is the best thing for her to tell the truth could not help but give her the impression that by telling the truth regarding the homicide those who professed to be her friends would aid her in getting a lighter punishment.

In addition to this, it is apparent from the testimony of the witnesses for the state that the relentless sweating process to which the appellant was subjected was such as to render her statements involuntary. She was put through a course of cross-examination continuing over a period of two weeks when she was in such a low physical and mental condition that she had to be assisted by matrons into the examination room, with her head covered with wet towels to keep her in a condition to answer the questions. These examinations lasted for hours, at a time during which time appellant was denied food or other nourishment. It is significant that throughout the hundreds of pages of testimony on this phase of the case there is no word suggesting that at any time she made any voluntary statement regarding the homicide. On the contrary, while a witness on the stand, she testified that the statements to the police were involuntary. She also retracted all admissions of guilt contained in those statements, and insisted that she was not responsible for the killing of her husband. The case comes squarely within the rule announced in People v. Loper, 159 Cal. 6, 17, 112 Pac. 720, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1193; People v. Borello, 161 Cal. 367, 119 Pac. 500, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 434; People v. Quan Gim Gow, 23 Cal. App. 507, 512, 138 Pac. 918.

[2] In this phase of the case both appellant and respondent treat all the statements of the accused as confessions and as such subject to the same rule. In the early stages of her examination appellant denied the shooting, and gave evasive explanations of how her husband met his death. Evidence of statements of that character is admissible without showing they were voluntary because they are merely "admissions" and not "confessions." People v. Fowler, 178 Cal. 657, 664, 174 Pac. 892; People v. Clifton, 198 Pac. 1065; People v. Peete, 202 Pac. 51. What has been said in regard to appellant's first point is therefore to be limited to the evidence of her statements in which she acknowledged her guilt. These having been offered as confessions, the rule clearly applies. Bram v. United States, 168 U. S. 532, 18 Sup. Ct. 183, 42 L. Ed. 568.

[3] (2) That the trial court erred in requiring appellant's witness to deliver to the district attorney the written story of appellant's life, and in admitting the same in evidence. While appellant was confined in the county jail awaiting trial she wrote a detailed story of her life, from early childhood until the time of her arrest, and delivered it as a confidential communication to one of her counsel. He in turn handed it to Dr. Ball, who had been summoned by appellant to make a professional examination of her and to testify as to her sanity. When the doctor was called as a witness he testified that appellant was insane, and that in reaching such conclusion he had taken into consideration the life history of appellant, "beginning with her family history of heredity, which shows an alcoholic and degenerate father, and a history of insanity on her mother's side, her uncle and aunt being insane, * * * her father's mother having been evidently a degenerate type, and her father's brother an alcoholic and degenerate also, and the fact that her brothers and sisters gave evidence of a nervous condition and at least epileptic form convulsion from her description to me; * * * that subsequently in her life she developed a disease called syphilis * * * from her (former) husband." Upon cross-examination the district attorney demanded the production of the written life story, and thereafter, over the strenuous objection of appellant, offered it in evidence and read it in full to the jury. The demand was made on the theory that the document was necessary to enable the prosecution to cross-examine the witness, and the offer of the document in evidence was made, not for the purpose of contradicting the witness, but manifestly for the purpose of degrading the appellant, and of exhibiting her to the jury as a low, depraved and immoral person.

The introduction of this document cannot be defended upon any legal principle. The only defense attempted by respondent is that appellant herself was responsible for its introduction, but this finds no support in the record. As said in People v. Dye, 75 Cal. 108, 112, 16 Pac. 537, 540:

> "It is contrary to the first principles of justice to try a man for one crime and convict him of that, because he may be guilty of another, or because he may be a low speciman of humanity."

To the same effect are People v. Arlington, 123 Cal. 356, 357, 55 Pac. 1003; People v. Wallace, 89 Cal. 158, 162, 26 Pac. 650; People v. Mohr, 157 Cal. 732, 735, 109 Pac. 476; People v. Whiteman, 114 Cal. 338, 343, 46 Pac. 99.

It is hardly necessary to point out that the admission of this life story, depicting as it did a life of depravity and immorality from early childhood, was prejudicial to appellant's case. That it was introduced for that purpose is evidenced by the fact that the district attorney, in his address to the jury, referred to the facts therein related as evidence that appellant was a low and depraved character, and relied upon these facts as proving his theory of the case. To add to the injury, the trial court refused appellant's request to instruct the jury to disregard these statements of the district attorney, and also refused her requested instruction that this life history should be considered by the jury in so far only as it related to the question of the sanity or insanity of appellant.

[4] (3) That the court erred in permitting the introduction of postal cards and letters written by and addressed to appellant. In this connection it is argued that the correspondence between appellant and various men in the East did not tend to show any motive for the killing, but merely tended to place appellant before the jury as a woman of loose moral character. In many respects appellant is correct in this. It would serve no purpose to analyze this voluminous correspondence. Of course, it is the settled rule that a correspondence carried on between one accused and a third party is admissible when it tends to establish defendant's motive in taking the life of deceased. People v. Le Doux, 155 Cal. 535, 548, 102 Pac. 517; People v. Soeder, 150 Cal. 12, 15, 87 Pac. 1016. But, where the correspondence has no possible bearing on the question of motive, but is offered merely to show that the defendant has led an immoral life, the admission of such part of the correspondence is error.

It is also argued that this entire correspondence was inadmissible because it had been seized by the police officers by entering into the premises where appellant resided and taking them without a search warrant, in violation of the constitutional guaranty of the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures. Const. Cal. art. 1, § 19; Const. U. S. Amend. 4. It is also argued that in producing these private papers in evidence the state violated the guaranty of the Fifth Amendment to the federal Constitution that one accused of crime should not be compelled to be a witness against himself. In support of the argument, Boyd v. U. S., 116 U. S. 616, 6 Sup. Ct. 524, 29 L. Ed. 746; Weeks v. U. S. 232 U. S. 383, 34 Sup. Ct. 341, 58 L. Ed. 652, L. R. A. 1915B, 834, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 1177, and similar federal authorities are cited. To these might be added the recent decision of Gouled v. U. S. (Feb. 28, 1921), 255 U. S. 298, 41 Sup. Ct. 261, 66 L. Ed. ——. In the recent case of People v. Mayen, 35 Cal. App. Dec. 442, the District Court of Appeal followed the rule of these cases. But the Supreme Court granted a hearing in that case and the matter is now pending before it for decision. For this reason the question should await the determination of the Supreme Court.

As the case must be reversed for the reasons given, it is unnecessary to discuss the other assignments made.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed, and a new trial ordered.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. The petition of the respondent for a rehearing in this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the First Appellate District, Division 2, is denied.

We deem it necessary to say in explanation of this order that we do not understand the opinion of the District Court to hold that none of the postal cards and letters addressed to and written by the defendant, and which were introduced in evidence on the former trial, was admissible in evidence. On the contrary, we understand it to mean that no part of the correspondence is admissible in evidence except such letters written by or received by the defendant as may tend to prove that the defendant had some motive for the commission of the crime with which she is charged. The question whether such letters tend to prove motive depends, of course, on the contents thereof.

Descent and distribution 🔑129—Mortgages 🔑309(3)—Quitclaim deeds erroneously releasing deeds of trust, held void; refusal to cancel deed of trust on application of heir held proper.

Where an appellant against whom a judgment had been rendered executed deed of trust to indemnify surety on appeal bond, and trustees named in deed of trust gave appellant's administrator a quitclaim deed to the land to enable administrator to execute a first mortgage in place of existing mortgage which had fallen due, and took a new deed of trust, approved by the probate court, and the trustees later executed another quitclaim deed to enable administrator to procure another loan, and took another deed of trust, also approved by the probate court, trial court's refusal to cancel the first deed of trust on application of appellant's heir held proper, since it was beyond the power of the probate court to authorize a trust deed; and the quitclaim deeds were so much a part of the transaction that the consideration thereof failed, leaving original trust deed good.

Action by Gertrude Porter against the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company, a corporation, and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Lawler & Degnan, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff commenced this suit in equity to quiet title to certain real property, to require defendants to give up a certain trust deed which they held upon said property, and to restrain them from asserting any claim thereto. The record is presented upon the judgment roll alone. It shows that findings of fact and conclusions of law were signed by the trial judge and filed on the 22d day of July, 1920, and that on the same day judgment in favor of defendants was duly entered. It also appears that on August 24, 1920, other findings were signed and filed by the same judge at the request of plaintiff, and that a judgment similar in effect to that already entered was then signed and filed. No proceedings had been taken to set aside the judgment of July 22, 1920, and what is said herein relating to the findings of the trial court refers to the findings of fact bearing date July 22, 1920.

It appears that a judgment in the sum of $10,000 and costs was entered against one William E. McPherson in his lifetime, and that to procure a stay of execution pending his appeal said McPherson induced the surety company to execute a surety bond. To indemnify the surety company against loss the said McPherson conveyed to the individual defendants in trust for the purposes of such indemnity the lot of land which is the subject of this suit. The title to the property was then vested in McPherson, free of all liens except a mortgage of $5,000. Pending the appeal to the Supreme Court from that judgment McPherson died, leaving as his heirs a daughter, the plaintiff in this case, and a son. The latter was appointed administrator of the estate, and in the course of his administration was met with a demand by the owner of the mortgage for the payment thereof. The estate was without funds sufficient to pay the mortgage, and, in order to save it from loss, the administrator arranged for a new mortgage for a like amount, but to accomplish this it was necessary to procure a release of the estate granted by the deed of trust in order that the new mortgage should be a prior lien. For this purpose the defendants were persuaded to execute a quitclaim deed, releasing their lien under their deed of trust, and, as a part of the same transaction, received from the administrator a new deed of trust, which he was authorized to execute by order of the probate court. Some time thereafter the estate became involved in further financial trouble, and desired to raise an additional sum of $3,000. The holder of the mortgage above mentioned expressed a willingness to advance such additional sum, provided that he be given a first lien for the full amount of his loan. For this purpose the administrator again approached the defendants, and requested them to reconvey the estate granted to them under the deed of trust, in order to enable him to raise the funds necessary for the protection of said estate. A quitclaim deed was again executed, a new mortgage for $3,000 was placed on record, and thereafter a new deed of trust was executed by the administrator for the benefit of these defendants. In both instances before the administrator executed these deeds of trust he obtained an order of the probate court authorizing him to do so. Such order was made on a petition filed for that purpose, of which presumably all interested parties had notice. Thereafter the judgment appealed from by McPherson was affirmed by the Supreme Court, and, the administrator of the estate and this plaintiff having refused defendants' demand for payment, the full amount of the judgment and costs was paid by the defendants. When the second deed of trust above referred to was executed this plaintiff and her brother, as the sole heirs of William E. McPherson, held the title to the premises in question. Prior to the execution and delivery of the third deed of trust the brother transferred his interest to plaintiff.

The trial court concluded that, while the proceedings directing the execution of the deeds of trust were regular and for the benefit of the estate, the orders of the probate court were ineffective, for the reason that that court was without authority to authorize the execution of a deed of trust or any form of security other than a mortgage; that the quitclaim deeds executed by defendants constituted a part of the same transaction through which the deeds of trust were executed, and that to hold such deeds of trust void and adjudge the quitclaim deeds enforceable would be inequitable and unjust, and contrary to the intent of the parties. For these reasons the court held that the consideration for the execution of the quitclaim deeds had wholly failed, and that the defendants accordingly held under the deed of trust first executed unimpaired except to the extent of the liens created by the two mortgages aggregating $8,000. Judgment was accordingly entered, decreeing that the deed of trust executed by William E. McPherson conveyed to the trustees for the purposes therein named the legal estate in the property in suit, and that such estate is, and at all the times mentioned, was, a valid and subsisting security for the repayment to the surety company of the sum of money paid by it for the benefit of said estate.

There is not a shadow of equity in appellant's case. As has been said, all the acts of the parties were done for the benefit of appellant, and she alone profited by them. It is hardly possible, under the circumstances, that they were not done with her full knowledge and consent. At least she is charged with such knowledge as to the one-half interest she acquired from her brother. It was proper, therefore, for the trial court to refuse to cancel the first deed of trust when it found that the new deeds and the quitclaim deeds were executed for the purpose of taking the place of the old and as a part of the same transaction. On the other hand, if the deeds executed by the administrator may be treated as valid to the extent of the lien created, as the parties certainly intended they should be, appellant was not entitled to a judgment while the lien remained unsatisfied. The trial court properly resolved the equities in favor of respondents.

LEMBERGER v. LEMBERGER. (Civ. 4024; S. F. 9832.)

1. Divorce 🔑133(1) — Finding of refusal to have matrimonial intercourse not sustained.

In an action wherein husband obtained divorce from wife on a cross-complaint, a finding that refusal of wife to have matrimonial intercourse occurred at a time when health and physical condition did not make such refusal reasonably necessary held not sustained by the evidence; husband's testimony as to health of wife not being sufficiently corroborated under Civ. Code, §§ 96 and 130.

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

2. Divorce 🔑127(4) — Corroboration by spouse, insufficient.

Under Civ. Code, § 130, providing that divorce cannot be granted upon uncorroborated testimony of the parties, the testimony of one spouse may not be accepted as sufficient corroboration of the testimony of the other.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Joseph S. Koford, Judge.

Action by Leonie Lemberger against Frank Lemberger. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed in District Court of Appeals, and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

George D. Collins, Jr., of San Francisco, for appellant.

H. A. Stout, of Oakland, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal from an interlocutory decree of divorce granted to defendant upon a cross-complaint. Plaintiff filed suit for a divorce upon the ground of willful neglect. Defendant filed an answer and cross-complaint, denying the material allegations of the complaint, and asking for a divorce upon the ground of willful desertion.

Plaintiff failed to prove the allegations of her complaint and a nonsuit was granted. Appellant does not complain of this ruling, but contends that the evidence is insufficient to warrant the findings and judgment of the court that plaintiff willfully deserted the defendant, and granting to him an interlocutory decree of divorce. The desertion found by the court was the "plaintiff's refusal to have reasonable or any matrimonial intercourse with said defendant as husband and wife, and that health and physical condition did not make such refusal reasonably necessary."

Appellant attacks this finding as being unsupported by the evidence, asserting that in order to justify such a finding it is necessary that the record contain corroboration of the testimony of a party to the action. The defendant testified to repeated refusals of his wife to have reasonable or any matrimonial intercourse with him, and also testified that there existed no physical conditions justifying such refusal. The plaintiff denied these statements, and testified that she had refused but once to have intercourse with the defendant, and on that occasion she was very ill, and the defendant was well aware of the fact. She admitted that from June, 1917, to the date of the filing of the action (May, 1920), there had been no matrimonial intercourse between herself and her husband, but said there had never been a refusal on her part except on the one occasion when she had been ill.

Respondent relies upon this admission of plaintiff that there had been no physical relations between the parties from June, 1917, to the time of the filing of the action, a period of about three years, as corroboration of defendant's testimony concerning plaintiff's persistent refusals to have matrimonial relations with him. While there is some force in this contention, the corroborative force of the testimony of plaintiff is greatly weakened by her repeated insistence that the cessation of matrimonial relations was not due to her persistent refusals, but to the fact that the husband understood her physical condition and because of this fact did not seek relations with her.

Respondent also relies for corroboration of his testimony upon the fact that it appears from the testimony of the son of the parties that the husband and wife occupied separate beds in the same room, and that the son slept in the bed with his mother. It has been held in the case of Ingraham v. Ingraham, 40 Cal. App. 578, 181 Pac. 234, that testimony of third parties that the husband and wife occupied separate rooms in the house was not the character and degree of evidence required by the Code with regard to corroboration in divorce cases. In the instant case such testimony is particularly valueless as corroborating evidence because of the fact that it appears that the situation of the parties with regard to their sleeping arrangements had continued for about six years and during a period when, according to defendant's testimony, he had no cause of complaint about the matter on which he now seeks a divorce, and that the arrangement had originally been made upon the suggestion of the defendant himself, because the child was delicate and had been ill, and the mother's bed was the most comfortable place for him to sleep.

However, even though we were to concede for the purposes of this appeal that there is sufficient corroboration of the husband's testimony regarding the wife's continued refusals to live with him as husband and wife nevertheless the defendant's case is not yet proven.

The Civil Code (section 96) requires proof that during the period of persistent refusal health and physical condition did not make such refusal reasonably necessary. The only evidence upon this matter was the uncorroborated testimony of the husband. While it is, no doubt, difficult to corroborate testimony of a party regarding these matters, such is the burden to be sustained when one relies upon this cause of divorce. Broderick v. Broderick, 40 Cal. App. 550, 181 Pac. 402; Ingraham v. Ingraham, 40 Cal. App. 578, 580, 181 Pac. 234; Hayes v. Hayes, 144 Cal. 625, 78 Pac. 19; Berry v. Berry, 145 Cal. 787, 79 Pac. 531. It appears to us that the stringency of the rule announced by the above cases regarding corroboration of testimony of a party, despite its seeming impracticability, is vindicated by a thoughtful consideration of the situation which is presented by an examination of the record in the present case. Here the wife was a woman of 51 years of age at the time of the trial. Her alleged refusals of defendant's marital rights had begun 3 years before. Up to that time, according to defendant's own testimony, he had had no cause to complain about this matter. The parties had lived together for nearly 30 years before the husband complained of this matter. They had had three children. The husband had been earning a small salary as a waiter in a restaurant. The record is undisputed tht the wife was a careful and economical housekeeper. After these many years of married life, during which time the husband admitted he had absolutely no cause of complaint, the wife, in the course of nature, reached a time in life and a physical condition which, according to her testimony, rendered her unable to endure matrimonial relations. She also testified that her husband was fully aware of this condition and of the treatments she was undergoing; that the husband realizing her suffering, said, "I will never come to you again." She also stated that during the period when relations had ceased between herself and husband she was going through physical changes which made it impossible for her to live with her husband as she had previously done. This testimony is corroborated by the testimony as to her age and by physiological facts of which this court will take judicial notice. Under such circumstances it should not be, and we think it is not, the law that a husband can come into court and by his uncorroborated testimony that his wife was well and healthy during this period secure a dissolution of the marriage ties and a release of his obligations, and cast his wife off without support or assistance from him at a period of her life when she most needs his assistance and when she is least able to earn her own living. And this after 30 years of faithful performance of her duties as a wife and mother!

[1] We are of the opinion that the finding that the refusal of the wife to have matrimonial intercourse occurred at a time when health and physical condition did not make such refusal reasonably necessary is unjustified. The defendant's uncorroborated testimony on this subject is insufficient to support it, and most especially so in the light of the other matters appearing in the record.

Respondent calls our attention to the fact that the plaintiff has made very clear by her own testimony that she prefers to live with her brother and her mother than to live with her husband, and that she has refused to separate herself from her family at the request of her husband. This evidence might be pertinent had the defendant sought his divorce upon other grounds; it has no relevancy in relation to the question of whether or not plaintiff has persistently refused to have reasonable matrimonial intercourse with the defendant when her health and physical condition did not make such refusal reasonably necessary. That question was the one issue between these parties under the pleadings upon which the action was tried. The burden of proving the affirmative of this issue was not sustained by introducing the uncorroborated testimony of the defendant. If the difficulties incident to a compliance with section 130 of our Civil Code seem insurmountable in some instances, the courts are nevertheless without power to abrogate the rule there laid down, and, as pointed out herein, that section vindicates itself in cases like the instant one, which, in the nature of things, will frequently arise.

The judgment and decree appealed from are reversed.

We concur: NOURSE, J.; STURTEVANT, J.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. [2] The petition for a rehearing of this cause in the Supreme Court is denied. The opinion of the District Court of Appeal appears to assume that in an action for divorce the testimony of one spouse may be accepted as sufficient corroboration of the testimony of the other for the purpose of making a cause of divorce for either. We think this assumption is contrary to the rule laid down in section 130 of the Civil Code. That section declares that no divorce can be granted upon the uncorroborated testimony of the parties. We understand this to mean that there must be evidence in support of the cause of action upon which a divorce is granted, in addition to the evidence of either or both of the parties to the action, and that the testimony of one party cannot be taken in corroboration of that of the other for the purpose of proving a cause of divorce.

1. Master and servant ⚷330(1) — Driver of automobile stage presumed to be agent of owner.

The fact that one is the owner of the automobile stage raises the presumption that the driver was his agent.

2. Master and servant ⚷330(3) — Evidence held to show automobile stage driver was agent of owner and operator.

In an action for injuries received in a collision between the street car in which plaintiff was riding and an automobile stage, resulting from the negligence of the driver of the stage, the presumption that the driver was defendant's agent, arising from proof that defendant was the owner, supplemented by evidence that the driver had formerly driven a truck for defendant and had been transferred from driving the truck to driving the stage by defendant's bookkeeper, and after the accident was personally paid by defendant for his services, held to support a finding that the driver was defendant's employee and that the stage was being operated by defendant.

3. Associations ⚷19—Master and servant ⚷301(1)—Owner and operator of stage, and not co-operative association, held liable for negligence of driver.

Where defendant was a member of an auto stage association, a co-operative business association authorized by Civ. Code, §§ 653b–653*l*, under whose by-laws each member owned and operated his own stages along the prescribed routes and retained the profits derived therefrom, though the terminals and certain other facilities were managed by the association, the owner and operator of the stage, and not the association, is the master of the driver, and liable for his negligence.

4. Master and servant ⚷301(2)—Master liable for negligence of servant employed by agent.

The owner of an automobile stage who pays and discharges the driver and receives the profits from the operation of his machine is not relieved from liability for the driver's negligence by reason of the fact that the driver was employed by an agent of the owner.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Richardson. Judgment for the plaintiff against the defendant Richardson, and the latter appeals. Affirmed.

J. W. S. Butler and B. F. Van Dyke, both of Sacramento, for appellant.

Downey & Downey, of Sacramento, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The action was for personal injuries received by plaintiff while a passenger on a street car in the city of Sacramento. Plaintiff's injuries resulted from a collision between said street car and a passenger automobile stage operating between Sacramento and Placerville and driven by one Balderson. The complaint alleged that the accident was caused by the joint negligence of the driver of the stage and the motorman in charge of the street car, and that the stage was being operated by defendant Richardson. The case was tried before the court without a jury, and the Pacific Gas & Electric Company was acquitted of all negligence, but it was found that the stage had been negligently operated by appellant, Richardson. Judgment followed against him in favor of plaintiff for $3,000.

Appellant does not contend that the stage was not negligently operated or that plaintiff's injuries were not caused by said negligent operation, but his sole contention is that said stage was being operated by the Star Auto Stage Association, a co-operative business association. Respondent contends that there are two conclusive answers to appellant's contention: First, the evidence is sufficient to sustain the finding that Richardson was operating the stage; and, second, if the stage was being operated by said association, it was operating it for the use and benefit of Richardson and as his agent, and therefore he is personally responsible for its negligent operation.

[1, 2] As to the first consideration, it may be stated that it was admitted at the trial that Richardson was the owner of the stage, and from this fact the presumption arises that the driver was the agent of the owner. McWhirter v. Fuller, 35 Cal. App. 288, 170 Pac. 417; Dierks v. Newsom, 194 Pac. 518; Birch v. Abercrombie, 74 Wash. 486, 133 Pac. 1020, 50 L. R. A. (N. S.) 59. These authorities and others that might be cited are to the effect that evidence of ownership of the vehicle creates a presumption amounting to evidence of the fact that the person operating it is doing so as the agent of the owner. Since it established a prima facie case, it would be sufficient to support the finding of the court, although it may be opposed and contradicted by direct testimony. Moreover, the record furnishes additional evidence that the automobile was being operated at the time by Richardson. In this connection it is significant that in his original answer, which he personally verified, Mr. Richardson expressly admits that he was operating the stage in question. It was not until 15 months after the collision that Richardson, in his amended answer, verified by his attorney, denied that he was operating the stage at the time of the accident. Moreover, it is a fair inference from the testimony of Richardson and Balderson that the latter was an employee of the former at the time. It is not necessary to set out the evidence, but it appears that he had been in Richardson's employ for some 6 months prior to the accident driving a truck; just a day or two before he was transferred to driving the automobile stage by Miss Brown, a bookkeeper for Richardson. When paid after the accident he received one check on Richardson personally for his labor in both capacities as driver of the truck and automobile stage. It appears also that the business office at Placerville was not conducted under the name of the Star Auto Stage Association, but under a distinct name used by Richardson, and that he owned all the stages used upon said line and exercised various acts of authority over them, such as the repairing and discharging of the drivers. Another circumstance which may be mentioned in support of the finding of the court is that no evidence was offered of any written lease or contract of any kind or character for the use of the auto stage by said Star Auto Stage Association, and there was no evidence to show that said association ever assumed any control or management over Mr. Richardson's car. In fine, the evidence decidedly preponderates in favor of the claim of plaintiff that the auto stage was not only owned by appellant, but was being operated at the time of the accident by him through his agent, and he is therefore responsible for the consequence of the agent's negligence.

[3] As to the second ground, it appears that Mr. Richardson was a member of the Star Auto Stage Association. This was not a corporation, but a co-operative business association, and its organization is provided for by sections 653b–653*l*, Civil Code. It has no capital stock, but a membership certificate is issued to each member, and from its by-laws it is a fair inference that in certain respects it acted as the agent of the owner, but that the owner retained the control and management of his machine. Section 5 of article 2 of said by-laws provides that members of the association shall deliver to it, for the use and purposes for which it was organized, one or more automobiles or other motor conveyances—

"to be by said members placed in operation over a route to be fixed and released by said directors and subject to change; and during this said membership shall keep and operate such auto stage or conveyance with the rules of the association."

Section 8 provides:

> "Any member expelled and not reinstated as herein provided shall be paid whatever amount of money may be due him out of the profits earned by the stage or conveyance operated by him, and on hand, free from any claim, charge, or assessment at the time of his expulsion."

Article 10 is as follows:

> "Each member of the association shall daily file with the secretary, or with such other officer or employee as may be designated by the directors, a statement showing his receipts for such day. The directors shall meet monthly for the purpose of determining and dividing the profits, if any of such association, and such profits shall be distributed among the members in the following manner: Each member shall receive as his share of the profits for such month such sum as the amount collected by him bears to the total receipts collected by all the members of the association during said month, after deducting from such proportionate share the amount of any unpaid dues and charges against such member for such period of time."

The portions of the foregoing which we have italicized show that the proceeds from the operation of each stage, after the deduction of certain expenses, belong to the owner thereof, and that he is "to keep and operate" his own machine.

[4] Through such co-operation the owners of the machines can, of course, reduce expenses and increase the profits of the business, and for certain purposes, such as furnishing depot facilities and selling tickets, the organization acts for the members jointly, but the individual machine does not lose its identity, but it remains subject to the control and management of its owner, who obligates himself, however, to abide by the rules and regulations of the association. He is no less responsible for its operation than if he were conducting the business alone. While it may be said that for certain purposes, then, the association is the agent of the owner, and to that extent it is the instrumentality through which he conducts the business, yet as to the operation of the machine, it could hardly be said that the organization is his agent, since he retains its control. However, it would seem to be unimportant whether the agency extends to the operation of the machine or not, as the owner's liability would not be changed. Assuredly, where the owner pays and discharges the driver and receives the profits of the operation of his machine, he would not be relieved of responsibility for its negligent operation by reason of the fact that the driver may have been employed by an agent of the owner.

We think there is no merit in the appeal, and the judgment is affirmed.

GAUME v. SHEETS et al. (Civ. 4036.)

Quieting title 🔑49—Judgment settling claims of parties on mutual rescission held proper.

Where plaintiff and defendant contributed $^{56}/_{76}$ and $^{20}/_{76}$ respectively to the purchase price of a ranch, and defendants contracted to purchase plaintiff's interest from him, judgment in plaintiff's action to quiet title after mutual rescission of the contract held to correctly settle the rights of the parties, in view of Civ. Code, § 1688.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Edgar A. Luce, Judge.

Action to quiet title by Joseph Gaume against William P. Sheets and others. From judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 181 Cal. 119, 183 Pac. 535.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment rendered in an action in which he sought to quiet title to certain property in San Bernardino county, against his vendees under a contract to purchase.

Briefly, the facts found by the court and amply supported by the evidence are: That on or about August 10, 1915, and for some time prior thereto, Karl C. Wells was the owner of the real property in controversy, about 10 acres of land planted with fruit trees, and certain shares of stock in a water company; that said property was subject to a mortgage in favor of plaintiff; that at the time of the transfer of said property by Wells to plaintiff, hereinafter mentioned, the mortgage upon said property so held by plaintiff amounted to the sum of $5,600; that on or about August 10, 1915, the said Wells conveyed the said real property to plaintiff; that a consideration was rendered and paid to Wells for said conveyance to plaintiff, and that consideration was in part rendered and paid by plaintiff and was in part paid by the defendants in this action, and was as follows: Plaintiff surrendered up to said Wells, as paid, the note secured by said mortgage, and satisfied and discharged said mortgage, and defendants conveyed to said Wells two houses and lots situated in the city of San Diego, Cal., specifically described in the findings, which said property was subject to a mortgage of $600, and defendants also paid Wells the sum of $750 by the execution and delivery of their note for said amount, which note was intended by the parties to cover the amount of the mortgage on the San Diego property and the amount of street assessments against the same. Thus defendants, in effect, conveyed to Wells the San Diego property free of incumbrances. The court found that the reasonable market value of said San Diego property, free of incumbrance, was $2,000; that the total consideration paid to Wells for the conveyance of the San Bernardino ranch was equivalent to the sum of $7,600, of which consideration the amount rendered and furnished by plaintiff was equivalent to the sum of $5,500, and that rendered and furnished by defendants was equivalent to the sum of $2,000.

It is practically conceded by the appellant that the evidence sustains the above findings; but it is urged that the further finding of the trial court, to the effect that said consideration was so rendered and paid said Wells by plaintiff and defendants pursuant to understandings and agreements had and made between said Wells, plaintiff, and defendants, to the effect that each of said persons would do the act or thing which it is found he did do, is not supported by the evidence. This contention is without merit, as the finding of which complaint is made is amply sustained by the testimony of the defendant Clyde M. Sheets and by the testimony of Karl Wells, and it is not necessary to set out such testimony here.

The court further found that, on or about the same time at which said Wells transferred and conveyed said San Bernardino property to plaintiff, plaintiff and defendant entered into an agreement in writing for the sale of plaintiff's interest in the San Bernardino ranch, and under this agreement the defendants entered into possession of the ranch and made the payments of $50 a month called for by said agreement up until April 10, 1916, at which time they defaulted in their payments; that on May 10, 1916, said agreement was mutually rescinded and abandoned by plaintiff and defendants, and defendants surrendered and yielded up the possession of all of said San Bernardino ranch to plaintiffs.

It is unnecessary for us to discuss the questions of the rescission of the contract between plaintiff and the defendants and of the right of the defendants to have it declared that a resulting trust for their benefit attached to the property for the proportion thereof which the amount paid by them bears to the entire amount of the purchase price paid to Wells for the property. This is because these matters, between these same parties, under the precise facts presented by the present record, were submitted to our Supreme Court upon a former appeal in this action. A careful discussion of the rules of law applicable under the facts as found by the trial court was entered into by Justice Wilbur in the opinion filed in Gaume v. Sheets, reported in 181 Cal. 119, 183 Pac. 535. The questions of the effectiveness of the actions of the parties to accomplish a mutual rescission of the contract, and of the defendants' right to recover the payments made by them under the same, are therefore authoritatively settled, and require no further discussion by us.

The trial court found that the defendants were the equitable owners of a $^{20}/_{76}$ interest in the San Bernardino ranch, and decreed that they were entitled to have the legal title to the same conveyed to them by the plaintiff; also that the defendants recover $350 paid by them to plaintiff as installment payments under their contract of purchase, but allowed to the plaintiff the sum of $265.27 as rental value of his $^{56}/_{76}$ interest in the ranch during the period it was occupied by the defendants. It was specifically found by the court that the parties had stipulated that they would withdraw from consideration by the court the adjustment of rentals and profits for the period between the time when the contract was rescinded and the plaintiff took possession of the entire ranch, and the period when the defendants should again be restored to the possession of their $^{20}/_{76}$ interest therein. The judgment of the court merely attempted to settle the claims of the parties up to the date of the rescission of the contract between them.

The judgment rendered appears to us to be good sense, exact justice, and good law under the findings of fact. There is nothing inequitable about it, appellant's contention to the contrary notwithstanding. This is apparent from the fact that the record contains the testimony of the plaintiff himself that he had at a previous time accepted a mortgage upon the property for $7,500. It is a clear inference from this fact that the value of the property is sufficient to reimburse the plaintiff and the defendants for the amounts contributed by them towards its acquisition.

There is only one other point raised by the appellant that merits discussion, and that is his insistence that the plaintiff should have been allowed, in addition to the rental value, the amount of the taxes due upon the property which became a lien in March, 1916, and which, under the contract between the parties, the defendants were to pay, but did not pay. The answer to this contention is an obvious one. The adjustment made by the trial court is not under the terms of the contract; it is an adjustment upon a rescission of the contract. The theory is to restore to the plaintiff, as nearly as possible, what he parted with under the contract, and to do the same by the defendants. Under the contract the defendants were not to be charged with the reasonable rental of the land, but, under the judgment of the court, this was taken as the most accurate method of restoring to plaintiff that of which he had been deprived during the existence of the contract, i. e., the possession of his share of the ranch. The defendants, on the other hand, were permitted to recover what they had paid plaintiff under the contract. Had they paid the taxes or any other charges under the contract, which charges would not have been proper had defendants been merely tenants renting the land by the year, such items should have been restored to them by the judgment of the court. The adjustment between the parties is not on the basis of the contract obligations, but was an attempt to settle their claims as though the contract had not existed, it having been rescinded and such rescission having effected a complete extinguishment of the contract. Civ. Code, § 1688.

The judgment is affirmed.

Exceptions, bill of 🔑43(1)—Time to seek relief from default in filing runs from date of default.

The six months' period allowed by Code of Civil Procedure within which to file a motion to be relieved from default begins to run against a motion to be relieved from default in serving and filing a bill of exceptions on the date when the bill of exceptions was due, and not on the date when the tendered bill of exceptions was refused by the court because it was filed too late.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Action by Mary A. Kerrigan and others against Deborah Anderson. Judgment for defendant, and from an order denying plaintiffs' motion to be relieved from their default in failing within the time allowed to serve and file their proposed bill of exceptions, the plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Thomas W. Forsyth, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Franklin Swart, of Redwood City (John H. Machado, Dep. Dist. Atty., of Redwood City, of counsel), for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from an order of the superior court of the county of San Mateo denying a motion of the plaintiffs herein to be relieved from their default in failing within the time allowed by law to serve and file their proposed bill of exceptions in the case.

The action was one brought to set aside a deed given to the defendant by her mother conveying certain real estate. Judgment was therein entered in favor of the defendant on March 9, 1920. Notice of the entry of such judgment was served on the plaintiffs' attorneys on March 25, 1920, and was filed on April 1, 1920. A motion for a new trial was made by the plaintiffs and denied on May 13, 1920. On June 10, 1920, notice of appeal from the judgment was duly served and filed. On June 11, 1920, a written stipulation signed by the attorneys for both parties was filed extending the plaintiffs' time to prepare and serve a bill of exceptions to July 1, 1920. Thereafter certain correspondence, and also certain conferences, occurred between respective counsel, having reference in part to the preparation of the bill of exceptions and in part to the settlement of the case. On September 20, 1920, counsel for the defendant wrote a letter to one of the plaintiffs' counsel stating that he saw no chance of the settlement of the case, and suggesting that steps be taken to bring the matter to a conclusion. Up to this time no proposed bill of exceptions had been served, although at some earlier date plaintiffs' counsel had sent to the defendant's counsel a rough draft of a statement of the testimony, which was to be incorporated in a bill of exceptions to be thereafter prepared. On September 24, 1920, plaintiffs' counsel, replying to the foregoing letter, referred to this incomplete draft of the testimony, required its return, and inclosed a proposed stipulation extending the time for the preparation and filing of the bill of exceptions to October 15, 1920. To this letter defendant's counsel made no written response, nor did he sign said stipulation. During the following two months or thereabouts it is claimed by plaintiffs' counsel and denied by counsel for the defendant that in certain conferences between respective counsel oral stipulations and understandings were had, the effect of which, according to appellants' claim, was to extend the time for the service and filing of the bill of exceptions. In the early part of December, 1920, one of plaintiffs' counsel went to the office of defendant's counsel and procured the incomplete draft of the testimony above referred to. At or about the same date a letter was written by counsel for the plaintiffs to defendant's counsel referring in detail to the foregoing matters, and again requesting the latter's signature to a written stipulation extending plaintiffs' time to prepare and serve their bill of exceptions. To this letter defendant's counsel replied on or about December 15, 1920, refusing to sign said or any stipulation with relation to said bill of exceptions. Thereafter, and on or about January 4, 1921, plaintiffs' proposed bill of exceptions was served on defendant's counsel and delivered to the clerk of the court, with instructions to hand the same to the judge.

The hearing upon the matter of the settlement of said bill of exceptions and upon the defendant's objection to the settlement of the same was had before the trial court on February 7, 1921, whereupon the court made the following order:

> "The proposed bill of exceptions in the above matter was handed to this court on January 6, 1921, for settlement, more than six months after the time allowed by law for its presentation. The objection to the settlement of the same is hereby sustained, and the court refuses to settle said bill of exceptions."

Thereafter, and on February 17, 1921, plaintiffs' counsel gave notice of a motion to relieve said plaintiffs from the effect of said last-named order and from their default in not having served and filed their bill of exceptions within the time allowed by law upon the ground of mistake, inadvertence, surprise, and excusable neglect. The notice of said motion was accompanied by two affidavits of plaintiffs' counsel setting forth at length the several letters which had passed between themselves and defendant's counsel, and also purporting to set forth the substance of several interviews between respective counsel, wherein it was asserted certain assurances had been given and oral understandings had the effect of which was to extend plaintiffs' time for the service and filing of their said bill of exceptions. Said motion was also predicated upon all of the papers, records, and files in the case. To these affidavits the defendant's counsel responded with a counteraffidavit, denying said alleged oral stipulations and understandings, and denying that any extensions had been granted save only that covered by the original stipulation between counsel. This motion came on for hearing on February 24, 1921, whereupon the court made and entered its order denying the same. It is from this last-named order that this appeal has been taken.

The respondents herein make an objection which stands upon the threshold of the consideration of this appeal upon its merits. This objection is that the plaintiffs' motion to be relieved from their default in failing to present, serve, and file their bill of exceptions within the time allowed by law and by the written stipulation of the parties, being based upon the ground of mistake, inadvertence, surprise, and excusable neglect, is to be treated as—although not expressly stated as being—a motion made under the provisions of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It was not made within the six months' period prescribed by said section of the Code, and was therefore properly denied.

This objection, we think, must be sustained. The judgment herein was entered upon March 9, 1920; notice of the entry thereof was duly given and filed on April 1, 1920; plaintiffs' motion for a new trial was denied on May 13, 1920; notice of appeal was filed June 11, 1920, and on that date the written stipulation of the parties was filed wherein the time of plaintiffs within which to prepare and serve their bill of exceptions was extended to July 1, 1920. No other or further extension by either written stipulation of the parties or order of the court was given, and it inevitably follows that, upon the expiration of such extension of time on July 1, 1920, no bill of exceptions having been served or filed, the plaintiffs were in default unless their time to so file the same had been extended by oral agreement between the counsel for the respective parties. The trial court resolved the conflict in the affidavits of said counsel in that regard against the plaintiffs by its first order refusing to settle the bill of exceptions upon the ground that it had not been presented in time, the same facts having also appeared upon the hearing preceding the making of said order. No appeal having been taken therefrom, said order became final. The application for relief from the default which led to the making of said order was not made until February 18, 1921, more than seven months after the time provided in the written stipulation of the parties for the making, service, and filing of said bill of exceptions had expired. That the date of such default, and not the date on which the court made its order refusing to settle the bill of exceptions, is the date when the time within which relief must be sought, under section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, begins to run has been settled in several recent cases. Cox v. Palos Verdes Co., 172 Cal. 702, 158 Pac. 332; Moultrie v. Tarpio, 147 Cal. 377, 81 Pac. 1112; Rath v. Vaughan, 187 Pac. 44. It follows that plaintiffs' motion for relief from their default came too late, and hence the court had no other alternative but to deny the same.

Order affirmed.

PEOPLE v. FALLON. (Cr. 576.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 7, 1921.)

Criminal law 🔑1182—Where appellant neither files brief nor appears for oral argument and the evidence sustains conviction and instructions show no error, the case will be affirmed.

Where defendant, appealing from a conviction of embezzlement under Pen. Code, § 954, has neither filed brief nor appeared for oral argument, and the record evidence is conclusive of guilt and the instructions show no error, the conviction must be affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; C. P. Vicini, Judge.

Jean Fallon was convicted of embezzlement, and she appeals. Affirmed.

Martin I. Welsh and R. T. Coughlin, both of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. The defendant was convicted by a jury in the superior court of the county of Sacramento of the crime of embezzlement. The prosecution was under two different indictments found by the grand jury of Sacramento county, in one of which she was charged with having fraudulently embezzled and converted to her own use the sum of $115.41, being the property of one F. E. Butler, of whom she was the agent, and in the other the amount charged to have been embezzled, and also the property of said Butler, was the sum of $308.08. The defendant was tried upon the two indictments at the same time, the same having been consolidated by an order of the court under the authority of section 954 of the Penal Code.

The case was duly put upon the calendar of this court for the December term thereof, and counsel of record for the defendant duly notified of that fact. No brief has been filed by the defendant in support of her appeal, nor was there any appearance before the court in her behalf when the cause was regularly called for oral argument. In view of this situation of the cause before this court, the Attorney General, when the case came on regularly for oral argument, submitted the case upon the record.

We have carefully read the testimony, and have thus arrived at the conclusion that the evidence, as it appears in the record here, is conclusive of the defendant's guilt. In fact, there was no testimony offered by the defendant in her own behalf or in opposition to that presented by the people. The instructions have also been examined, and found to involve a correct statement of the law applicable to the case. There is no necessity, under the circumstances of this case, to enter into a detailed or any statement of the evidence. It is sufficient to say that the defendant, as an agent of said F. E. Butler, was charged with the duty of making deposits of money in a certain bank in the city of Sacramento for said Butler; that in the month of January, 1921, said Butler turned over to her on one day the sum of $115.41 and on another day the sum of $308.08, with instructions to deposit the same in the bank with which said Butler was transacting business; that the defendant did not deposit said sums as instructed, but converted the same to her own use. The testimony shows that she admitted having converted said moneys to her own use, and, as above suggested, there was no contradiction of that statement by her at the trial.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Madera County; W. M. Conley, Judge.

Action by the United States Farm Land Company against R. F. Bennett. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed in the District Court of Appeal, and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

Ford & Bodkin and Leon R. Yankwich, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Butler & Van Dike, of Sacramento, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. This appeal is from the judgment herein in favor of the plaintiff for $7,780.94 on account of goods, wares, and merchandise alleged to have been sold and delivered to defendant by the plaintiff and its assignors. The original and the second amended complaints were against the Chowchilla Creamery Company and R. F. Bennett and A. L. Gambrill. The original complaint does not appear in the record. The second amended complaint alleges that the "Chowchilla Creamery Company is, and at all times herein mentioned was, a corporation." There is no allegation that Bennett and Gambrill held any official position in the creamery company. By the third amended complaint, which makes Bennett the sole defendant, it is alleged:

> That Bennett "caused to be prepared and filed in the office of the county clerk of Madera county, Cal., articles of incorporation of what was designated as Chowchilla Creamery Company, and thereafter caused such further proceedings to be had to that end that on the 9th day of June, 1916, a certificate of incorporation" was issued by the secretary of state; that the articles of incorporation named three persons as directors and subscribers to one share each of the capital stock; that the authorized capital stock was 2,000 shares of the par value of $10 per share; that no shares of stock were ever issued and no meeting of the stockholders was ever held; that the persons named as directors in the articles of incorporation never met or organized; that no other directors were ever elected, "but that shortly after the issuance of said certificate of incorporation, defendant, R. L. (F.) Bennett, and one A. L. Gambrill assumed to act as directors of said corporation, said Bennett assuming the title of 'president' and said Gambrill assuming the title of 'secretary treasurer'; that from the date of the issuance of said certificate of incorporation * * * up to about a month prior to the commencement of this action, the defendant, Bennett, carried on the usual business of a creamery at Chowchilla * * * under the name and style of Chowchilla Creamery Company; that defendant * * * furnished all the money used in running said business and said business was wholly controlled and run by and under the direction and for the sole use, benefit, and behoof of the defendant; * * * that * * * this plaintiff and its assignors hereinafter mentioned extended credit to said Bennett, and furnished the goods, wares, and merchandise to him as hereinafter set forth, in total ignorance of the fact that said so-called Chowchilla Creamery Company was not in law or fact a corporation."

The complaint further alleges that the defendant used the corporate name with intent to defraud the plaintiff and its assignors and for the purpose of inducing them "to give credit to said pretended corporation"; but the court found that the defendant did not so use such corporate name with the intent to defraud and the allegations of fraudulent intent need not be further noticed. The court found the other facts substantially as alleged in the complaint, and:

> "That said corporate name and style was employed by said defendant for the purpose of conveniently conducting his said business at said place, and that said defendant was never an officer of said pretended corporation nor a stockholder thereof nor authorized in any manner to conduct business for said pretended corporation, all of which defendant well knew, and that in fact defendant was conducting his own personal and private business under the name and style of Chowchilla Creamery Company," and that "said A. L. Gambrill assumed to act as a director and as secretary treasurer of said pretended corporation at the request of defendant, and that said Gambrill was not a director and was not secretary treasurer and was not a stockholder."

[1, 2] There was no error in permitting the plaintiff to file the third amended complaint. The cause of action was not changed thereby. In the second amended complaint the plaintiff mistakenly alleged that the indebtedness was incurred by the corporation and the defendant. The third amended complaint alleges that the same indebtedness was incurred by the defendant alone. In Walsh v. Decoto, 194 Pac. 298, the original complaint was against the Blue Taxicab Corporation as sole defendant. The complaint alleged that such defendant was a corporation. About two years after the commencement of the action the court permitted the plaintiff to file an amended complaint substituting Decoto as defendant in place of the Blue Taxicab Corporation. In affirming the judgment the court said:

> "The only question involved in the appeal is whether or not the trial court had authority to substitute Mr. Decoto personally for the Blue Taxicab Corporation in the action. The substitution was made admittedly long after the statute of limitations would have run against Decoto had no action been commenced thereon. * * * The substance of the matter is the real thing to be considered; and we do not think that a defendant who does business under a trade-name by which, although no deceit is necessarily intended thereby, a party injured is misled to the loss of his cause of action, should be heard to say after service upon him personally and with full notice of the situation, that the action had been begun in the wrong name, and should therefore be abated."

A hearing in the Supreme Court was denied. See, also, Thompson v. Southern Pacific Co., 180 Cal. 730, 183 Pac. 153.

> "There is no law of this state which prevents the use of a trade-name by an individual, and in the absence of any such prohibition, an individual may conduct business under any designation he sees fit." Willey v. Crocker-Woolworth National Bank, 141 Cal. 513, 75 Pac. 106.

[3] If it be conceded, as contended by the defendant, that the Chowchilla Creamery Company was a corporation, de jure or de facto, and that the defendant was a director and president thereof, the defendant would still be liable. Section 309 of the Civil Code provides that the directors of a corporation must not "create any debts beyond their subscribed capital stock," and that when they do so they "are, in their individual or private capacity, jointly and severally liable * * * to the creditors thereof, to the full amount of the * * * debt contracted." Since there was no capital stock subscribed in this case, the liability imposed by section 309 would extend to the whole indebtedness. The evidence shows without conflict that the defendant acted as director and president without any authority from the corporation, whatever its character, and, having contracted debts in the name of the corporation in his assumed official capacity, the defendant cannot be heard to deny, and does not deny, that he so acted as director and president; but he maintained at the trial, and now contends, that the corporation had at least a de facto existence, and that his acts are binding upon the corporation. If the corporation is so bound, then the defendant is liable, under the provisions of section 309, for the debts contracted in violation of that section. The complaint contains all the allegations necessary to state a cause of action against the defendant as director under the section cited. That section was evidently enacted for the protection of persons entering into contracts with corporations. It would not be practicable for every such person to make investigation to ascertain what amount of capital stock had been subscribed before extending credit in ordinary business transactions.

> "The capital stock constitutes the basis of credit of the corporation, and persons dealing with the corporation have a right to assume that the stock has been actually paid in, or that it may be reached for corporate debts." 7 R. C. L. 198.

[4] Appellant attacks, as unsupported by the evidence, the finding that—

> "Said business was wholly controlled and run by and under the direction and for the sole use, benefit, and behoof of the defendant, * * * and that said corporate name and style was employed by said defendant for the purpose of conveniently conducting his said business, * * * and that in fact defendant was conducting his own personal and private business under the name and style of Chowchilla Creamery Company."

The evidence was conflicting on the issue so found, and it is sufficient to ascertain whether there is substantial support for the finding. A. L. Gambrill, called by the plaintiff, testified that he acted as secretary of the corporation, at the request of defendant, from the time when the creamery was under construction; that he did not know that he had ever been elected secretary by any board of directors; that the defendant arranged for the payment of the secretary's salary; that no shares of capital stock were ever issued; that no meeting of the board of directors was ever held, but that defendant and the witness talked matters over; that what purports to be the minutes of a meeting of the board of directors was made up and signed by defendant and the witness, as president and secretary, respectively, but that no directors were present at such meeting; that the defendant suggested that the witness and a Mr. Young each take a one-third interest in the creamery with him; that the defendant said he had invested $12,000 in the business; that witness did not know whether any other person ever invested any money in it. It appears that the persons named in the articles of incorporation as directors resigned before any business was transacted and no other directors were ever elected. The creamery first constructed was destroyed by fire, and a new one was built. Thereafter financial difficulties were experienced, and on November 28, 1917, the defendant wrote O. A. Robertson, president of plaintiff corporation, who had induced the defendant to organize the creamery in the first place, as follows:

"Los Angeles, Cal., Nov. 28, 1917.

"Mr. O. A. Robertson—Dear Sir: Probably your Mr. Kildahl has explained to you the trouble of the creamery. Now, when the place burned down there was plenty of money and resources left to pay everything in full; and about $3,000 surplus, as part of my investment. I was not intended (intending?) to build, as I know positively that Chowchilla should have cold storage and ice plants, as it is essential to the life of that town, and would be the best-paying business that could be started there. It should be a large concern; but when I went up to Chowchilla I was met by Mr. Gambrill and Mr. Young. They said they would take one-third each if I would build. I was to allow the assets then on the ground, amounting to about $3,000; Mr. Gambrill to put in $2,000 cash, Mr. Young to put in $2,000 in building material, as he said he had no ready cash at that time. So I turned over the management of the creamery to them. It was agreed, as Mr. Gambrill was secretary, that he would fix up the stock, as it was all in his possession. Now, as soon as the creamery was built, Young came and put an attachment on creamery for his bill. Gambrill don't put any money. That is just what they have done. I kept writing Gambrill to divide the stock, but he kept putting it off until the whole thing fell through. Those goods could be furnished from other sources without any trouble, but for the above agreement.

"Now, Mr. Robertson, I have put in about $9,000 there. I am willing to drop that. Your company takes that plant over, enlarges as I have outlined, and it will be one of the best-paying businesses in the country. If you send me a paper by your attorney through Mr. Kildahl I will sign over any claims I have.

"[Signed] R. F. Bennett."

A fair inference from the foregoing letter, together with the other evidence before the court, is that the defendant owned and controlled the business conducted and the property held in the name of the corporation, and that "he was virtually the corporation itself, or, as the cases put it, the corporation was his 'corporate double.' " Deming v. Maas, 18 Cal. App. 337, 123 Pac. 204. While the defendant gave testimony which would have supported a contrary finding, it cannot be said that the finding made is not supported by the evidence.

[5, 6] Objection was made to the introduction in evidence of the assignments to the plaintiff of the many claims of creditors against the defendant. They were all in the same form except as to the names of claimants and amounts. One of them, Plaintiff's Exhibit No. 1, is as follows:

"Chowchilla, Cal., Nov. 16, 1917. I hereby assign to United States Farm Land Company, a corporation, all my claims against Chowchilla Creamery Company. Amount $17.29. R. B. Woodward."

Appellant contends that the subject-matter of the assignment is not "described with such particularity as to identify it." The only objection made at the trial, however, was that "there is nothing there to indicate that is an assigned claim against the defendant, R. F. Bennett." The assignment sufficiently identifies the subject-matter. Thomas v. Fursman, 39 Cal. App. 281, 178 Pac. 870. It was stipulated that the amounts claimed were due the respective claimants; the only question being that such amounts were not due from the defendant. The assignments were made prior to the discovery by the plaintiff and its assignors that the appellant was liable for the indebtedness. If the defendant conducted his private business under the corporate name, he is in no position to object that such name was used in the assignments. If, as defendant contends, he was acting only as an officer of the corporation, then the use of the corporate name in the assignments was proper, and he is liable under the provisions of section 309 of the Civil Code.

The judgment is affirmed.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. Appellant asks for a rehearing on the ground that the opinion filed herein erroneously holds that the defendant is liable in an action at law under the provisions of section 309 of the Civil Code.

[7] The trial court found that the defendant owned and controlled the business conducted under the name of the Chowchilla Creamery Company, and that the same was his own personal and private business. This court held that such finding is supported by the evidence, and therefore affirmed the judgment. The opinion further states that, if it be conceded that the Chowchilla Creamery Company was a corporation and that the appellant was a director and president thereof, he would still be liable under the provisions of section 309 of the Civil Code. This statement was made in view of the particular facts of this case. Since there was no subscribed capital stock, the liability of the directors would extend to the whole indebtedness, and there would be no necessity of resorting to an action in equity for the purpose of taking an accounting and apportioning any recovery which might be had among the creditors.

"Where the statute imposes upon a stockholder or director a liability for all the debts of the company, * * * then each creditor has his remedy against the corporation and the director, and there is no more reason for allowing him to come into equity to enforce it against the director than for allowing him to enforce it in equity against the corporation." Bauer v. Parker, 82 App. Div. 289, 81 N. Y. Supp. 995.

"Unless a particular remedy is prescribed by statute, the form of the remedy, whether by action at law by each creditor against one or more stockholders or officers, or by bill in equity in which all persons in interest or to be affected are made parties, is made to depend upon the character of the liability. If its object is to create a common fund, limited in amount, for the benefit of all creditors of a particular class, so that if one were allowed to proceed alone he might exhaust the fund or get more than his share; or if the liability was only for the deficiency of corporate assets, or only for the excess of debts contracted over the amount permitted by the charter, so that an accounting is necessary; or if for any similar reason an action at law would be inadequate to furnish a complete remedy or protect the rights of all persons interested—the courts have generally held, in the absence of any express statutory provision, that a suit in the nature of a bill in equity, bringing in all interested parties, must be resorted to. * * * But no such reason obtains here. The liability of each director is unlimited, except by the amount of the corporate debts which fall within the terms of the statute. What one creditor may collect will not reduce the amount which another may recover. No accounting is necessary in order to ascertain the amount of the deficiency of corporate assets, for the creditor is not bound to resort to them first, nor is his recovery limited to the extent of such deficiency. In fact, a direct action by any creditor against any director not only furnishes an adequate remedy, but it interferes with the rights of no one else." Patterson v. Stewart, 41 Minn. 84, 42 N. W. 926, 4 L. R. A. 745, 16 Am. St. Rep. 671.

See, also, Flash v. Conn, 109 U. S. 371, 3 Sup. Ct. 263; 27 L. Ed. 966; Nuckels v. Robinson-Pettett Co., 159 Ky. 214, 166 S. W. 972; Thompson v. Greeley, 107 Mo. 577, 17 S. W. 962; Flour City Nat. Bank v. Wechselberg (C. C.) 45 Fed. 547. Of course, in a case where capital stock has been subscribed, resort must be had to an action in equity to enforce the liability of directors under the provisions of section 309.

Rehearing denied.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. The petition for a rehearing of this case in the Supreme Court is denied.

The last sentence of the opinion of the District Court of Appeal, to the effect that the defendant Bennett "is liable under the provisions of section 309 of the Civil Code," should not be understood to mean that a single creditor can sue a director in a simple action for a money judgment, but merely to mean that the director is liable under that section, without attempting to state the form of action by which his liability can be enforced. There are decisions indicating that a single creditor cannot proceed except by a bill in equity on behalf of himself and all the other creditors of the corporation. The question as to the form of action is, as we understand the opinion, left open and undecided.

HENIKA et al. v. LANGE. (Civ. 4045.)

1. Evidence 🔑13—Matter of common knowledge that different crops require very different amounts of water.

In action involving question of whether lessor complied with provision of lease requiring him to install a pumping plant of sufficient size to irrigate the land, held, that it is a matter of common knowledge that different crops require very different amounts of water.

2. Evidence 🔑441(4) — Parol evidence held admissible to show parties' understanding as to character of land and crop to be raised.

Where farm lease required lessor to install a pumping plant of sufficient size to irrigate the land, and to purchase the seed for the first crop without specifying the kind of crop to be raised, parol evidence was admissible to show the character of the land and the understanding of the parties as to the crop to be raised, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1860, such evidence being necessary to ascertain the kind of seed to be furnished and the capacity of the pumping plant to be installed.

3. Evidence 🔑442(1)—Parol evidence admissible to show portion of agreement not reduced to writing.

Where a portion only of the contract between the parties has been reduced to writing, parol evidence is admissible as to the portion not included in the writing.

4. Evidence 🔑461(1)—Parol testimony admissible to show circumstances surrounding making of contract when necessary to ascertain intent of parties.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1860, oral testimony with reference to the circumstances surrounding the making of a written contract is admissible when an understanding of such surrounding circumstances is necessary to ascertain the intent and meaning of the parties.

5. Appeal and error 🔑1002—Finding on conflicting evidence not reviewable.

Finding made on conflicting evidence is not subject to review on appeal.

6. Landlord and tenant 🔑123—Lease held to require lessor to furnish water for irrigation.

Where premises were leased "together with a pumping plant of sufficient size to irrigate the land properly," and providing that lessees should run the "pumping plant continuously during the growing season," and lessor reserved right to "put down wells" during the term of the lease, and on supply proving insufficient lessor proceeded to deepen wells, and did not deny that she was under obligation to furnish water to irrigate, on lessees' complaints, lessor was required under such lease not only to furnish a pumping plant, but to furnish sufficient water.

7. Evidence 🔑457—Parol evidence admissible to show meaning of "pumping plant."

Where lessor leased described premises "together with a pumping plant of sufficient size to irrigate the above-described land properly," and where lease provided that lessees should run the "pumping plant continuously during the growing season of the crop," and that lessor reserve the right to "put down wells" during the term of the lease, parol evidence was admissible to show that, by use of the term "pumping plant," it was intended that the lessor should furnish wells and pumping machinery sufficient to irrigate the land.

8. Contracts 🔑170(1) — Contemporaneous construction strong evidence of meaning of equivocal terms.

The contemporaneous and practical construction of a contract by the parties is strong evidence of the meaning of equivocal terms.

9. Landlord and tenant 🔑136—Extension of time to lessor to furnish irrigation entitled lessees to corresponding increase in time to level the land.

Lessees' extension of time within which lessor was required to furnish irrigation system entitled lessees to a corresponding increase in the time allowed them to level and check the land.

10. Landlord and tenant 🔑136—Lessees, required to check and level land, could use any system customarily used for the particular crop.

Under lease requiring lessees to check and level the land, the lessees were not required to use any particular system, but could use any system which was proper and customary in raising the crop they had undertaken to plant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Consolidated actions by Robert P. Henika and another against Anna A. Lange, and by Anna A. Lange against Robert P. Henika and another. Judgment for Henika and another, and Lange appeals. Affirmed.

L. M. Chapman and Ward Chapman, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

F. E. Borton, of Bakersfield, and H. E. Schmidt, of Wasco, for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. This action was commenced by the plaintiffs, who were lessees of the defendant, to recover damages in the sum of $4,800, alleged to have been sustained by them because of the failure of the defendant to perform the covenants of a lease upon her part to be performed. Thereafter an action was commenced by the defendant against the plaintiffs, in which she alleged that the plaintiffs had failed to comply with the terms of the lease on their part to be performed, and had abandoned the property, by reason of which facts defendant had suffered damage in the sum of $6,250.

In the first action demurrer was interposed to the complaint and overruled, and an answer was filed denying the material allegations of the complaint. In the second action defendants in that action filed an answer and cross-complaint, in which they alleged a rescission of the contract by them, and sought to recover $4,800 as the reasonable value of their services performed under the lease. Upon motion, the two actions were consolidated, and the case was tried upon a stipulation that the amended complaint of Anna Lange in the second action be construed as a cross-complaint in the first action, and said cross-complaint be deemed denied.

The action involves the construction of a lease entered into between the parties. One of the objections made by appellant is that the court erred in admitting parol evidence upon which it based its finding that the land described in the lease at the time of making said lease was heavily impregnated with alkali, and unsuitable for raising any crop other than rice, and it was contemplated, understood, and agreed between the parties that said lands were to be planted to rice for such successive years as should prove necessary in order to leach and purify the land and permit the successful planting of other crops.

[1] Without setting out here the full text of the lease, it will be sufficient to say that it provides that a pumping plant was to be installed by the lessor of sufficient size to irrigate the land demised, and it, together with the land, was the subject of the lease. The size of a plant sufficient to irrigate this land would depend somewhat upon the nature of the crop to be grown thereon, as it is a matter of common knowledge that different crops require very different amounts of water. The contract also provides that the lessees were to run the pumping plant continuously during the growing season of the crop. It provides, further, that the lessor was to purchase the seed for the first crop, and that such seed was to be paid for by the lessees out of the proceeds of the first crop. As rental for the land and pumping plant, the lessor was to receive a percentage of the crop raised.

[2-4] It became necessary for the trial court to ascertain by parol evidence what kind of seed was to be furnished by the lessor, what capacity of pumping plant was to be installed and furnished by her, and in what manner it was to be operated—all of these things depending upon the nature of the crop to be raised upon the land. The kind of crop to be raised was a matter not touched upon in the lease. The evidence regarding the character of the land and the crop to be raised was admissible under two well-established exceptions to the rule that, where a contract is reduced to writing there can be, as between the parties, no evidence of the terms of the agreement other than the contents of the writing. The first exception is that, where a portion only of the contract between the parties has been reduced to writing, it is proper to allow parol evidence as to the portion of the agreement not included in the writing. Johnson v. Bibb Lumber Co., 140 Cal. 95, 98, 73 Pac. 730; Williams v. Ashurst, 144 Cal. 619, 78 Pac. 28. The portion of the contract between the parties which was not reduced to writing in the instant case was the portion regarding the kind of crop to be grown upon the land.

The second exception warranting the admission of this evidence is that contained in section 1860, Code of Civil Procedure, i. e., that oral testimony with reference to the circumstances surrounding the making of a written contract is admissible when an understanding of such surrounding circumstances is necessary in order to ascertain the intent and meaning of the parties. Morffew v. S. F. & S. R. R. Co., 107 Cal. 587, 600, 40 Pac. 810; Balfour v. Fresno Canal Co., 109 Cal. 221, 225, 41 Pac. 876; Jersey Farm Co. v. Atlanta Realty Co., 164 Cal. 412, 417, 129 Pac. 593; Jersey Island Dredging Co. v. Whitney, 149 Cal. 269, 273, 86 Pac. 509, 691. The testimony introduced under this exception was as to the character of the land, which was one of the surrounding circumstances of the parties in making their agreement. Such testimony, together with the testimony as to the understanding of the parties upon a matter not mentioned in the lease, i. e., the nature of the crop to be planted on the land, was clearly admissible under the two rules of law just discussed, and such testimony abundantly sustains the finding made upon the subject.

[5] Objection is also made to the finding as to the period of the year at which rice should be planted in order to secure the best results. There is evidence in the record to support this finding, and, it having been made upon conflicting evidence, it is not subject to review here.

Appellant complains of the finding that the clause in the lease requiring the defendant to furnish a pumping plant of sufficient size to irrigate the land was understood by the parties to mean that the said defendant would have completed and equipped with the necessary engine, pump, and appliances a well or wells on said premises of sufficient size, capacity, and equipment to deliver upon the surface of the ground sufficient water to irrigate all the land described in the lease, and that said well would be so completed by defendant in time to permit of the successful planting of rice in the year 1919.

[6-8] The contract itself states:

> "That the said party of the first part (Lange) does by these presents lease and demise unto the said party of the second part, all of the southeast quarter (describing the land), together with a pumping plant of sufficient size to irrigate the above described land properly."

It further provides:

> "The party of the second part is to run this said pumping plant continuously during the growing season of the crop."

It is clear that pumping machinery without a water supply would be useless to irrigate the land, and plaintiffs, assuredly, were not expected to run pumping machinery without water to pump. The contract itself meets the situation by providing that—

> "The party of the first part reserves all the right to put down wells or any other improvements she wishes to make during the term of this lease."

Thus the plaintiffs were precluded by the terms of the lease from drilling wells on the premises, as that privilege was reserved by the defendant. The oral testimony received by the court to make clear what the parties contemplated by the term "pumping plant" as used in the contract was clearly admissible, and fully establishes the fact that the parties intended that the defendant was to furnish wells and pumping machinery sufficient to irrigate the land. At the time the lease was made there were two wells of a depth of about 100 feet which had just been drilled upon the land, and the defendant installed a pump which was tried out after the plaintiffs took possession of the land. It was found that the wells furnished a very small quantity of water, and the defendant then had the pump removed and set to work to deepen the wells. The contemporaneous and practical construction of a contract by the parties is strong evidence of the meaning of equivocal terms. Keith v. Electrical Engineering Co., 136 Cal. 178, 68 Pac. 598; Kennedy v. Lee, 147 Cal. 596, 82 Pac. 257. The testimony is uncontradicted that the plaintiffs continually complained to the defendant that the wells she had furnished were inadequate, and the defendant never asserted that she was not under obligation to furnish wells supplying adequate water to irrigate the land; that the defendant engaged men to work upon the wells to deepen them and increase the water supply and to pump the sand therefrom. In fact, defendant's testimony at the trial was largely devoted to explaining her efforts to improve the wells by pumping sand from them, connecting them, and otherwise attempting to increase the water supply. We think there can be no doubt about her obligation in this respect under the lease.

Appellant makes the point that the defendant was not bound to furnish wells located upon the leased land, but that her obligation in that matter was fully met if she furnished wells on adjoining land from which water could be carried to the leased land. It is unnecessary for us to discuss this question; it is immaterial here, for the reason that the record contains testimony to the effect that the defendant did not furnish sufficient water from any source to irrigate the land properly for the growing of rice. This point is made because the record contains some testimony to the effect that the defendant was the owner of a one-quarter interest in a well upon the land adjoining the land leased to the plaintiffs, and that the plaintiffs might have used the water from that well. This testimony, however, is of no value to the appellant, because it is contradicted flatly by the testimony of the plaintiffs that Mrs. Lange told them that she had sold her interest in that well, and that the plaintiffs were not at liberty to use the water therefrom, and, further, that the plaintiffs were denied the use of the water from this well by the man in possession of the land upon which it was located. The conflict in the evidence upon this question was resolved in favor of the plaintiffs by the trial court, which found, as stated heretofore, that no sufficient amount of water was furnished by the defendant, and further found that, on or about the 15th day of May, 1919, the said defendant notified the plaintiffs that she was unable to furnish water sufficient to irrigate said lands, and directed said plaintiffs to cease planting rice therein. This finding is supported by testimony in the record.

[9] Under the findings, then, this court must conclude that the defendant did fail to comply with her contract. This leaves for our consideration the other objection made by appellant that the plaintiffs did not comply with their obligations under the contract in that they did not properly level and check the land, and that the checking which was done by them was not completed within the time allowed therefor. The contract provided that the land should be leveled and checked by April 1, 1919, and that the water should be furnished by May 1, 1919. The court found that the provision in the contract that the plaintiffs should level and check the land by April 1, 1919, was designed and intended by the parties to require the land to be leveled and checked in sufficient time to permit of the planting of same and the same being in readiness to receive the water so to be furnished by the defendant. The record contains testimony to the effect that several times the plaintiffs extended the time in which the defendant was to furnish the irrigation system. Assuredly, such extensions would, in equity, allow plaintiffs a corresponding increase in the time allowed them to complete their work of preparation for use of the water. At most, the dates for checking the land and for supplying the water were relative dates. The defendant's time to meet her obligation under the lease had been extended by the plaintiffs for a month and a half, and one of the plaintiffs testified that their work of checking and leveling had been done prior to May 1, except for a "little reinforcing here and there." It appears, therefore, that the plaintiffs' work had been done within the additional amount of time allowed the defendant to perform her part of the contract. There is absolutely nothing in the record to indicate that defendant was damaged or prejudiced in any way by the fact that the plaintiffs took this additional time in which to complete their work, and it clearly appears that the checking and leveling served no purpose and were not at all material until there was water to be used upon the land. We think, therefore, that there is no merit in this contention of the appellant.

[10] The testimony as to the character of the work done by the plaintiffs upon the land was in sharp conflict. Much of the record is devoted to this question, and it would serve no useful purpose to discuss the evidence. It is sufficient to say that the court found that the plaintiffs had gone upon the land, and in reliance upon the contract between them and the defendant had checked and leveled the whole thereof, and cultivated 100 acres thereof with what are known as disc cultivators, and drilled and seeded 60 acres thereof to rice. Appellant relies upon certain testimony in the record to the effect that what is known as the "square" checking system was more effective in irrigating than the "contour" system used by the plaintiffs. We think this becomes immaterial, because the plaintiffs were under no obligation to use any particular system, but only a system which was proper and customary in raising the crop they had undertaken to plant. There is testimony in the record by the witness Wiley, who had grown rice himself, and had had experience in this industry other than his own ranching, that the "contour" system of checking was used almost entirely for growing rice, and there is, in the record, the testimony of the witness Clegg, who stated that, although he considered the "square" check system better than the "contour" system, nevertheless, there was more rice planted by farmers in the "contour" system than in the "square" system, and that the checking done by the plaintiffs was a good job of "contour" checking.

Furthermore, one of the plaintiffs testified that the work which had actually been done upon the land, and for which recovery was sought, actually cost about $30 an acre, or a total of $4,800. There was other testimony in the record that this work would cost about $40 an acre. The plaintiffs recovered only $3,200, or the sum of $20 an acre, so it is apparent that, even though there may have been some defects in the work of checking and leveling done by the plaintiffs, the defendant was required to pay only the reasonable value of the work actually done.

There are no other matters requiring discussion, and the judgment is affirmed.

MURPHY v. DAVIDS et al. (SAN BERNARDINO NAT. BANK, Intervener).

(Civ. 3736.)

1. Judgment 🔑855(1) — Statute providing procedure for enforcement of judgment after five years construed; "action"; "special proceeding."

A procedure under Code Civ. Proc. § 685, providing for enforcement of judgment after five years by leave of court, or by judgment founded on supplemental pleadings, constitutes neither an "action" nor a "special proceeding" of a civil nature, within the meaning of those terms, nor is it in the nature of either, but is a mere subsequent step in an action or special proceeding already commenced, which is governed entirely, so far as to the time within which it may be taken, by the statute specially relating thereto.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Action; Special Proceeding.]

2. Judgment 🔑883(11)—Motion to offset outlawed judgments held not within scope of statute for enforcement of such judgments.

A motion to offset outlawed judgments against plaintiff's judgment, after having execution issued on such judgment by leave of court, held to call for an exercise of judicial power of the court where the motion is made, and not of the court from which execution issues, and is, in effect, an attempt to have it declared that the principal judgment against which the offset has been claimed has been satisfied, or to cause it to be satisfied, by means of the judgment sought to be offset, and is therefore not within the scope of proceedings authorized by Code Civ. Proc. § 685, allowing enforcement of judgment after lapse of five years.

3. Judgment 🔑883(11) — Power to set off judgments exists independent of statute.

The power to offset judgments exists independent of statute, and rests upon the general jurisdiction of courts over their suitors and processes.

4. Judgment 🔑883(12)—Set-off and counterclaim 🔑1 — Outlawed judgment cannot be used as set-off against claim.

The plea of set-off is in character a cross-action, and rests on a claim upon which the action could be maintained, and therefore a defendant who has acquired an outlawed judgment during the pendency of the action against him will not be permitted to set off that judgment against plaintiff's demand.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Action by M. A. Murphy against E. M. Davids and another, wherein the San Bernardino National Bank intervened. Judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying defendants' motion to offset certain judgments against plaintiff's judgment, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 181 Cal. 706, 186 Pac. 143.

A. L. Abrahams, P. B. D'Orr, and Paul W. Schenck, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Byron Waters, of San Bernardino, Anderson & Anderson and Victor T. Watkins, all of Los Angeles, and Ralph E. Swing, of San Bernardino, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendants from an order denying their motion to offset, against the plaintiff's judgment herein, certain judgments now owned by the defendants against the plaintiff. The judgment in this action recovered by the plaintiff against the defendants in the sum of $15,000 was entered on the 17th day of November, 1916. Thereafter the plaintiff assigned this judgment, one-fourth to Anderson & Anderson, one-third to the San Bernardino National Bank, and the balance to Elizabeth A. Murphy. This assignment was filed with the clerk of the superior court of Los Angeles county on November 29, 1916, and notation thereof was made in the register of actions in this case. On December 5th following, notation of the assignment was made in the judgment book, at the place of entry of the judgment. By subsequent assignment the interests of Anderson & Anderson and of Elizabeth A. Murphy passed to the San Bernardino National Bank. Notice that this judgment had been assigned and transferred to the San Bernardino National Bank was served on the defendant Davids on the 21st day of January, 1920, and on defendant Lindsay the next day thereafter. It is also claimed by the plaintiff and by the bank that the defendants, prior to May 14, 1917, had notice of the assignment of the judgment as made by Murphy, in this, that one Joseph Citron, an attorney of the defendants, was and became familiar with that assignment as shown through the aforesaid filing and notations thereof, and by reason of the further fact that he communicated this information to Paul W. Schenck, who also was an attorney of the defendants in this action. But the defendants, in reply to this claim of respondents, contended that Citron was not an attorney of the defendants and that he did not communicate to Schenck any information concerning said assignments.

The defendants appealed from the judgment. The judgment having been affirmed by the Supreme Court, remittitur thereon was issued on January 19, 1920. On that day four judgments against the plaintiff, Murphy, duly rendered and entered in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, were assigned and transferred to the defendants. Three of these judgments were entered in May, 1913, in favor of the Equitable Protection Company, plaintiff in those actions. The fourth judgment was entered October 23, 1914, in favor of the Western Pacific Railroad Company, plaintiff therein. The aggregate amount of these four judgments, exclusive of the interest thereon, was $11,466.55. At the time of the assignment of those judgments to the defendants, and at the time of the motion to offset those judgments against the judgment in this action, the said four judgments were wholly unpaid. On the 21st day of January, 1920, in each of said four actions in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, an order was made that execution issue "and that the plaintiff or its assign or assigns may proceed to enforce said judgment in the manner provided by law." On the same day, and in accordance with said orders, executions issued in said several actions. Thereafter, upon notice duly given, defendants presented their motion in this action for an order offsetting, against the judgment herein, the said judgments held by them. Opposition to the motion was duly made by the plaintiff and by the San Bernardino National Bank, which was allowed to intervene for that purpose. By order made August 14, 1920, the motion was denied.

The plaintiff and the bank set up in opposition to the motion that each of the said four judgments was barred by the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 336, of subdivision 1 of section 337, of subdivision 1 of section 338, of subdivision 1 of section 339, and by the provisions of section 343, all of the Code of Civil Procedure; that each and all of the claims based upon or arising out of said judgments and each of them, and any and all right to offset the same, or either or any of them, was barred by the provisions of said sections of the Code of Civil Procedure. The principal question of law raised by the record and discussed by counsel herein may be stated as follows: When a judgment in this state was rendered more than five years prior to the date of the motion for an order of the court in which such judgment was rendered, directing that execution issue thereon, and such order has been made, is such judgment the subject of offset against a judgment rendered within the five-year period? Maintaining that this question should be answered in the affirmative, appellants rely upon section 685 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that—

> "In all cases, the judgment may be enforced or carried into execution after the lapse of five years from the date of its entry, by leave of the court, upon motion, or by judgment for that purpose, founded upon supplemental pleadings. * * *"

Appellants contend that the foregoing section, by force of its provisions, keeps alive all judgments to such extent as to make them enforceable in every way except by new suit based thereon; that all that was lost by lapse of the five-year period of time was the right to enforce said judgments without an empowering order from the court. They contend that therefore the right of set-off survived. In this connection they point to the fact that the court in San Francisco not only directed that the executions issue, but further ordered, in each case, that the plaintiff or its assigns "may proceed to enforce said judgment in the manner provided by law." From this they insist that it logically follows that the right to offset exists because that is a manner of enforcement provided by law. Respondents, on the other hand, contend that section 685 merely provides a means of enforcing a judgment for the purposes of execution in the action itself; that it does not create or authorize any new action or proceeding by which a new or independent judgment can be procured; that it does not affect the running of the statute of limitations against any action or proceeding to revive it or give it a new or different effect; that it relates to or is confined to execution exclusively. They contend, further, that a motion to set off is a new and independent proceeding in another action than that in which the judgment sought to be set off was rendered, and is not merely in the nature of proceedings under an execution. From these premises they argue that any such action or motion is barred by the statute of limitations if not commenced within the period of limitation. The limitation particularly in point is the five-year limitation prescribed by subdivision 1 of section 336, Code of Civil Procedure, for the commencement of an action upon a judgment.

The proposition is not questioned that a judgment debtor has the right to acquire an existing judgment against his judgment creditor and to present it by motion in reduction or extinguishment of the judgment debt owed by him. The contention of respondents is that this right cannot be enforced in favor of the owner of an outlawed judgment debt.

[1] It must be conceded that, without the aid of the procedure authorized by section 685 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the judgments acquired by appellants herein could not be enforced against the judgment debtor. No execution could have been issued. An action on them could not have been successfully maintained. A procedure under section 685 constitutes neither an "action" nor a "special proceeding of a civil nature" within the meaning of those terms, nor is it in the nature of either.

> "It is a mere subsequent step in an action or special proceeding already commenced, which is governed entirely, so far as the time within which the same may be taken is concerned, by the provisions of the statute specially relating thereto." Doehla v. Phillips, 151 Cal. 488, 493, 91 Pac. 330.

[2] The answer which must be made to the concrete problem here presented depends upon the nature of the proceeding to offset a judgment. If that is an independent proceeding, extraneous to any exercise of power of the court which rendered the judgment sought to be enforced and out of which the process for enforcement has issued, then the motion to offset is not within the scope of such proceedings as are authorized by section 685 of the Code of Civil Procedure. We are of the opinion that a motion of this kind calls for an exercise of judicial power of the court where the motion is made, and not of the court from which the execution process issued. In effect it is an attempt to have it declared that the principal judgment (against which offset is claimed) has been satisfied, or to cause it to be satisfied, by means of the judgment sought to be offset. As illustrated in this case, it is an attempt to pay and satisfy a judgment by offsetting against it an outlawed judgment debt.

[3] Where such equitable relief is necessary, an action may be maintained to compel a set-off of mutual demands. This right exists, even though one of the opposing demands has not been reduced to judgment. Machado v. Borges, 170 Cal. 501, 150 Pac. 351. And, of course, the same kind of action would lie where both demands have been reduced to judgment. As to such judgments, the distinction between the powers of courts of equity and courts of law has ceased to be important. In every case the suitor has the right to ask for the set-off, and in every proper case as of right the motion should be granted. This is a power which exists independent of statute, and rests upon the general jurisdiction of courts over their suitors and processes. Haskins v. Jordan, 123 Cal. 157, 160, 55 Pac. 786. But the fact that this power may be invoked by motion, instead of by a separate action, does not change the nature of the proceeding, which, in any event, is one whereby the judgment debtor seeks to have the judgment against him satisfied by crediting to him an outstanding debt owned by him, against his judgment creditor.

Counsel for appellants have referred to Saunders v. Simms, 190 Pac. 806, as supporting their contention that their motion to set off judgments is not a special proceeding in the nature of an action, and that it comes within the scope of the proceedings allowed by section 685, Code of Civil Procedure. In that case Mrs. Saunders was the owner of a judgment against Albert S. Collins, of whose estate Simms was administrator. At the time of the death of Collins, more than five years had expired since the entry of the judgment. The plaintiff obtained from the superior court of San Bernardino county, where that judgment had been entered, an order granting permission to enforce the judgment "as provided by law against the estate of Albert S. Collins, deceased." A claim on the judgment was thereupon presented to the administrator. This claim having been rejected by the administrator, Mrs. Saunders instituted an action in the superior court of the county of Orange, where the probate proceedings were pending, to have the judgment adjudged to be a valid claim against the estate, to be paid in due course of administration. Judgment having been so made and entered, the administrator appealed, and this judgment was affirmed. In its decision the Supreme Court took into consideration the proceedings authorized by law for the collection of claims against estates. Section 1505, Code of Civil Procedure, directs that where a judgment debtor has died no execution shall issue on the judgment, but that it shall be presented to the executor or administrator like any other claim. Section 1498 provides that where a claim is rejected the holder may bring suit. Section 1504 declares that a judgment rendered against an executor or administrator upon any claim for money against the estate only establishes the claim in the same manner as if it had been allowed by the executor or administrator and the judge, and the judgment must be that the executor or administrator pay in due course of administration the amount ascertained to be due.

> "This is the method for enforcing a judgment after the death of a judgment debtor substituted by law in place of enforcement by writ of execution. It is the same procedure that would have been required after the death of the judgment debtor if the statute of limitations had not run on the demand. We see no reason why this sort of relief may not be granted under section 685, as well as that by issuance and levy of a writ of execution."

In answer to the contention that the action and judgment there in question were not authorized by the provisions of section 685, the court held that the word "execution," as contained in that section, is used in the broad sense of execution or carrying into effect by such means as are provided by law for the enforcement of various classes of judgments.

> "The suit to obtain judgment for payment of a claim in due course of administration is not, as appellant seems to think, an action to establish a new judgment liability, based upon the old, but, as set forth in section 1504 of the Code of Civil Procedure, only establishes the validity of the claim in the same manner as if it had been allowed by the administrator and approved by the court. Hall v. Cayot, 141 Cal. 13, 74 Pac. 299; Estate of More, 121 Cal. 638, 54 Pac. 148. And it is held that the allowance of a claim is not in any true sense a judgment. Morton v. Adams, 124 Cal. 229, 56 Pac. 1038, 71 Am. St. Rep. 53. There is nothing in Doehla v. Phillips, 151 Cal. 489, 91 Pac. 330, and other decisions cited by appellant, contrary to the view expressed. In the cases cited executions were issued because they happened to afford appropriate and adequate relief, but there is nothing to indicate that some other appropriate means for collecting the judgment could not be resorted to in a proper case. Section 685 is a limitation upon the operation of the statute of limitations under section 336 of the Code of Civil Procedure to the extent that it places within the discretion of the courts the power to authorize the enforcement by the ordinary processes provided by law of a judgment otherwise barred by the statute. That is what was done in this instance." Saunders v. Simms, 190 Pac. 806.

It may be conceded that some of the language used in Saunders v. Simms, if received without limitation to the facts of that case, and without respect to the controlling Code provisions relating to the enforcement of claims against estates, would tend to support the argument of appellants here; but, undoubtedly, the views there expressed had regard particularly to the fact that an action to enforce a judgment by establishing a claim thereon against a decedent's estate is merely the statutory method "substituted by law in place of enforcement by writ of execution." Viewed in that light, and considered as merely the allowance of a claim, and "not in any true sense a judgment," the so-called judgment was affirmed as constituting a valid method of enforcing the judgment and within the scope of the authority conferred by section 685. Nevertheless, we think that section 685 was never intended to serve any purpose other than as an aid to the enforcement of a judgment coming within its provisions by some procedure having its authorized source in the court which rendered the judgment. The power conferred by the section must be exercised either by means of an execution or "by judgment for that purpose founded upon supplemental pleadings." The case illustrated by Saunders v. Simms is an exception authorized by statute as a substitute for the execution authorized by section 685.

[4] The general rule remains unchanged that an action may not be maintained as against the plea of the statute of limitations upon a judgment against which that statute has run. Neither can a proceeding be maintained which has substantially the nature and effect of an action to obtain such judgment. The plea of set-off is in character a cross-action. It must rest upon a claim upon which an action could be maintained. A defendant who acquires an outlawed judgment during the pendency of an action against him would not be permitted to offset that judgment against the plaintiff's demand. This would be so because the allowance of such plea would, in effect, permit recovery upon a barred claim. We perceive no reason why such a defendant is entitled to obtain, by motion after judgment, relief which he could not obtain before judgment by pleading the same matter as a cross-demand in the action. Therefore we conclude that the order denying the motion of appellants herein should be sustained.

The views heretofore expressed render it unnecessary to make any statement of the evidence bearing upon the contention of respondents that Joseph Citron was an attorney of appellants in this action and that, through knowledge obtained by Citron in the course of his services rendered on their behalf in this case, appellants had notice of the assignment by Murphy of the judgment in this action, and that for that reason any rights which they may have against the plaintiff are subject to the rights of the San Bernardino National Bank as owner of the judgment in this action.

The order is affirmed.

MINAKER v. ADAMS et al., Members of the Board of Medical Examiners.
(Civ. 3850.)

1. Physicians and surgeons 🔑11(3) — Sole function of writ of review is to determine jurisdiction of Board.

Where the State Board of Medical Examiners has revoked a license to practice medicine and the practitioner has brought a writ of review, the only function of the writ is to determine whether the board exceeded its jurisdiction.

2. Physicians and surgeons 🔑11(3)—License to practice properly revoked for performance of criminal operation.

On review of action of the State Board of Medical Examiners revoking petitioner's license to practice on the ground that petitioner had procured an abortion upon a pregnant woman, evidence held to sustain a finding that the woman operated upon was in fact pregnant notwithstanding the admission of improper evidence upon such point.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Writ of review by May R. Minaker against Lemuel P. Adams and others. From a judgment of the superior court dismissing the writ and affirming proceedings of the Board of Medical Examiners in revoking petitioner's license to practice medicine, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Frank J. Hennessy, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Harry A. Encell, of San Francisco, and Frank M. Smith, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal from a judgment of the superior court dismissing a writ of review and affirming all the proceedings of the Board of Medical Examiners of the state of California in revoking appellant's license to practice medicine and surgery in the state of California.

The action of the Medical Board was taken after a hearing duly and regularly had upon a complaint charging appellant "with having been guilty of unprofessional conduct under the first subdivision of section 14 of the Medical Practice Act of the state of California, St. 1917, p. 93, by * * * procuring, aiding and abetting and attempting, agreeing and offering to procure a criminal abortion upon a pregnant woman * * * on or about the 28th day of May, 1919, in the city and county of San Francisco, state of California."

Appellant's contention is that the Medical Board received at the hearing considerable hearsay testimony and other evidence not admissible. Reliance is placed upon the case of Thrasher v. Board of Medical Examiners, 185 Pac. 1006, because of its holding that hearsay evidence is inadmissible in a proceeding such as this one. In the last-mentioned case, the appellate court annulled an order of the Medical Board revoking a license to practice medicine, which order was based solely upon improperly admitted evidence as to one essential element of the charge. That case involved the same charge as the instant case, and the opinion filed therein states that there was no sufficient evidence in the record before the Board of Medical Examiners upon an essential feature of the charge, i. e., the pregnancy of the woman upon whom the illegal operation was alleged to have been performed, and that the only evidence upon that question was evidence which should have been excluded under the "hearsay evidence" rule.

It is contended by the appellant here that because the Medical Board received some evidence upon the question of the pregnancy of the deceased, which evidence was inadmissible under the holding of the Thrasher Case, supra, that its order revoking appellant's license should be annulled.

[1] The only function of the writ of review in this case was to determine whether the board exceeded its jurisdiction, and the sole question reviewable by the superior court upon the proceedings before it and by this court upon this appeal is whether the Medical Board exceeded its jurisdiction, in making the order complained of. White v. Superior Court, 110 Cal. 60, 42 Pac. 480; Los Angeles v. Young, 118 Cal. 295, 50 Pac. 534, 62 Am. St. Rep. 234; Hitchcock v. Superior Court, 73 Cal. 295, 14 Pac. 872; Karry v. Superior Court, 162 Cal. 281, 122 Pac. 475, 128 Pac. 760; Fickert v. Zemansky, 176 Cal. 443, 168 Pac. 891; Camm v. Justice's Court, 35 Cal. App. 293, 170 Pac. 409. Respondents do not question the right of this court to review the evidence to ascertain whether there is in the record any legal evidence to sustain the findings of the board, and this is not a case presenting the exception suggested in the case of Lanterman v. Anderson, 36 Cal. App. 472, 172 Pac. 625, where the record of the proceedings before the board shows an entire absence of proper evidence, amounting in effect to a want of jurisdiction in the board to make the order. On the contrary, conceding the fullest possible force and effect to the language of the Thrasher decision, and the consequent inadmissibility of some of the evidence received by the board in the instant case upon the question of the pregnancy of the deceased at the time of her treatment by the appellant, there is, nevertheless, abundant proper evidence in the record that this condition existed.

This is to be found in the testimony of Dr. John R. Clark, autopsy surgeon in the coroner's office for the city and county of San Francisco, and in the testimony of Dr. Janus, who examined deceased when she was brought to St. Joseph's Hospital in a precarious condition. Dr. Clark testified that he had performed an autopsy upon the body of deceased on May 29, 1919. After a recital of the symptoms of peritoneal infection which his examination revealed, the doctor stated:

> "That he found that the uterus and appendages and the upper portion of the vagina had been removed. It didn't have the appearance of being the result of a typical surgical operation; these organs had been taken out evidently in a hasty, unskillful manner,—that is, they had been slashed out and partly torn out; no sutures were employed; no suture material was found. There was also a ragged perforation or slit in the bowel in the upper portion of the rectum, the large intestine or sigmoid."

A detective connected with the police department of San Francisco testified that he had called upon Dr. Minaker at her office with relation to this case, and that the doctor had handed him a specimen which was proven by other evidence to have been the uterus, tubes, and an ovary from the body of deceased, and that the doctor had told him that she thought this specimen was a tumor, and that it had been passed by deceased in the doctor's office while deceased was upon the operating table for an examination, and without anything having been done by the doctor. This specimen was brought from Dr. Minaker's office by the detective to Dr. Janus at St. Joseph's Hospital, where Dr. Minaker had caused the deceased to be sent after her collapse. Dr. Janus testified before the Medical Board, and stated in detail the condition of deceased at the time she was brought to the hospital; that the specimen from Dr. Minaker had been handed to him, and that he had examined it and had found that it consisted of uterus, tubes, ovary, and part of the vaginal wall. He stated positively that the uterus was a pregnant uterus. This specimen was later sent to Dr. Clark at the morgue, after he had performed an autopsy upon deceased. He examined it and stated before the board that the uterus "contained fœtal products; that fœtal products—that is, it contained a portion of the placental tissue." There was some other evidence properly admitted relevant upon this question, and it all stands uncontradicted in the record, for the appellant, although served with citation and a copy of the complaint, did not appear either in person or by counsel at the hearing.

[2] The above quoted testimony eliminates any question that might arise were there an entire absence of legal evidence in the record, as in the Thrasher Case, and it conclusively establishes the jurisdiction of the board to make the order complained of. Under such circumstances, any irregularity in the method of procedure in the matter of the admission of improper evidence will not be reviewed upon a writ of review. Lanterman v. Anderson, 36 Cal. App. 472, 172 Pac. 625; Jordan v. Alderson, 192 Pac. 170.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

1. Railroads 🔑350(22)—Contributory negligence of automobile driver held for jury.

Where the electric signal at a crossing did not indicate approach of a train, and trainmen did not ring bell or blow whistle, an automobile driver who looked and listened before driving upon track, but whose view in direction from which train was approaching was obstructed, held not negligent, as a matter of law, in attempting to cross.

2. Railroads 🔑324(1)—Automobile driver required to exercise ordinary care.

Automobile driver, before crossing track at crossing, was required to exercise merely ordinary care, and not the utmost care.

3. Negligence 🔑136(26)—Contributory negligence question for jury.

It is only where no fact is left in doubt, and no deduction other than negligence can be drawn by the jury from the evidence, that the court may say as a matter of law that contributory negligence is established.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Thomas C. Denny, Judge.

Action by Robert Cain against James C. Davis, substituted in place and stead of W. D. Hines, Director General of the Northwestern Pacific Railroad Company, a corporation. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

R. M. Barrett, of Santa Rosa, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. [1] The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendant to recover damages which he sustained by reason of being hit by one of the defendant's trains. The defendant answered, and a trial was had in the trial court by the court sitting with a jury. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant has appealed from the judgment, bringing up the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions. On this appeal the defendant contends that the evidence showed that the plaintiff was at the time of the accident, as a matter of law, guilty of contributory negligence, and that the judgment should be reversed. The accident occurred at the crossing of College avenue and the defendant's right of way in the city of Santa Rosa. The plaintiff was, at the time of the accident, on his way to his residence, and was entirely familiar with the route he was traveling, including the dangers, the signals, and the topographical conditions. College avenue intersects the defendant's right of way at an angle of about 45 degrees therewith. Buildings, fences, and trees on the plaintiff's left greatly obscured, if they did not wholly obscure, the plaintiff's view of the defendant's right of way. On plaintiff's right, and approximately on the eastern line of the defendant's right of way, the defendant had maintained a signal device, which consisted of an arm attached to a standing pole, capable of being dropped to a position at right angles to the pole supporting it, and which arm was lettered "Stop." As a part of this apparatus there was attached a wigwag. The apparatus was so constructed that when a train was approaching the crossing the arm could be dropped to a position horizontal with the road and the wigwag could be set in motion and kept in motion until the train had passed by. At the point of crossing there are three tracks, a side track, a main track, and then another side track.

When the plaintiff had driven his automobile to the railroad premises, another automobile was at a standstill in College avenue, and a freight train was moving to the south over the intersecting ways. The plaintiff stopped his car 65 feet east of the first track. The freight train passed down the track until the end of the last car, a caboose, was, according to some of the testimony, near the center line of College avenue. As the freight train came to a standstill the engine was making considerable noise discharging steam. The children riding with the plaintiff were making more or less noise talking among themselves. The plaintiff caused the children to be quiet that he might listen for the sound of trains. He listened for moving trains and heard no such sound. He looked to the right and looked to the left, and could see no approaching train, and, indeed, on the south he could see nothing because of the obstructions. When the freight train had come to a stop the automobile in front started up and moved rapidly across the tracks. Before the plaintiff proceeded he looked at the wigwag signal and it was still. He looked to his right and the way was clear. He looked to his left; his view was obstructed and he could see nothing; and he did not see anything till he passed the corner of the caboose, and then he saw the passenger train 20 feet away. No bell was rung, and no whistle was blown by a train approaching from the south. The plaintiff thereupon proceeded, and when he got onto the main track the collision occurred.

The defendant claims that these facts, as a matter of law, constituted contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff. To support his contention he cites Young v. Southern Pacific Co., 182 Cal. 369, 190 Pac. 36, and earlier decisions of that court. Of all of those cases it may be truly said that the facts were somewhat similar to those in the case at bar. But they were by no means identical. The appellant would have us disregard the nonaction of the wigwag in considering the question of contributory negligence of the plaintiff. Headley v. Denver & R. G. R. Co., 60 Colo. 500, 154 Pac. 731; Jacobs v. Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co., 97 Kan. 247, 154 Pac. 1023, L. R. A. 1916D, 783, Ann. Cas. 1918D, 384. Those cases are to the effect that the nonaction of the electrical device is to be classed with the failure to ring a locomotive bell and the failure to blow a locomotive whistle. They are to the effect that the nonaction of such a device would not excuse such a person as this plaintiff from performing the duty to stop, look, and listen when he is about to cross the track of a steam railroad.

[2, 3] However, an examination of the testimony above quoted will show at once that the record in this case does not show that the plaintiff neglected to perform that duty. The plaintiff was called upon to exercise ordinary care, and not the utmost care, and it is only where no fact is left in doubt, and no deduction other than negligence can be drawn by the jury from the evidence, that the court can say as a matter of law that contributory negligence is established. Zibbell v. Southern Pacific Co., 160 Cal. 237, 241, 116 Pac. 513. We think that under the facts shown by the record in this case we are not at liberty to say the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence.

The judgment is affirmed.

SHOULTS v. ALDERSON et al., Board of Medical Examiners. (Civ. 3924.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 5, 1921. Rehearing Denied Jan. 4, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 2, 1922.)

1. Parliamentary law 🔑5—Chairman's inaccuracy held not affecting mover's motion.

Where a motion that judgment be deferred 13 months, seconded and heard by all members of the Medical Board, was inaccurately stated by the chairman "to put on probation for 13 months," the mover's motion was the one voted on and carried.

2. Physicians and surgeons 🔑10 — Medical Board may continue its hearings.

Under Medical Practice Act, § 14, subd. 11, where the board of Medical Examiners acquires jurisdiction, it has power to continue its hearings from time to time, and under such authority might defer for months its judgment on charges against a petitioner of unprofessional conduct in unauthorizedly using degree letters and terms indicating license to practice systems for which he was not licensed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George E. Crothers, Judge.

Action by Robert G. Shoults against Harry E. Alderson and others, members of the State Board of Medical Examiners. From judgment of the Superior Court refusing to review an order of the Board, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Frank M. Carr, of Oakland, and H. W. Brunk, of Berkeley, for petitioner.

Harry A. Encell, of San Francisco, and Frank M. Smith, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the petitioner from a judgment of the superior court upon proceedings upon a writ of review, which judgment affirmed the proceedings of the respondents acting as the Board of Medical Examiners of the state of California.

The only question before this court upon this appeal is: Did the Board of Medical Examiners exceed its jurisdiction in making the order complained of? Section 1068, Code Civ. Proc.; Jordan v. Board of Medical Examiners, 192 Pac. 170. The facts pertinent to a determination of that question are:

Petitioner was duly and regularly licensed to practice as a "doctor of naturopathy" in the state of California on March 1, 1909, and continued to practice his profession until the action of the Board of Medical Examiners of which he complains. In May 1918, complaint and citation were served upon appellant under the provisions of the Medical Practice Act (St. 1917, p. 93). The complaint charged that appellant had been guilty of unprofessional conduct under the eleventh subdivision of section 14 of the Medical Practice Act of the state of California on or about the 11th day of May, 1918, in the county of Marin, state of California, by then and there using certain letters, terms, and abbreviations or words as affix and suffix to his said name, indicating that said Shoults was then and there entitled to practice the system or mode of treating the sick or afflicted in the state of California for which he was not licensed in the state of California. The citation required appellant to appear before the Board for a hearing on June 25, 1918. An answer was filed by appellant in which he denied being guilty of unprofessional conduct, but admitted having used the abbreviations "M. D." attached to his name upon his professional cards and stationery and upon a sign in front of his office, but alleged that such action on his part was not for the purpose of holding himself out to the public as entitled to practice a system of medicine which he was not licensed to practice, but that it was used because appellant had received the degree of medicinæ doctor from a legally chartered medical college of the state of Illinois and believed he had a right to use this degree after his name; that he had never practiced or held himself out as practicing any art of healing other than "naturopathy."

At the hearing appellant appeared by counsel and in person and admitted the use of the suffix complained of by the Board, whereupon he was found guilty of unprofessional conduct as charged in the complaint.

The attorney for Dr. Shoults stated that the doctor was willing to discontinue the use of the suffix to his name and asked that the Board consider that fact and dismiss the proceedings. The following then occurred:

"Dr. Smith: There is no desire on the part of the Board of hurting Dr. Shoults in any way, and if there is any way of his retaining his license, and confining his practice to the license which he has, I think there would be no intention or desire on the part of the board to interfere with him further.

"Mr. Jackson: He does consent to dropping the letters 'M. D.'

"President Phillips: All right, and defer judgment?

"Mr. Ward (attorney for Medical Board): Yes.

"Dr. Pinkham: I move that the judgment be deferred in the case of Dr. Shoults.

"President Phillips: Until when?

"Dr. Smith: I will make it 13 months that he be put on probation.

"Dr. Tasker: Second the motion.

"Mr. Ward: Do you consent to that? Do you understand that?

"Mr. Jackson: Yes; if he has not used the suffix 'M. D.' during that time it is all right, and if he does his license will be revoked.

"Mr. Ward: Yes.

"Dr. Smith: As covered by his naturopathic license, and he is supposed to conform to the limits of that license.

"Mr. Jackson: It is admitted that he does, and there is no evidence to the contrary. He simply used those letters believing he had a right to use them. He at no time operated as a doctor of medicine, and he simply used the initials, 'M. D.' after his name.

"President Phillips: Why would you object to this being deferred on condition that he conform in every way to the provisions of the Medical Practice Act?

"Mr. Jackson: It is rather a long-time sentence. I am satisfied he has never violated the law in regard to his mode of practicing, and there is no evidence that he has.

"Mr. Ward: I wouldn't go into that very much, Mr. Jackson.

"Mr. Jackson: All right, if the Board wants him to be put on probation, so to speak, for that period of time, we will agree to that.

"President Phillips: Any further remarks?

"Mr. Ward: Has the motion been put?

"President Phillips: No; it has not been put. The motion is then that the respondent be put on probation for 13 months. You have heard the motion, duly seconded. Are you ready for the question? All in favor will say 'Aye.'"

The motion was carried, unanimously, by the Board.

[1, 2] Appellant contends that because the chairman, in stating the motion, did so inaccurately, his language is to be looked to for the sense of the motion carried by the Board, and not the language of the mover and the intention of the member who seconded the motion as it was actually made. Starting from this premise, appellant argues that the motion carried by the Board is a judgment placing appellant upon probation for 13 months, which would be a penalty unauthorized by the Medical Practice Act, the source of respondent's power.

The power of the Board to inflict such a penalty upon one found guilty of unprofessional conduct is not a question presented to us upon this appeal, as we view the portion of the record hereinbefore set forth. We think the motion carried by the Board was that the judgment be deferred for 13 months. This was the motion seconded by Dr. Tasker and heard by all members of the Board who were present, and it is plain from the entire discussion that such was the motion intended to be carried and that was carried by the Board. This motion was not a final order or judgment; it was merely an order deferring the final judgment for a specified time. Assuredly, under the general powers given to the Board by the Medical Practice Act, it would have implied power to continue its hearings from day to day or for any other longer period which seemed to it convenient or desirable under the circumstances. Such power would be indispensable to the successful functioning of the Board in the method provided in the act, and would, consequently, be implied, if not expressed therein. Furthermore, the appellant expressly consented to such continuance.

When later it was brought to the attention of the Board that the appellant had violated his promise and was using the suffix "M. D." on his stationery, prescriptions, and labels for bottles, the secretary of the Board wrote to him stating that further hearing in the matter of the revocation of his license would be placed on the calendar for June 24, 1919. On that date appellant appeared before the Board in person and represented by an attorney. He was examined and admitted that since the prior hearing he had used stationery on which was printed his name with the suffix "M. D." Testimony was also given by another witness of further violations by appellant, in this particular, of the Medical Practice Act.

Upon such a showing the Board voted, unanimously, to revoke appellant's license. In inflicting this penalty the Board was merely pronouncing the deferred judgment which it was empowered to render at the first hearing.

We find no grounds for a reversal of the judgment of the superior court. The Board of Medical Examiners acquired jurisdiction of the appellant and of the subject-matter by the procedure prescribed in the Medical Practice Act, and it had power to continue its hearing, and to finally inflict the penalty which it did.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

HIBBERD v. McCOSKER. (Civ. 4009, 4010.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 7, 1921.)

1. Adverse possession ⟹31—Record owner must have notice, actual or constructive, of hostile claim.

The record owner must have notice, actual or constructive, that claimant's possession is hostile.

2. Adverse possession ⟹31—Possession of tract as lessee of larger inclosed tract including the smaller one insuffiicent notice of claim.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 325, as to inclosure, possession of a tract of land, not separately entirely fenced, by lessee of a larger inclosed tract including the smaller tract, does not operate as notice to the true owner that claimant holds possession of the smaller parcel under claim of right.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; A. B. McKenzie, Judge.

Actions by Alice H. Hibberd against James McCosker. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Harry E. Leach, of Oakland, for appellant.
Fred L. Button, of Oakland, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. These actions, which were consolidated and tried together upon the same evidence, were brought to determine ownership and possession of a certain tract of land consisting of 80 acres. The first action was one to quiet title; plaintiff alleging ownership and possession in herself and a wrongful claim to the same by defendant. The second action was a suit for possession of the land, wherein title was claimed by plaintiff and alleged wrongful possession by defendant.

At the trial plaintiff proved title by record based upon a United States patent. Defendant's claim of ownership and right to possession was based upon a possessory title. The trial court rendered judgment in favor of plaintiff, and defendant McCosker appeals.

The principal question involved is whether or not there was a substantial inclosure of the land by defendant as required by section 325, Code of Civil Procedure, sufficient to support his claimed title by adverse possession.

There is no conflict in the evidence upon this subject, and no question is raised as to the payment of taxes or the duration of the adverse holding. The evidence upon this subject shows that the land in dispute formed a portion of a thousand or more acre inclosure held by defendant from different owners under a lease. The 80-acre parcel in controversy, independent of the fencing of the entire tract, was not separately inclosed, and there were no fences thereon except on the south side, where natural barriers and a fence constituted a portion of the southern exterior boundary of the entire tract. Under these conditions it is the claim of appellant that the trial court was in error in holding that the fence around the larger leased field did not constitute an inclosure of the disputed parcel within the meaning of the statute. The character of the inclosure, therefore, is the main question involved.

[1] The adverse character of the possession necessary to bar the claim of one holding the record title must in every case be manifested to the owner. He must be notified in some way that the possession is hostile to his claim, or the statute does not operate against his rights. Mattes v. Hall, 28 Cal. App. 362, 152 Pac. 436. The notice of the hostile claim may be actual or constructive, but without it a true owner's title may not be tolled away by the possession of the adverse claimant.

[2] Ordinarily an inclosure gives notice of a hostile claim of ownership, but a different situation is presented where the holding, as here, is not of such an independent nature as would give the same degree of notice of a hostile claim.

It has been held in this state, following the doctrine laid down in Hall v. Gittings, 2 Har. & J. (Md.) 380, where possession was taken under a claim of title founded upon a written instrument, that where the inclosure relied upon was not separately entirely fenced, but was contained in an inclosure with other lands held under claim of title, there could be no good reason for requiring the claimant to subdivide the land claimed and make subinclosures therein as no such duty is evidenced by the statute. Botsford v. Eyraud, 148 Cal. 431, 434, 83 Pac. 1008. See, also, Urquide v. Flanagan, 7 Idaho, 163, 61 Pac. 514; Sanders v. Riedinger, 30 App. Div. 277, 51 N. Y. Supp. 937; Church v. Waggoner, 78 Tex. 200, 14 S. W. 581; 2 Corp. Jur. p. 64.

In the Botsford Case, however, the inclosure was much more extensive than the one here involved and included other lands of the occupant held under claim of title. It is conceded that, if appellant held possession of the larger tract as owner or under claim of title, and not as lessee, the rule there announced might apply, but it is insisted that the nature of appellant's holding did not in any manner indicate that defendant's possession was of such a character as to give notice to the world of his adverse claim thereto as evidenced by an inclosure sufficient to satisfy the statute.

Counsel have cited us to no case, and we have found none, where a tenant of a larger tract has been permitted to thus acquire a possessory title to a smaller parcel lying within his leased inclosure. Cases may be found in harmony with Botsford v. Eyraud, supra, holding that, where the claimant is the owner of the inclosed lands, he may maintain possessory rights to other lands within his inclosure, but some of these cases strongly indicate that his holding must be exclusive.

In Hamilton v. Fluornoy, 44 Or. 97, 74 Pac. 483, the inclosure relied upon was common to the claimant and others owning lands within its limits, and the use of the land, which consisted wholly in pasture of stock, was common as well to all; and it was held that, claimant's possession being neither actual or exclusive, it was therefore wanting in those essential elements of an adverse possession as would ripen into a full title.

So also in Walsh v. Hill, 41 Cal. 571, 582, where the general inclosure included not only the land in controversy, but other land not claimed exclusively by plaintiff, it was said:

> "It would be the extreme of assumption to maintain that this sufficed to subject the premises in controversy to the will and dominion of the then claimants of a portion thereof, to the exclusion of others, or to constitute an actual, exclusive possession of any claimant of a specific parcel within this general inclosure."

As indicating what is meant by an inclosure within the meaning of the statute the case of Doolittle v. Tice, 41 Barb. (N. Y.) 181, is illuminating. In referring to the subject it is said:

> "The provision of the Code referred to was intended to provide that a party claiming to hold adversely, where his claim was not founded upon a written instrument, or a judgment or decree, should protect his claim by the erection of a substantial inclosure. I think the language employed means that he shall provide the inclosure around the land, without relying upon a distant and remote fence of a neighbor, inclosing that neighbor's land also. And, although he may avail himself of a fence upon the line, yet it was not designed that a fence located far away from the premises and including other lands should be used as a means of protection to a claim of this character. It was also intended that the inclosure should provide fixed, certain and definite boundaries of the claim made, by which it might be designated, marked and known. It must be an inclosure lot alone, upon the lines claimed by the party, and not embracing premises adjoining, extending in part a great distance from the lines."

In keeping with this view we do not think that the possession of appellant as lessee of the larger tract was of such a character as to operate as notice to the true owner that he held possession of the smaller parcel under claim of right. Acts of one in possession should indicate clearly that he holds, not for the true owner, but for himself and in opposition to such owner. An owner has the right to be informed of the claim set up against him, either by acts or words, before the statute will run; and if the acts of the party in possession are of such a character as reasonably to indicate to the owner that the holding is not adverse, but in subordination to his title, the statute will not run. De Frieze v. Quint, 94 Cal. 653, 30 Pac. 1, 28 Am. St. Rep. 151; Mauldin v. Cox, 67 Cal. 387, 7 Pac. 804.

Here the holding under a lease by claimant of the larger tract upon which was maintained the fence relied upon to support appellant's claim might well have lulled plaintiff into the belief that appellant's possession as a mere lessee of the larger tract was the extent of his holding, and we do not consider that the holding here involved was sufficiently open and notorious to notify a prudent owner of its existence and of its hostile character so as to put him upon inquiry as to the title of the occupant.

While in a strict sense the land here involved might be said to be "inclosed," we do not think that it is such an inclosure as is contemplated by the statute, and that it does not meet the requirement of the statute, which contemplates an open, hostile possession.

We conclude, therefore, that the inclosure of the locus in quo was insufficient to put plaintiff upon inquiry as to the nature of appellant's alleged holding. Payne v. Gould, 74 Vt. 208, 52 Atl. 421.

Little stress is laid by counsel for the appellant upon the question of improvement and cultivation as affecting the necessity for inclosure, it being conceded by him that the real question involved and the one relied upon for reversal is the one here discussed, and the case was tried upon that theory.

The findings fully support the judgment.

For the reasons given, the judgment in each appeal is affirmed.

LUGO v. SUPERIOR COURT OF LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al. (Civ. 3772.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Dec. 7, 1921.)

Justices of the peace ⟹184—On appeal to the superior court from a default judgment in the justice's court questions of fact cannot be determined.

There can be no appeal on fact questions from a default judgment entered in a justice's court, and appellant cannot extend its scope by designating it as an appeal on questions of both law and fact, and the authority conferred upon the superior court by Code Civ. Proc. § 980, authorizes only a review of the justice's court's ruling and a remanding of the cause with directions to proceed in accordance with the superior court's decision.

Action by M. Lugo against George W. Hood and others in a justice's court. Defendants appealed to the Superior Court from a default judgment. Application by M. Lugo for a writ of certiorari to the Superior Court of Los Angeles County and Charles S. Burnell, Judge thereof, to review the judgment for defendants in said Superior Court. Judgment annulled, with instructions to the Superior Court to proceed in accordance with decision.

Robert F. Shippee, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Ralph C. Homan, of Chino, and Isaac Jones and Benjamin F. Warmer, both of Ontario, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. In an action of M. Lugo, Plaintiff, v. Geo. W. Hood et al., Defendants, in the justice's court of Venice township, in the county of Los Angeles, a judgment by default was entered against the defendants on the 2d day of February, 1921. Thereafter, and within due time, the defendants gave notice of appeal on questions of both law and fact, which appeal was duly perfected. Thereafter the case came on for hearing before the superior court. This is a proceeding to review a judgment entered by the superior court as the result of that hearing. The judgment recites that the parties appeared before the court by their attorneys, "and no testimony having been given on the part of either plaintiff or defendant, and defendants' Exhibit A having been filed, and the cause having been argued," the court ordered judgment for the defendants. Thereupon judgment was entered against the plaintiff and in favor of defendants for their costs.

Where a judgment upon default has been entered in a justice's court, there can be no appeal on questions of fact. The party appealing cannot extend the scope of his appeal beyond questions of law by designating the appeal as one upon questions of both law and fact. People v. County Court, 10 Cal. 19. The Supreme Court has held many times:

> "That, a new trial being a re-examination of an issue of fact, there can be no new trial of the cause in the superior court on appeal, unless there has been a trial of issue of fact in the justice's court. * * * We think it clear, therefore, that upon an appeal on questions of law alone, like the one here under review, the superior court can merely pass upon the questions brought before it on the appeal, and has no jurisdiction to try and determine the whole cause as if it had been transferred to that court upon an appeal upon questions of both law and fact." Maxson v. Superior Court, 124 Cal. 468, 57 Pac. 379, 471.

The authority conferred upon the superior court, as set forth in section 980 of the Code of Civil Procedure, authorizes the superior court, on an appeal of this kind, to review the rulings of a justice's court and to remand the cause, with directions to the lower court to proceed in accordance with the decision of the superior court. Maxson v. Superior Court, supra.

The judgment is annulled, with instructions to the superior court to proceed in the case in accordance with this decision.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 2, 1921.)

1. Sales 🔑429—No action can be based on an implied warranty where plaintiff was in default.

Plaintiff, buyer of automobile truck and trailer, claiming defendant seller's title was defective, could not recover for breach of implied warranty of title under Civ. Code, § 1765, where he failed to allege and prove performance on his part.

2. Sales 🔑123—Plaintiff not entitled to judgment in rescission when he was in default and had not tendered restoration.

In action by buyer of an automobile truck and trailer where plaintiff, claiming defendant seller's title was defective, was in default at the time of his attempt to rescind and had not complied with Civ. Code, § 1691, providing that a rescinding party must, if able to do so, restore or offer to restore everything of value received he was not entitled to a judgment in rescission.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; M. F. McCormick, Judge.

Action by L. S. Russell against T. H. Penniston and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Collins & Collins and Savage & Lovejoy, all of Fresno, for appellant.

Frank Kauke, of Fresno, for respondent Fresno Inv. Co.

Frank L. Simons, of Fresno, for respondent Penniston.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendants to recover damages for alleged fraud. The Fresno Investment Company appeared and answered and filed a cross-complaint. The parties stipulated that the answer of the Fresno Investment Company stand as the answer of the defendant Penniston, and that the allegations of the cross-complaint be considered as denied. A trial was had by the court sitting without a jury, judgment went for the defendants, and the plaintiff has appealed. The appellant claims that the findings made by the trial court are not supported by the evidence. In this contention we think that the appellant is entirely in error. To make that remark clear it becomes necessary to state the issues and the findings made thereon. In his complaint the appellant inserted two counts. The first count has reference to an automobile truck, and the second count has reference to an automobile trailer. The allegations of the second count are parallel with the allegations in the first count. The allegations of the first count are, among other things, that on the 25th day of August, 1919, the defendant Penniston represented that he was the owner of the truck; that, relying upon such representation, the plaintiff purchased the truck under a conditional sales contract which is attached as an exhibit, and which appears on its face to be a contract to buy and sell, which provides for certain deferred payments, including $200 for the month of November, and $200 for the month of December, and which provides that the title is to remain in the seller until the truck is fully paid for; that the plaintiff believed, relied on, and acted on said representations; that Penniston was not at said time the owner, but that George B. Henderson was such owner; that plaintiff made installment payments aggregating $381.79; that on the 26th day of August, 1919, the defendant Penniston assigned the contract to the defendant Fresno Investment Company; that to secure an installment falling due in October, 1919, the plaintiff executed to the Fresno Investment Company his note in the sum of $198.93, and a mortgage to secure the same; that on the 3d day of January, 1920, the said George B. Henderson asserted his title to the truck, and that the plaintiff called upon the defendant Penniston to defend the plaintiff's title, and that Penniston has refused and neglected to do so; that the plaintiff has done and performed all things, etc.; that on or about the 12th day of January, 1920, the plaintiff rescinded the contract of purchase and demanded his moneys back and the cancellation of the note and mortgage. Similar allegations are in the complaint as to the trailer. The complaint prays that the contract to purchase be canceled, that the plaintiff recover $381.79 moneys paid, and that his note and mortgage for $198.93 be surrendered and canceled. The cross-complaint by appropriate allegations, among other things, sets forth the nonpayment of certain installments and asks judgment for the amount of the unpaid installments. The trial court made findings in defendants' favor. It found:

> "That neither at nor prior to the execution of said contracts were there any express representations, promises, or statements by the said T. H. Penniston relative to said truck and trailer or either thereof, or relative to the ownership thereof."

As to what transpired when Henderson made his claim, the court found:

> "That the plaintiff thereupon informed the said Fresno Investment Company that the said demand had been made by the said George B. Henderson, and that the said plaintiff had delivered the said truck and trailer to the said George B. Henderson, but said plaintiff did not demand of the said T. H. Penniston, nor of the said Fresno Investment Company, that he, it, or they defend the title to said truck or trailer, but the said Fresno Investment Company did thereupon begin proceedings to recover for the plaintiff the said truck and trailer and the said Fresno Investment Company did recover same from the said George B. Henderson and, without delay after regaining possession of said truck and trailer, to wit, on or about the 3d day of February, 1920, the said Fresno Investment Company requested the plaintiff to take and receive said truck and trailer and to pay the amounts then due and unpaid as installments on the aforesaid contracts so made by the plaintiff and which had been so assigned to and were held and owned by said Fresno Investment Company."

The court also found:

> "On November 25. 1919. other installments of principal, amounting to $240 became due to the said Fresno Investment Company on said contract, and on December 25, 1919, other and further installments amounting to $240 became due to the said Fresno Investment Company on said contract," and that they have not been paid.

Again it found:

> "That the plaintiff never rescinded said contracts or either thereof, nor did he notify the Fresno Investment Company of any rescission or claim of rescission on his part."

As to the above finding on fraud the evidence is all in favor of the defendants. The same remark is true as to the finding as to plaintiff's default regarding payments. As to the finding regarding rescission it may be said that the evidence is conflicting, but there is substantial evidence in the record to support that finding and each and every other finding made by the trial court.

[1] The appellant now asserts that in drawing his pleading he was relying upon the benefit of an implied warranty. Civ. Code, § 1765. If we view his pleading from that angle, he is not entitled to recover. Standing on his contract together with the implied warranty read into it, he was not entitled to maintain an action upon the contract except that he alleged in his complaint and proved at the trial that he had performed on his part. As shown above, he was decidedly in default in November and December of 1919, and remained in default down to the time that he commenced this action.

[2] Neither was the plaintiff entitled to a judgment in rescission because he was in default at the time he claimed he attempted to rescind. Fairchild, etc., Co. v. Southern, etc., Co., 158 Cal. 264, 273, 110 Pac. 951. Furthermore, he was not entitled to rescind except that he complied with the provisions of section 1691 of the Civil Code, and the findings are to the effect that he did not do so.

By reason of the conclusions which we have reached, and which we have stated above, it is not necessary to touch on many of the other matters contained in the briefs.

Frank Kauke, of Fresno, for respondent Fresno Inv. Co.

STURTEVANT, J. This is an action brought to foreclose a mortgage; the plaintiff had judgment, and the defendant appealed. The plaintiff's complaint is in the ordinary form to foreclose a mortgage. The note and mortgage therein set forth are the note for $198.93 and the mortgage securing the same, which are referred to in the opinion this day filed, Russell v. Penniston et al., 203 Pac. 813. In his answer the defendant, Russell, set forth certain denials. Then, as his first affirmative defense, he alleged, in slightly different language and in a consolidated form, the allegations set forth in the first count and the second count of the complaint in Russell v. Penniston, supra, and added the further averments that the note and mortgage were given to secure the payment falling due on October, 1919, and not otherwise. The defendant then pleaded in abatement the pendency of that case, Russell v. Penniston. The trial court tried the instant case at the same time with the case entitled Russell v. Penniston, supra. Thereafter it made findings in which all of the material allegations were found in favor of the plaintiff, and judgment was entered accordingly. At this time the appellant specially presents his plea in abatement based on another action pending. It will be noted that the plaintiff in this action was one, and only one, of the defendants in the other case. It wil be noted also that this case is an action to foreclose a mortgage, and that the other case, Russell v. Penniston, is not an action to foreclose a mortgage, but that it is an action sounding in fraud and to cancel the note and mortgage which this action is brought to foreclose. Section 430, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that a defendant may demur:

> "* * * 3. That there is another action pending between the same parties for the same cause. * * *"

Section 433 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides:

> "When any of the matters enumerated in section 430 do not appear upon the face of the complaint, the objection may be taken by answer."

Such is the language of the Code concerning this plea in abatement. The principle on which the plea is sustained is that the law will not permit a defendant to be harassed and oppressed by two actions for the same cause where the plaintiff has a complete remedy by one action. But in the instant case one of the harassing actions complained of was commenced by the appellant. In the case of Smith v. Smith, 134 Cal. 117, at page 119, 66 Pac. 81, at page 82, the court said:

> "The plea of another suit pending will be sustained only when the plaintiffs are the same (Felch v. Beaudry, 40 Cal. 439), and when the cause of action is the same in each suit—when, in fact, the same evidence would support the judgment in each case."

See, also, Vance v. Olinger, 27 Cal. 358, 359; Montgomery v. Harrington, 58 Cal. 270, 274; Martin v. Splivalo, 69 Cal. 611, 615, 11 Pac. 484; Hall v. Susskind, 109 Cal. 203, 205, 41 Pac. 1012.

It is clear that the defendant's plea was not well founded.

The other points pertinent to any issue made on this appeal have been disposed of in the opinion Russell v. Penniston, supra.

We find no error in the record.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: LANGDON, P. J.; NOURSE, J.

PEOPLE v. SMITH. (Cr. 822.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Nov. 25, 1921.)

1. Homicide 🔑338(1)—Admission of evidence of poison in stomach not identified as that of deceased held prejudicial error.

In a prosecution for murder, the admission of evidence of finding poison in a stomach which was not identified as belonging to the deceased was prejudicial error.

2. Criminal law 🔑469—Question to physician whether he performed an autopsy of deceased objectionable as involving conclusion.

In a prosecution for murder, question to a physician as to whether he had performed an autopsy on the deceased was objectionable on the ground that it involved a conclusion, since the doctor was not shown to have been acquainted with the deceased, and there was no evidence to show that the body was that of deceased.

3. Criminal law 🔑404(2), 419, 420(10)—Evidence that body on which physician performed autopsy was that of deceased held hearsay and insufficient for introduction of results.

In prosecution for murder, testimony of a physician who had performed an autopsy on a body that he had been told by the undertaker's attendant was the body of S., the deceased, was hearsay and insufficient to lay a foundation for the introduction of the contents of the stomach taken from the body, for the purpose of showing that deceased died of cyanide poisoning.

4. Criminal law 🔑419, 420(1)—"Hearsay evidence" defined.

"Hearsay evidence" is evidence which does not derive its force solely from the credit to be given to the witness himself, but rests also in part on the veracity and competency of some other person.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Hearsay Evidence.]

5. Criminal law 🔑404(2)—Evidence held insufficient to establish that a stomach of the body on which an autopsy was performed was that of deceased.

In prosecution for murder, where an autopsy was performed on a body, the stomach of which contained poison, together with pieces of potato and bread, pickles, and tomato seeds, the fact that vegetables corresponding to those were found in the cooler of deceased's home shortly after her death does not furnish a reasonable basis of the identification of the stomach as that of deceased.

6. Criminal law 🔑404(2)—Names 🔑18—Rule that from identity of names identity of person may be presumed held not applicable to identify stomach as that of deceased.

In prosecution for murder, where an autopsy was performed on a body reported by an undertaker's attendant to the physician to be that of the deceased, the rule that from identity of names the identity of person may be presumed is not applicable so as to identify the stomach of the body on which the autopsy was performed as that of the deceased.

7. Criminal law 🔑404(3)—Admission of can of cyanide as circumstantial evidence of poisoning held erroneous.

In prosecution for murder by poisoning, evidence that the defendant had access to a room, together with other employees, in which was situated a can of cyanide, which was found a few days after the death of deceased with the top covered with a heavy coating of dust, and without evidence that the defendant ever saw the can or had knowledge of its presence, was an insufficient foundation for the introduction of the can of cyanide in evidence, and its introduction was prejudicial error.

8. Criminal law 🔑338(4, 5)—If circumstantial evidence is introduced the facts therein must be connected with the defendant.

If circumstantial evidence is introduced to connect defendant with a criminal act, circumstantial facts themselves must be connected with the defendant.

9. Criminal law 🔑344, 552(2)—Opportunity to commit crime merely a circumstance from which guilt may be conjectured.

The fact that an accused person had an opportunity to commit the crime with which he is charged is of itself only a circumstance from which, with other circumstances, guilt may be conjectured or inferred, and an incriminating circumstance from which guilt may be inferred must not rest on conjecture.

10. Homicide 🔑169(7)—Admission of letter of letter of accused in evidence held proper.

In a prosecution of a husband for the murder of his wife, a letter written over a year before the wife's death, in which the accused stated that he did not love his wife as a husband should and that he had had illicit relations with other women, regardless of a subsequent cohabitation of the accused and his wife, was properly admitted in evidence as showing that the accused would be more likely to commit the crime than if he had been a loyal husband.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Sidney N. Reeve, Judge.

Raymond W. Smith was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals. Reversed.

Anderson & Anderson, of Sacramento, and E. S. Patterson, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Arthur Keetch, Deputy Atty. Gen., and John W. Maltman, of Los Angeles, for the People.

FINLAYSON, P. J. Defendant, who was charged with the murder of his wife, Mary Edla Smith, was convicted of murder in the first degree, was sentenced to life imprisonment, and now appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The evidence is entirely circumstantial. The theory adopted by the prosecution at the trial was that the alleged homicide was perpetrated by means of cyanide administered by defendant to his wife on or about March 14, 1921, at their home at Bell Station, a suburb of Los Angeles. The principal points made for a reversal are that the court erred (1) in permitting the prosecution to give evidence of the contents of a certain stomach, in the absence of legal evidence to identify it as the stomach of defendant's deceased wife, and (2) in permitting the people to put in evidence a certain can of cyanide found in a part of the establishment where defendant was employed.

On the afternoon of Monday, March 14, 1921, the body of defendant's wife was found in a sitting position in a chair in the living room of her home at Bell Station. The remains were immediately removed to an undertaking establishment conducted by one G. G. Wheat at Huntington Park, a small town near Los Angeles, where the body was embalmed and prepared for burial. The following day defendant and the mother of the deceased requested that the body be taken to an undertaking establishment in Los Angeles conducted by a man of the name of Brown. Wheat testified that the body was "removed by Mr. Brown," supposedly the Los Angeles undertaker. What became of it after it was "removed by Mr. Brown" is a matter that is left by the evidence in the airy regions of speculation. Dr. Wagner, the county autopsy surgeon, who had not known Mrs. Smith in her lifetime and probably had never heard of her before her death, called as a witness for the prosecution, was permitted to testify, over defendant's strenuous objection, that he had performed an autopsy "upon the body of Mary Edla Smith" at "the morgue of W. A. Brown, Los Angeles," on March 15, 1921. This witness further testified that, from the body of the person whom he referred to as "Mary Edla Smith," he had removed the stomach, a part of the liver, the spleen, and the left kidney. The doctor testified that he placed these organs, unwrapped, in a pasteboard box. and delivered the box and its contents to Professor Arthur R. Maas, a chemist and toxicologist, who, for five years or more, had been doing work for the county coroner's office. Professor Maas testified that he received from Dr. Wagner, on March 15, 1921, a pasteboard box which Dr. Wagner told him contained the stomach of Mary Edla Smith, which name the witness wrote upon the box. Professor Maas then took the box to his office, where he subsequently opened it, discovering therein a stomach only, wrapped in paper. The contents of this stomach he subsequently analyzed, finding in it a mixture of sodium cyanide with possibly some potassium cyanide, together with pieces of potato and bread, some vegetable matter which the witness decided was pickle, and some seeds which he decided were tomato seeds.

[1] It was upon the contents of this stomach that the entire case for the prosecution rested. It was the sole basis for Dr. Wagner's opinion that the person from whose body it was taken had died of cyanide poisoning. It was the sole basis for the evidence given by Professor Maas and the other experts who testified as to the character of the stomach contents. Defendant's counsel repeatedly, but ineffectively, objected to the introduction of any evidence respecting the contents of this stomach upon the ground that no evidence had been introduced to identify it as that of Mary Edla Smith, of whose murder defendant was accused. If there was no legal evidence to identify it as the stomach of defendant's deceased wife, then, manifestly, to permit the prosecution, over defendant's timely objections, to introduce evidence of its contents was not only error but highly prejudicial error. That there was no such identifying evidence is made clear by the testimony given by Dr. Wagner and others, as the following will show.

[2] There was no direct evidence that the body of defendant's wife ever reached Brown's undertaking establishment. Wheat testified, as we have seen, that the body was removed "by Mr. Brown." That is the sole evidence as to what became of the body after it was taken by Wheat to his establishment. But, aside from this manifest hiatus in the identifying testimony, there is no legal evidence that the body upon which Dr. Wagner performed the autopsy was that which had been removed from Wheat's place. Though Dr. Wagner had not known Mrs. Smith in her lifetime, the only evidence as to the identity of the body from which he removed the stomach, spleen, a part of the liver, and the left kidney is that given by Dr. Wagner himself, to whom, on direct examination, this question was propounded by the district attorney: "I will ask you whether you performed an autopsy upon the body of Mary Edla Smith?" Counsel for defendant immediately objected to the question upon the ground that it called for the conclusion of the witness, in that there was no evidence that the witness ever knew Mary Edla Smith. The objection should have been sustained. At the time when the question was propounded to Dr. Wagner, no evidence whatever, hearsay or otherwise, had been adduced to show that the body was in fact that of Mary Edla Smith. In the course of the doctor's cross-examination, that witness, as we presently shall show, did give hearsay evidence to the effect that the person from whose body he removed the stomach was Mary Edla Smith. But, as we have just stated, at the time when the district attorney propounded to Dr. Wagner, on his direct examination, the question to which defendant's counsel made the objection last noted, no evidence of any kind whatever had been given or suggested to show that the witness had any knowledge of the identity of the person concerning whose stomach he was asked to testify. This notwithstanding, defendant's objection was overruled, and the witness answered the question in the affirmative, saying, in effect, that he had performed an autopsy on the body of Mary Edla Smith at the morgue of W. A. Brown on March 15, 1921.

> "Q. Now, all you know as to this being the body of Mrs. Smith was what somebody told you, was it? A. Certainly.
> "Q. Who told you? A. The undertaker—yes; the undertaker.
> "Q. The undertaker? A. Yes.
> "Q. You have no knowledge on earth except what was told you by the undertaker? A. No, sir.
> "Q. Which undertaker told you? A. It was not the undertaker himself either. It was one of the attendants.
> "Q. Who was he? A. Mr. Taylor, I think it was, at the time.
> "Q. And so far as you know, that is, you never had seen her before? A. I had not.
> "Q. And you have never seen the body since? A. No, sir.
> "Q. And never talked with any other person, except this undertaker, who knew the identity of that particular body? A. I did not."

Neither the "Mr. Brown" nor the "Mr. Taylor" referred to by the witness was called to the stand. The sole evidence, therefore, tending to identify the stomach whose contents were examined by the experts was this testimony of Dr. Wagner that one Taylor, an attendant in Brown's undertaking establishment, had told him that the body upon which he operated was that of Mrs. Smith. This testimony was hearsay—that and nothing more; and was manifestly insufficient to lay the foundation for the introduction over defendant's objection, of the contents of the stomach regarding which Dr. Wagner and Professor Maas testified.

Dr. Wagner, who did not personally know the deceased, in the nature of things could not personally know that the body was that of Mary Edla Smith. Consequently, his testimony that an attendant in Brown's undertaking establishment had told him that the body was that of Mrs. Smith could only place before the jury the statement of one, not under oath, who, being absent, could not be subjected to the ordeal of cross-examination. There is no evidence whatever that Taylor, the attendant from whom the doctor received the hearsay, ever knew the deceased, or that he had any means for knowing that the body which he pointed out to Dr. Wagner as that of Mary Edla Smith was in fact the body of that person. That the question propounded to Dr. Wagner asking him whether he had "performed an autopsy upon the body of Mary Edla Smith" called for hearsay evidence, that is, evidence "which does not derive its force solely from the credit to be given to the witness himself, but rests, also, in part, on the veracity and competency of some other person" (1 Greenleaf. Ev. par. 99; 1 Phil. Ev. 169), is as self-evident as any truism. The general rule, subject to certain well-established exceptions as old as the rule itself—applicable in civil cases, and therefore to be rigidly enforced where life or liberty is at stake—was stated in Queen v. Hepburn, 7 Cranch, 290, 295 (3 L. Ed. 348), to be:

> "That hearsay evidence is incompetent to establish any specific fact, which fact is in its nature susceptible of being proved by witnesses who speak from their own knowledge."

The facts of the present case, in so far as the identification of the body rests upon hearsay, bear a striking analogy to those presented in Hopt v. Utah, 110 U. S. 574, 4 Sup. Ct. 202, 28 L. Ed. 262. What was said by Mr. Justice Harlan in that case is equally applicable here, and for the reasons there so lucidly stated, the identification of the stomach concerning which Dr. Wagner and Professor Maas were allowed to testify must be held to be incomplete, and the evidence as to its contents must be held to have been erroneously admitted.

[5] The fact that the mother of the deceased found in the "cooler," shortly after the death of her daughter, certain vegetables which corresponded with those which Professor Maas testified to having found in the stomach that he examined, does not rise to the dignity of a circumstance from which it may reasonably be inferred that the stomach was indeed that of Mrs. Smith. These vegetables are very common articles of diet, and doubtless could be found in the stomachs of a large percentage of persons in every community. There is nothing so peculiar about this fare that it should furnish any reasonable basis for the identification of this "hearsay stomach"—if we may borrow the felicitous phrase employed by counsel for appellant to characterize that portion of the human anatomy concerning which Dr. Wagner and Professor Maas were permitted to testify.

[6] It is falteringly suggested by the Attorney General, but, to his credit be it said, not insistently urged, that, peradventure, the case falls within the rule that identity of person may be presumed, prima facie, from identity of name. That is, it is suggested that, in some vague way not made clear to us, the identity of this stomach is established, prima facie, by the application of the rule that a presumption of identity of person arises from an identity of name. It is too clear for argument that this rule of evidence can find no room for application here. The rule would have been applicable if, for example, Dr. Wagner had testified that he knew a woman of the name of Mary Edla Smith, and that he had removed the stomach from the body of that person; for, under such a supposititious state of facts, there would be a prima facie presumption that the person whom Dr. Wagner had known as Mary Edla Smith, and from whose body he removed the stomach after death, was the same Mary Edla Smith who, in her lifetime, was the wife of this defendant. But Dr. Wagner did not know Mary Edla Smith. He made no pretense of ever having known or seen a person reputed to bear that name. Nor is there any evidence that Taylor, the attendant at Brown's undertaking establishment and Dr. Wagner's sole informant, ever knew any person of the name of Mary Edla Smith. There is no evidence that Taylor possessed any knowledge whatever that might tend to identify the body which he pointed out to Dr. Wagner as that of Mrs. Smith. It follows, therefore, that the testimony of Dr. Wagner that it was Mrs. Smith's body from which he took the stomach is based on rank hearsay, and clearly was inadmissible.

[7] It was error to permit the state to introduce, over defendant's objection, the can of cyanide. For some months prior to the date of the alleged homicide, a can of cyanide had been in the filing room of the company for which defendant was working as a truck driver. This room was used by the company as a place for the filing and grinding of saws and other tools. The mill foreman, called as a witness for the prosecution, testified that the can of cyanide was kept in a corner of the filing room, and that it was put there a little over a year before by one C. A. Ward, the company's filer. The witness further testified that he saw the can in its place in the corner of the filing room four or five days after the alleged homicide; that he then removed it and gave it to the detectives working on the case; that at that time there was dust—lumber dust and dirt dust—a sixteenth of an inch thick covering the top of the can; that a workbench runs up to within 2 or 3 feet of the corner where the can was kept; that the can sat on a shaft bearing, 12 inches from the floor; and that the bench is considerably higher than the can's resting place. The witness testified that he had seen defendant come in and go out of the filing room at a time when the latter was repairing trucks, but would not say when it was that he thus saw the accused go in and come out of the room, stating that he could not fix the time within six months. Upon this showing the trial court, over defendant's vigorous objection, admitted the can of cyanide in evidence as an exhibit for the prosecution.

[8] Without doubt, it is the general rule that evidence that the accused had in his possession the means to commit the crime, or had an opportunity to do so, is ordinarily admissible when the evidence against him is entirely circumstantial. In applying this rule, however, caution should be exercised to avoid giving any undue significance to circumstances that are but the ordinary incidents of everyday life. The fact that the very existence of a prosecution tends to throw suspicion upon every act of the accused and to cause "trifles light as air" to assume the appearance of "confirmations strong as proofs of Holy Writ" should give pause to any heedless imprudence in the admission in evidence of circumstances that are barren of incriminating significance. As is well said by the learned author of Wharton's Criminal Evidence (volume 2, § 915):

> "Circumstances, trivial in themselves, take on an exaggerated character the moment that suspicion is directed toward a person accused of a crime; and, because of this tendency, no circumstances should be admitted that cannot be shown to have a direct and obvious relevancy to the crime charged."

That the introduction of the can of cyanide as an exhibit for the prosecution was highly prejudicial cannot be gainsaid for a moment; but that it in any appreciable degree tended to show that the defendant used any of its poisonous contents to do away with his wife must be denied. The attenuated circumstance that a can such as this, behind concealing obstructions, was in the corner of a room used by defendant's employer as a filing room, and to which the company's employees, including defendant, had access, with no evidence whatever that defendant ever saw the can or had any knowledge that it was in the room, is not sufficient to justify the inference that he availed himself of this possible means for administering poison to his wife, particularly when we consider that the top of the can, at the time when the mill foreman saw it some four or five days after the supposed homicide, was covered with dust to a depth of one-sixteenth of an inch. It was not shown that the defendant had any more connection with this can of cyanide than he would have had with a similar can sitting on a drug store shelf. If circumstantial evidence is introduced in a criminal case to connect the defendant with the criminal act, the circumstantial facts themselves must be connected with the defendant, or they will be incompetent as evidence. People v. Kennedy, 32 N. Y. 141. There was nothing that connected this defendant with the can that did not equally connect all of his coemployees therewith; and if the presence of the can in the corner of the filing room attached any suspicion to defendant, it equally implicated all the other employees who had access to the room.

[9] Unless it be shown that defendant had knowledge of the presence of the can in the filing room, its existence there is a circumstance of no evidentiary value whatever. That defendant, at any time, had knowledge of the existence of the can is a matter of pure conjecture. But the fact that an accused person had an opportunity to commit the crime with which he is charged is of itself only a circumstance from which, with other circumstances, guilt may be conjectured or inferred; and it is the established rule that an incriminating circumstance from which guilt may be inferred must not rest on conjecture. It is not permissible to pile conjecture upon conjecture. We cannot build one inference upon another. U. S. Cement Co. v. Whitted, 46 Ind. App. 105, 90 N. E. 481. "* * * One conjecture cannot be treated as a proved fact in order to reach another conjecture." Cohn v. Saidel, 71 N. H. 558, 53 Atl. 800. "An inference of fact," says the author of the article on evidence in Corpus Juris, "should not be drawn from premises which are uncertain, but the facts upon which an inference may legitimately rest must, it is said, be established by direct evidence as if they were the very facts in issue." 22 C. J. p. 84. See, also, United States v. Ross, 92 U. S. 281, 23 L. Ed. 707; Thayer v. Smoky Hollow Coal Co., 121 Iowa, 121, 96 N. W. 718; and Chamberlayne on the Modern Law of Evidence, vol. 2, § 1029. In Thayer v. Smoky Hollow Coal Co., supra, the court, employing the word "presumption" in the sense of an inference of fact, said:

> "But it is said that from the evidence to which we have referred it should be inferred that defendant had knowledge of the defect. This it seems to us is pushing the doctrine of presumption at least one step too far. * * * A presumption can arise only from facts actually proven by direct evidence. A presumption is not a legitimate foundation for a presumption. If this were not true, there would be no limit to conjecture."

Were the rule otherwise, the very defect of proof which renders it necessary to call in the aid of one collateral circumstance would equally inhere in the other collateral circumstance, and the infirmity which attached to the one would attach to the other. It would, said Chief Justice Denio, in People v. Kennedy, supra, be "like the blind leading the blind." The rule, as stated by the New York court in the Kennedy Case, is that—

> Circumstantial evidence "consists in reasoning from facts which are known or proved, to establish such as are conjectures to exist; but the process is fatally vicious if the circumstance from which we seek to deduce the conclusion depends itself upon conjecture."

For these reasons we are of the opinion that the evidence of the presence of the can of cyanide in the filing room was too remote from the point in issue to have any probative force, and that its admission in evidence was prejudicially erroneous.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order denying defendant's motion for a new trial must be reversed. The assignments of error, however, present at least one other question of importance, which, as it is likely to arise upon another trial, we deem it proper to examine.

[10] The court overruled defendant's objection to the introduction of a letter written by him and mailed to his wife about August 1, 1919, a little more than a year and a half prior to the latter's death. This letter, after relating how the defendant, faithless to his marriage vows, had had adulterous intercourse with a number of women during the years of his married life, continues as follows:

> "I haven't the heart to talk any more about it. Enough to say I hope you hate me so bad by now that you will be glad you found out before your whole life is gone and it is too late. You can still enjoy life by forgetting me entirely, as I don't think you will ever see me again. I hope not. * * * I will try and send you some money as soon as I can pay off the bank. In the meantime get a good job and forget me forever. I don't love you as a husband ought to and I don't think you can love me after reading this far. Don't try to find me as you can't do it for any benefit to either of us."

It seems that defendant and his wife had separated three or four times prior to the alleged homicide; the last separation taking place about a year before that event and continuing for about three months. Thereafter they became reconciled, and, for some months immediately prior to the wife's death, apparently were living together in peaceful and harmonious relations.

Appellant's objection to the introduction of the letter is based upon the ground that, because it was written somewhat more than a year and a half prior to the alleged homicide, and because, some time subsequent to its writing, a reconciliation had ensued, the letter was too remote, in point of time, to have any legal bearing upon the issues. We think that this ground of objection goes to the weight rather than to the admissibility of the evidence. See People v. Brown, 76 Cal. 573, 18 Pac. 678; and People v. Wilson, 23 Cal. App. 513, 521, 138 Pac. 971. Moreover, the letter was not introduced to show that the couple had previously quarreled. The purpose of its introduction doubtless was to show that, according to its admissions, defendant's whole nature and make-up is such that he probably did not bear toward his wife that love and affection which ordinarily may be looked for in a true and steadfast husband. Indeed, in the letter defendant directly and explicitly confesses that he does not love his wife as a husband should. No rule is more firmly established than that, upon the trial for murder of husband or wife, evidence tending to show illicit relations of the accused with another is admissible to show lack of love and affection for the defendant's lawful spouse. Porter v. State, 173 Ind. 694, 91 N. E. 340; 21 Cyc. 918. Even though a reconciliation between defendant and his wife may have been effected some time prior to the wife's death, the fact that the letter, though written by defendant on August 1, 1919, contains a confession of his adulterous disposition, and a lack of love for his wife, has some legitimate bearing upon the case, in that, in some degree, however slight, it is a circumstance going to show that defendant would have been more likely to commit the crime than if he were a loyal and loving husband. See Porter v. State, supra. For these reasons we think the letter was admissible.

There are other questions discussed in appellant's brief, but, as they probably will not present themselves upon a retrial of the case, we deem it unnecessary to comment upon them.

For the reasons given, the judgment and order denying defendant's motion for a new trial are reversed.

A provision in a bill of lading that the carrier should not be liable for loss occurring from strikes and riots is binding on the shipper.

6. Carriers 🔑156(1)—Notwithstanding limitation, carrier is liable for loss from strikes unless it uses reasonable efforts to procure men and avoid delay.

Irrespective of a provision in the bill of lading that the carrier should not be liable for loss occurring from strikes, it is liable for delay on account of a strike unless it uses all reasonable efforts to procure men to run the trains and avoid delay and consequent damage.

7. Carriers 🔑163—To make prima facie case only delivery to carrier and failure to deliver at destination must be shown, and burden of showing exemption from liability is on carrier.

Though a bill of lading provided the carrier should not be liable for loss caused by strikes, to make out a prima facie case the shipper is only required to show delivery to the carrier and failure to deliver at destination, and the burden of showing the facts necessary to exempt it from liability is on the carrier.

8. Carriers 🔑156(1) — Where carrier uses every reasonable effort to replace striking workmen it is not liable for failure to deliver.

If a carrier, after a strike not brought about through its fault, uses every reasonable effort to fill the places of the strikers, and every reasonable effort to obtain men and means to care for property intrusted to it for shipment, which property is lost or destroyed while in its charge, the exceptional conditions operate as a release of the carrier from liability under a bill of lading exempting it from liability for loss caused by strikes.

9. Carriers 🔑163—Evidence held to sustain finding against carrier notwithstanding claimed exemption from liability for loss by strike pleaded as a defense.

Evidence held to justify a finding that failure to transport and deliver or preserve a shipment while awaiting or in the course of transportation was caused by the negligent and wrongful conduct of carrier's servants in abandoning the performance of their duties, justifying an inference of negligence, for which it would be liable notwithstanding a contract exempting it from loss from a strike pleaded as a defense.

Appeals from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Two actions by the American Fruit Distributors of California against Walker D. Hines, Director General of Railroads, the United States Railroad Administration, and the Southern Pacific Company. From a judgment in each case for plaintiff, defendants appeal. The two appeals were considered together. Judgments as against defendant Director General of Railroads affirmed. Judgments as against Southern Pacific Company reversed.

W. I. Gilbert, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

James E. Kelby and Frederick R. Levee, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. The causes above entitled were brought in the superior court, and by agreement of the parties the evidence heard and stipulations made were deemed to apply in both. Judgments were rendered in favor of the plaintiff, from which judgments defendants have appealed. The questions presented on appeal are the same in both cases; hence the two appeals will be considered together.

The actions were to recover from the defendants the value of certain shipments of cantaloupes, amounting in all to about 12 carloads. Each carload was billed as a separate shipment, and bills of lading were issued to the consignor. The cantaloupes were received by the carrier at Chatsworth in the county of Los Angeles, but were not transported to their destination; in fact, none proceeded farther on their way than to reach the yards of the carrier at Los Angeles. It was pleaded in defense that a strike occurred in the Los Angeles yards, which prevented the cantaloupes from being transported in accordance with the shipper's directions. A term of the bill of lading was relied upon and pleaded, which purported to exempt the carrier from responsibility where a strike intervened to obstruct its functions. The contract being for interstate shipment, there is no dispute but that the Interstate Commerce Act (U. S. Comp. St. § 8563 et seq.), in so far as its provisions affect the rights and obligations of the respective shipper and carrier, will control. At the commencement of the trial stipulations were made as to certain facts. It was agreed that on the 20th, 21st, and 22d days of August, 1919, there were delivered to the carrier for shipment cantaloupes in the quantity alleged, and that the same were received for transportation to points outside of the state of California, and that bills of lading were issued to the shipper covering the twelve cars which contained the shipment. It was further stipulated that the cantaloupes were never delivered at their destination and a stipulation was also made covering the value thereof, in the event judgment should be rendered for the plaintiff. Plaintiff thereupon rested its case, and the defendant proceeded in the effort to establish its defense of nonliability.

The assistant superintendent of the carrier's lines at Los Angeles testified that on the evening of the 21st day of August, 1919, switchmen doing service in the freight yards of the Southern Pacific Company at Los Angeles went on strike; that the men walked out at 6 o'clock on that day, and that the official had no information prior to that time that the strike was to occur; that when he received notification of the happening he was at some distance from Los Angeles, and that he returned at once, arriving at 2 o'clock in the morning, when he found officers of the division, 8 or 10 in number, engaged in endeavoring to get out passenger trains; that several sections of passenger trains were gotten out, when train and engine men began to refuse to respond to call for service. The witness stated that there were no freight trains run after 6 o'clock in the evening of August 21st, as the trainmen refused to accept call, "claiming that they were endangering their lives by going out on the road under the existing conditions"; that on the day following he talked with several train and engine men and was told by them that they did not consider it safe to go out on the road; that at that time there were employed on the Los Angeles division 225 engineers, and that all of them refused to work; that it was necessary to have engines to handle the yard work, make up the trains, and carry the latter out on the road; that within the 48 hours ensuing after the strike was called by the switchmen all of the engineers refused to continue work; that the firemen followed suit; that railway officials took the list of firemen and engineers and called them all and failed to get a response from one willing to work from the entire list. The witness stated that the same situation existed with respect to brakemen, all of whom failed to respond when called to take their trains. By the evening of August 22d the officials were unable to get any men to take trains out. The witness stated further:

> "I do not know personally of any action that was taken by the company employees with reference to threats of violence; only what I was told. I didn't see any of it myself. There were no men obtainable here to take the places of the men on strike. To have gotten men here from other places, we would have had to go east, and it would have taken at least one week to get men here. * * * The reason I knew that there were not men available for the performance of those duties in Los Angeles was that we are guided largely by the applications that are received. In making my answer to that former question I had that in mind. That, and the fact that the labor trouble had been in existence for several days, and we knew that any available supply was absorbed by them. That was my conclusion. I spoke from past experience."

The trainmaster who was in charge at the Los Angeles terminal testified that the morning after the strike there were 2.807 cars of freight in the Los Angeles yards; one train was made up and departed at 6:30 p. m., and that no other freight trains went out, as there was no one to make the trains up. This witness testified that at some point in the city a switchman named Day had been killed on the night of the 21st. Witness stated that he had assisted in making up passenger trains, being protected by a police officer meanwhile. He stated that, after the strike was called, and after the main tracks had been cleared, and some live stock unloaded on the 22d, the last remaining yardmaster joined the strike, and left the witness entirely alone at the work.

> "I was not interfered with except a committee appointed by the strikers to come out to my residence and use their endeavors to persuade me to join the ranks of the strikers," he said. "There was no violence offered me. But I was afraid to go down from the feeling of the men at that particular moment."

He testified that a striking switchman was shot, but that he did not learn who did the shooting nor pay any attention to it. From the further statement of the witness it appeared that that shooting of the switchman did not happen about the freight yard, but near the Pacific Electric line, an independent carrier. Other officials testified that the trainmen had objected to taking trains out, on the ground that they were afraid their lives were in danger, although there was no direct evidence of any threats of violence offered by the strikers. In an endeavor to show that the refrigerating of the cars containing the cantaloupes was attempted to be done, a witness, whose duty it was to supervise the icing of the cars, testified that, failing to secure switch engines with which to move cars to the ice plant, an attempt was made to haul ice by trucks, but that the icemen finally stopped work at the instance of some man who was evidently associated with the striking switchmen. There was testimony of another man, whose position was that of an inspector:

> That the icemen were accosted by men from the Labor Temple who told the former that it would be the best thing for them to "get out, because there would be friction in the yard if they did not, and told them that the best thing to do was to work along with the regular switchmen who had walked out, because if they didn't it would make it very uncomfortable for them even after the switchmen went back to work; * * * there were no exact threats made against me or the boys who stayed on the job;" that the icemen thereupon left the yards.

Another official testified that a "local chairman" of the engineers had said that he would not instruct an engineer to go to work, because of the danger, and, when asked as to what danger he referred to, said:

> "Well, the fact that the officials are working on there, these fellows are liable to mob violence if they go out on that engine."

The latter official further testified:

> "I should say it took from two to three years for an engineer to acquire sufficient knowledge of an engine to operate it with safety to himself and to the equipment. In order to start to work in the yard it would require a thorough knowledge of all the tracks and switches and whistle signals where we whistle for various tracks, which all requires possibly two or three weeks' steady work before he would know those in one portion of the yard, and then he would not know all of the yard."

It was shown that the only cause which precipitated the strike of the switchmen was that the latter objected to handling freight transferred to the defendant carrier by the Pacific Electric Railway, which latter was then having strike trouble with its men.

[1] Defendants first advance the proposition that the judgments, as against both the Southern Pacific Company and the Director General of the Railroads, cannot be sustained. The argument to this point is, briefly, that the owning corporation, having been superseded in the management and control of its property, cannot be held responsible for the breach of any contract or the failure to keep any obligation imposed upon the carrier. It is admitted that, at all of the times material to the causes of action with which we are here concerned, the United States government held complete control of the transportation facilities of the defendant company, and that the handling of all freight was governed by a Director General, acting on behalf of the President of the United States. The counsel for respondent pays scant attention to this proposition, in that behalf contenting himself with the observation that one or the other of the defendants is liable, and that it is immaterial to his client as to which may be required to ultimately respond to the judgment. However, the proposition is fairly advanced by the appellants, and requires consideration at the hands of the court, even though we are left without the help of respondent's counsel in reaching a decision on the question. The act of Congress of August, 1916 (U. S. Comp. St. § 1974a), was an emergency measure designed to facilitate the handling of troops and war supplies. It authorized the President "in time of war" to take possession of systems of transportation or any part thereof. and to use the same for the carrying of troops and war material to the exclusion of other traffic as far as was necessary. In December, 1917, the President issued a proclamation (section 1974a) wherein he declared that necessity existed for the taking possession of every system of transportation located wholly or in part within the boundaries of continental United States, and appointed a Director General to represent the government as the managing head of the combined transportation facilities. The proclamation further provided that no attachment or writ of execution should be levied against any of the properties of the transportation systems, but that suits might be brought against the carriers and judgments rendered as theretofore "until and except so far as said Director may, by general or special orders, otherwise determine."

In March, 1918 (U. S. Comp. St. 1918, U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1919, §§ 3115¾a-3115¾p), Congress supplemented the act referred to with comprehensive legislation which provided for adjustment of the business relations between the government and the owners of the trnsportation systems, and provided that the government control, then acknowledged by the act to be existing, should continue for a maximum period of not longer than the end of one year and 9 months following the proclamation of the President declaring a peace treaty to have been ratified. Section 10 of that act contained a provision which, in its interpretation by the courts, has resulted in entirely different conclusions being announced in the decisions as to the liability of the owners of the transportation facilities during government control. We quote that portion of the section material to the point:

> "Carriers while under federal control shall be subject to all laws and liabilities as common carriers, whether arising under state or federal laws or at common law. * * * Actions at law or suits in equity may be brought by and against such carriers and judgments rendered as now provided by law; and in any action at law or suit in equity against the carrier, no defense shall be made thereto upon the ground that the carrier is an instrumentality or agency of the federal government. * * * But no process, mesne or final, shall be levied against such property under such federal control."

In connection with this provision, General Order No. 50, made by the Director General on October 28, 1918, is to be considered. That order provided in part as follows:

> "Actions at law, suits in equity, and proceedings in admiralty hereafter brought in any court based on contract, binding upon the Director General of Railroads, claim for death or injury to person, or for loss and damage to property, arising since December 31, 1917, and growing out of the possession, use, control, or operation of any railroad or system of transportation by the Director General of Railroads, which action, suit, or proceeding but for federal control might have been brought against the carrier company, shall be brought against William G. McAdoo, Director General of Railroads, and not otherwise."

The order further recited that its provisions should not apply to suits for the recovery of fines, penalties, or forfeitures, and that, in the actions to which it was applicable which had already been commenced and were pending against carrier companies, the pleadings might be amended by substituting the Director General for the "carrier company." It was claimed in many suits which were brought throughout the country that, under the provisions of the act of 1918, there was preserved to a plaintiff the right to sue the transportation owner; that the word "carrier" was synonymous with owner. With this construction admitted, it was plain that Order No. 50 of the Director General was in conflict with the statute, and hence invalid. On the other hand, it was as often insisted that the word "carrier" was used in the statute to designate the transportation agency, and that the provision quoted was inserted only for the purpose of making clear that liability should follow the agencies, both for breach of contract and for negligent acts. Decisions agreeable to the different contentions were announced. The federal trial judges were wide apart in their conclusions. Appellate tribunals of some of the states, notably those of North Carolina, repeatedly held that the railroad owners could be sued. Counsel for appellants have cited a number of decisions holding the contrary. In our investigation of the subject we find that one suit brought in the state courts, wherein it was determined by the state appellate tribunal that the owning company could be sued, was taken on writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States and decision therein rendered. This decision sets at rest all conflict of authority on the question. The case was that of Missouri Pacific Railroad Co. and Hines, Director General, v. Ault, 256 U. S. —, 41 Sup. Ct. 593, 65 L. Ed. —. It was there held that the railroad company was not a proper party defendant. The decision recognized Order No. 50 as a valid exercise of the power conferred upon the Director General. The word "carriers" occurring in section 10 of the act of 1918 was defined:

> "Here the term 'carriers,'" said the court, "was used as it is understood in common speech—meaning the transportation systems as distinguished from the corporations owning or operating them. * * * If the cause of action arose while the government was operating the system the 'carrier while under federal control' was nevertheless to be liable and suable. This means, as a matter of law, that the government or its agency for operation could be sued, for under the existing law the legal person in control of the carrier was responsible for its acts."

This decision is conclusive upon the question presented, and, under the law thus established, it must be held that the judgment as against the Southern Pacific Company was unauthorized, and must be set aside.

[2-4] Broadly speaking, it may be admitted that the obligation assumed by a common carrier of freight or merchandise is that of an insurer, with the qualification only that it will not be liable where extraordinary occurrences, not within its control, produce damage. At common law, in its early rigor, "acts of God and the public enemy" afforded the only defense. This obligation is still imposed wherever statutes have not changed it. It is permitted to be modified by special contracts entered into between the shipper and carrier. Under the English law it was early established that it was lawful for a carrier to modify, to some extent and in certain particulars, its liability as an insurer. The carrier on a through shipment had the right to stipulate against liability for the negligence of a connecting carrier. Amendments to the federal Interstate Commerce Act now prohibit the contracting for such exemption. Carmack Amendment of 1906; Cummins Amendment of 1915; Barnes' Federal Code 1919, p. 1920 (U. S. Comp. St. § 8604a). It has always been held that the carrier may not contract to free itself from damages caused by its own negligence. Generally, however, it may be now stated as a correct expression of the law that the carrier may contract for exemption from liability where the shipment is damaged without the fault of the carrier or its agencies. Nothing in the federal law forbids the making of a contract limiting liability where there is no negligence either on the part of the initial or connecting carrier. The federal statute, as amended, in its restricting phrases, refers in terms to a limitation for damage caused by the carriers themselves. The words are that liability shall accrue "for the full actual loss, damage, or injury to such property caused by it or by any such common carrier," etc. And so, the law, with respect to the right of a carrier to exempt itself from liability for damage occurring because of the act of some extraneous agency, remains (otherwise than as has been stated) undisturbed. In the case of New York Central Railway Co. v. Lockwood, 17 Wall. 357, 21 L. Ed. 627, speaking of the extent to which such limiting contracts by carriers might go, Mr. Justice Bradley said:

> "Conceding, therefore, that special contracts, made by common carriers with their customers, limiting their liability, are good and valid so far as they are just and reasonable; to the extent, for example, of excusing them for all losses happening by accident, without any negligence or fraud on their part; when they ask to go still further, and to be excused for negligence, * * * they have no longer any plea of justice or reason to support such a stipulation. * * * The exemption claimed by carriers must be reasonable and just, otherwise it will be regarded as extorted from the owners of the goods by duress of circumstances, and therefore, not binding."

Mr. Hutchinson in his work on Carriers (3d Ed.) vol. 1, cs. VI, VII, treats of this subject in a comprehensive way. He cites authorities sustaining the right of the carrier to stipulate for exemption from damages caused by fire, strikes, mob, loss by thieves or robbers, also where goods are of a dangerous character. Sections 420, 421, 422, 423. See, also, section 230 et seq., 4 Ruling Case Law, pp. 764–811.

[5, 6] The provision of the bill of lading in this case, issued to the plaintiff upon shipment of its merchandise, wherein it stipulated that the carrier should not be responsible for loss or damage occurring "from riots or strikes," expressed a condition binding upon the shipper. The mere proof of the occurrence of a strike, however, would not establish freedom from the obligation to respond in damages to the shipper. It would be incumbent upon a carrier asserting that defense to show that, notwithstanding the strike on the part of its employees, it had used every reasonable effort to preserve the shipper's property, to prevent its being damaged, and to cause it to be transported to its destination. Irrespective of limiting conditions in the bill of lading, it has been held that the occurrence of a strike among the employees of a carrier is not sufficient in itself to excuse the latter for failure to deliver goods shipped or to carry the same within a reasonable time to their destination. Pittsburgh, Cincinnati & St. Louis W. Co. v. Hallowell, 65 Ind. 188, 32 Am. Rep. 63; Central R. R. & Banking Co. v. Georgia Fruit & Vegetable Exchange, 91 Ga. 389, 17 S. E. 904. On the other hand, it has been held that mob violence, preventing employees from working, may excuse a carrier for like failure. Geismer v. Lake Shore, etc., Co., 102 N. Y. 563, 7 N. E. 828, 55 Am. Rep. 837. And in Pittsburgh, Ft. Wayne & Chicago R. R. Co. v. Hazen, 84 Ill. 36, 25 Am. Rep. 422, the court declared:

> "For the delay resulting from refusal of the employees to do duty, the company is responsible. For delay resulting solely from the lawless violence of men not in the employment of the company, the company is not responsible.

even though the men whose violence caused the delay had, but a short time before, been employed by the company."

In International & G. N. R. Co. et al. v. Tisdale, 74 Tex. 8, 11 S. W. 900, 4 L. R. A. 545, it was stipulated that the shipper assumed all risk of damage, injury or loss sustained from delay or detention in transportation "occasioned by mob, strike, or threatened violence, etc., or any other cause than the negligence of the carrier." The defendant offered to prove that its failure to carry and deliver live stock was due to the interference of strikers. The evidence was rejected. It was held that the ruling was error, and the court said:

> "If, as was proposed by the proof offered, it could be shown that 'no freight or live stock trains were or could be run over the road, because of the interference of the strikers,' it might have shown that the horse was, under the circumstances, delivered within a reasonable time, or a sufficient excuse for the failure to deliver within such time."

The stipulated condition there was much the same as that which is expressed by the conditions of the bill of lading here. It will be noted that the court there apparently considered that it was necessary, in the making out of the defense of the carrier, that it should prove not only that live stock trains were not run over the road affected by the strike, but that none "could be" run, owing to strike conditions. This citation is of some aid to the point that, to entitle the carrier to justify its failure to carry the merchandise of the plaintiff, the burden was upon it not only to show the existence of a strike, but to show further that it exerted all reasonable efforts in attempting to procure men to manage trains, and that such efforts were without avail, and as to whether such efforts have been used is generally a question of fact. This question as to where the burden of proof rests, upon the issue of a strike as an excusing condition, is suggested but not decided in Pennsylvania R. R. Co. v. Olivit Bros., 243 U. S. 574, 37 Sup. Ct. 468, 61 L. Ed. 908.

[7] However, the shipper, to make a prima facie case under the rule established by all of the leading authorities, is required to show only the fact of shipment made and a failure to deliver at destination. Where the carrier formerly justified under the common-law rule, the affirmative was always upon it to excuse delay by showing destruction of, or damage to, the goods to have been occasioned by "act of God or the public enemy." The effect of allowable limiting conditions in a contract of shipment is but to add to the common-law list of excepting causes modifying the obligation of the carrier as an insurer. It is familiar doctrine that the position of disadvantage occupied by a shipper, who is compelled to relinquish control of his property when he places it in the hands of the carrier, without ready means of ascertaining and fixing the blame in case of damage or destruction of his goods, is sufficient reason why he should be relieved of the duty of showing what has happened to his property. The evidence of conditions which might establish the exceptional facts necessary to relieve the carrier is within the reach of the carrier, and ordinarily not easily procurable by the shipper. The logic of all rules governing defenses of the nature here considered requires, we think, that the burden of proving exonerating facts be borne by the carrier.

The trial judge, in determining the facts, made the following findings:

> "(14) That it is true that the failure of said defendants to safely and within a reasonable time transport and deliver said shipments, or to transport or deliver the same, and whereby the whole of said shipments were wholly lost to plaintiff, was not caused by or attributable to mob violence, riots, intimidation, the act of God, the public enemy, nor from any defect or vice in the property forming said shipments or any part thereof, nor from the violation of any duty which plaintiff owed to said shipments or the property forming the same.
> "(15) That it is true that the failure of said defendants to transport and deliver, or transport or deliver, or preserve said shipments while awaiting, or in course of transportation, was caused solely by the negligent and wrongful acts and conduct of defendants' train service, during the course of their regular employment, in abandoning the performance of their duties."

It was evidently the view of the learned judge that the defense, based upon alleged strike conditions and the limiting term of the bill of lading, could only be established by proof that the carrier was prevented from securing men to replace the strikers and the sympathizing train operatives by mob violence and intimidation exercised by persons outside of its control. Such conditions, if they existed, would indeed assist in establishing the defense, although we are not prepared to declare that the limiting term of the bill of lading could only be invoked where there existed violence, actual or threatened, on the part of the persons disconnected from the carrier's employ.

[8] We are of the view that where a carrier, after a strike which is brought about through no fault of the employer, uses every reasonable effort to fill the places of the strikers, and every reasonable effort to obtain men and means to care for property intrusted to it for shipment, which property is lost or destroyed while in its charge, the exceptional conditions may then be deemed to have been established and exoneration from liability will follow. From what has been said it will appear that, had the judgment rested upon the finding alone that there had been no violence, riots, or intimidation to excuse the carrier (finding 14), the issue would be left undetermined as to whether the carrier had not nevertheless been exonerated through conditions arising after the commencement of the strike which could not have been overcome by the exercise of reasonable care and diligence.

[9] Finding 15, however, determines that the failure to transport and deliver, or preserve, the shipments, "while awaiting or in course of transportation," was caused solely by the negligent and wrongful conduct of defendant's servants in abandoning the performance of their duties. This latter finding fastens liability upon the carrier, and supports the judgment. And we think that the evidence justifies it. The burden cast upon the carrier to show its freedom from fault was not sustained. The evidence does not disclose what the condition of the cantaloupes was when received other than that they were in "good" condition, nor within what time they would become valueless with or without ice, nor whether they became a total loss through deterioration; in fact, we are not told by the record as to what ultimately became of them, nor how long the strike continued. One witness for defendant testified that it would have taken a week to secure men from other points to man the trains. Whether the strike lasted that long we are not informed. Nor are we informed as to what state the cantaloupes would have been in at the expiration of that time, all attendant conditions considered. Clearly, then, the evidence did not go far enough to establish the defense designed by the limiting terms of the bill of lading to be made available to the carrier, and the inference of negligence, as made by the findings, is clearly justified.

The judgments as against the defendant Director General of Railroads are affirmed. The judgments as against Southern Pacific Company are reversed.

PEOPLE v. BARR et al. (Cr. 588.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 23, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 19, 1922.)

1. Criminal law 🔑775(6), 1172(2)—Instruction to scrutinize evidence of alibi with care objectionable, but not prejudicial.

An instruction that an alibi is capable of being successfully fabricated, and that testimony thereof should be scrutinized with care, was objectionable, but did not constitute prejudicial error so as to justify reversal of a conviction.

2. Criminal law 🔑913(4)—New trial necessary unless judgment is pronounced within statutory period.

Trial court must grant a new trial where it has failed to pronounce judgment within the time limited by Pen. Code, §§ 1191, 1202, notwithstanding that such failure was the result of granting accused's request for a continuance.

3. Criminal law 🔑1186(4)—Appellate court will not affirm judgment rendered after statutory period.

Const. art. 6, § 4½, relating to harmless error, does not authorize an appellate court to affirm a judgment of conviction rendered after expiration of the period fixed by Pen. Code, §§ 1191, 1202, notwithstanding that the error was brought about by the granting of a continuance at accused's request.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Tom Barr and another were convicted of robbery, and appeal. Reversed.

A. R. Schottky and Terry W. Ward, both of Merced, and John A. Wall, of Mariposa, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BURNETT, J. Defendants were convicted of the crime of robbery, and they appeal from the judgment and the order denying their motion for a new trial. It is admitted by appellants that the evidence in the case was conflicting, and it is not insisted that the verdict was entirely unsupported. Appellants, however, base their claim to a reversal upon two grounds: First, that the court misdirected the jury; and, second, that the court erred in pronouncing judgment upon defendants after the time for pronouncing judgment had expired by virtue of sections 1191 and 1202 of the Penal Code.

[1] The instruction of which appellants complain is as follows:

> "You are further instructed that the fact, which experience has shown, that an alibi as a defense is capable of being, and has been occasionally successfully, fabricated; 'that even when wholly false its detection may be matter of very great difficulty; and that the temptation to resort to this as a spurious defense may be very great, especially in cases of importance—these are considerations attendant upon this defense which call for some special suggestions upon the part of the court.
> "These are that, while you are not to hesitate at giving this as a defense full weight, that conclusive effect to which, when established, it is justly entitled, either as entirely satisfying you of the innocence of the defendants or as creating the reasonable doubt which entitles the defendants to an acquittal, still you are to scrutinize the testimony offered in the support of an alibi with care, that you may be satisfied that a fabricated defense is not being imposed upon you. People v. Lee Gam, 69 Cal. 552; People v. Wing, 31 Cal. App. 785."

While said instruction is objectionable as pointed out in People v. Purio, 194 Pac. 74, yet it has been held that it does not constitute prejudicial error, and that it does not justify a reversal of the judgment. People v. Lee Gam, 69 Cal. 552, 11 Pac. 183; People v. Wing, 31 Cal. App. 785, 161 Pac. 759.

[2, 3] The second point is more serious. The jury rendered its verdict on July 12, 1921. Three days thereafter defendants filed a motion for a new trial, based on all the grounds prescribed in section 1181 of the Penal Code. The hearing of said motion was continued by the court to August 1, 1921. On said date the defendants filed a supplementary motion for a new trial, based upon the provisions of said sections 1191 and 1202 of the Penal Code. The court, however, denied said motion for a new trial, and proceeded to pass sentence upon the defendants.

Said section 1191 provides that the time for pronouncing judgment must not be less than 2 nor more than 5 days after the verdict or plea of guilty, but that the court may extend the time not more than 10 days for the purpose of hearing or determining any motion for a new trial or in arrest of judgment. It is thus to be seen that, where a motion for a new trial is made, the last date upon which the judgment may be pronounced is 15 days after the verdict of guilty is rendered. Herein it was 20 days thereafter. Section 1202 provides that, if the judgment is "not rendered or pronounced within the time so fixed, or to which it is continued under the provisions of section 1191 of this Code, then the defendant shall be entitled to a new trial."

The learned district attorney of Merced county at the time this cause came on regularly for hearing contended earnestly and forcibly that the error should be disregarded, for the reason that it was waived by the defendants in requesting a continuance, and by virtue of the application of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution of the state.

Even if we were inclined to agree with this contention if the question were res integra, it is sufficient to say that the case is virtually controlled by the decisions cited by appellants, and it must be held, in view of the facts, that the trial court had no alternative than to grant the motion for a new trial. Said decisions are reviewed by Justice Hart in the case of People v. Lamattina, 38 Cal. App. 82, 175 Pac. 484, and it is scarcely necessary to do more than to refer to that opinion. We may add, however, that in denying the petition for hearing by that tribunal the Supreme Court was careful to say:

"In denying the application for a hearing in this court we are not to be understood as holding that the pronouncing of judgment may be postponed beyond the lapse of the time prescribed in section 1191 of the Penal Code, as amended in 1911. The opinion sufficiently shows that it was not so postponed in this case."

It is true that in the decisions to which we have referred no specific reference was made to said section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, but it must have been considered by the courts in those cases decided since the adoption of said amendment. Indeed, if we may concede that its language is broad enough to apply to proceedings taken after verdict, to extend it to cover the error herein as contended for by respondent would be to nullify completely the effect of said sections 1191 and 1202. We must attribute no such purpose to the people in adopting the amendment. Said sections of the Penal Code were probably overlooked by the court and the district attorney when the time was set for pronouncing judgment, but manifestly that furnishes no reason for us to disregard the plain provisions of the statute.

In view of said decisions, and what we have stated, we think no further discussion is called for.

The judgment and order are reversed.

JAYNES v. WEICKMAN et al. (Civ. 3454.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Dec. 6, 1921.)

1. Trade-marks and trade-names and unfair competition ⚷70(3) — "Action Transfer Company" held so nearly like "Active Transfer Company" as to warrant injunction.

"Action Transfer Company" held so similar to "Active Transfer Company" as to authorize an injunction against its use; it being necessary only that the name used be so similar to that sought to be protected that deception will be the natural and probable result.

2. Trade-marks and trade-names and unfair competition ⚷3(2)—Use of "Active Transfer Company" as trade-name may be protected.

The use of "Active Transfer Company" as a trade-name may be protected by injunction; the word "active" not being ordinarily regarded as descriptive of a transfer company or the business conducted by it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Action by Maud E. Jaynes against Charles C. Weickman and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 197 Pac. 672.

A. G. Reily, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Collier & Labarere and Walter H. Sprague, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WORKS, J. In this action the plaintiff, claiming to be the owner of a business conducted under the names Active Transfer Company and Active Parcel Delivery, sought to enjoin the defendants from using in connection with a business conducted by some of them the names Action Transfer Company and Action Parcel Delivery. A decree went for the plaintiff, and the defendants appeal.

In great part, appellants' presentation of their appeal is like that with which we had to deal in Alves v. Alves, 202 Pac. 157. There is here a discussion of several questions of fact, without mention of a claim that any finding of the trial court is not sustained by the evidence. Several questions of law are presented without our attention being called to alleged errors of the trial court to which the discussions may be applied. Appellants' presentation is different, however, from the effort of appellants in Alves v. Alves, in that the brief here is not altogether pointless.

[1] There is a sufficient presentation of the question whether the words "Active" and "Action," as used by the parties respectively in connection with the other words above set forth, are so similar that the public will be deceived by appellants' use of one of them. In solving such a question it is necessary only that a court be satisfied from an inspection of trade-names or legends used by the parties that the one used by the defendant is so similar to the one used by the plaintiff that a deception will be the natural and probable result. 38 Cyc. 773 to 776; Schmidt v. Brieg, 100 Cal. 672, 35 Pac. 623, 22 L. R. A. 790. It is manifest to us that such a similarity exists in the present instance. The legend "Action Transfer Company" could not escape being viewed by the public, or by some considerable part of it, as referring to the Active Transfer Company.

[2] Appellant also adequately presents the question whether the word "Active" is subject to appropriation as a trade-name. It is, of course, true that there can be no property in words merely descriptive of an article or business, or of some quality pertaining to them. As instances of this rule it is doubtless true that one could not protect through injunctive process such trade names as Sweet Oranges or First Quality Cigarettes. We cannot say that the name Active Transfer Company is to be placed in the same category. The first word of that legend ordinarily would not be regarded as descriptive of a transfer company or of the business conducted by it. The designation is sufficiently fanciful, to our minds, to entitle respondent to use and to protect the use as a trade-name of the phrase of which it is a part.

It is contended that the trial court committed error in two instances in the admission of evidence. If the correctness of the contention be granted, which we do not decide, the errors were harmless, after what we have said above as to our ability to determine by comparison of the names used by the parties that the use by appellants of the one employed by them would naturally and probably lead to a deception of the public.

Judgment affirmed.

DANERI v. CITY OF SAN DIEGO.
(Civ. 4039.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 7, 1921.)

Venue ⚷61—Defendant applying for change of venue in exercise of special privilege not required to make application at first appearance.

Defendant's application to change the place of trial, not made under Code Civ. Proc. § 396, on the ground that the county in which the action was brought was not the proper county, but on ground that right to change was special privilege granted it by section 394, was not required to be made at the time of the defendant's first appearance in the action.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Rex. B. Goodcell, Judge.

Action by Emanuel Daneri against the City of San Diego. From an order denying its motion for a change of the place of trial, defendant appeals. Order reversed, with instructions.

S. J. Higgins, City Atty., and A. F. H. Wright, Deputy City Atty., both of San Diego, and T. B. Cosgrove and Hunsaker, Britt & Cosgrove, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Olin Wellborn, Jr., Stephen Monteleone, and Bert Campbell, all of Los Angeles, and McNabb & Hodge, of San Bernardino, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from an order denying its motion for a change of the place of trial of this action. The plaintiff, a resident of San Diego county, brought this action against the city of San Diego to recover damages for the destruction of and injury to real and personal property owned by the plaintiff and situated in the county of San Diego. The injury was alleged to have been caused by reason of the defective construction and operation of the lower Otay dam and reservoir owned and operated by the defendant, which overflowed, causing great injury to adjoining property.

The complaint was filed in January, 1918, in the county of San Bernardino. In May, 1919, defendant filed a demurrer to the complaint, and later filed a motion to strike certain allegations from the plaintiff's amended complaint. After the demurrer had been overruled and the motion to strike out portions of the complaint had been denied, the defendant filed its written motion to have the action transferred for trial from said county of San Bernardino to a county other than the county of San Diego under the provisions of section 394, Code of Civil Procedure.

The respondent herein has not seen fit to favor us with a brief in this matter setting forth his position with regard to the propriety of the order from which the appeal was taken, and we can only surmise that the motion was resisted in the lower court by the plaintiff upon the theory that it was made too late because it was not filed at the time the defendant filed its demurrer to the complaint. We know of no reason for the denial of the motion of the defendant. The theory above set forth is without merit because the motion was not made under the provisions of section 396, Code of Civil Procedure, and was not a motion upon the ground that the action was not commenced in the proper county, and did not ask that the action be transferred to the proper county.

It has been held in the case of Mono Power Co. v. Los Angeles, 33 Cal. App. 675, 682, 166 Pac. 387, that the only case in which it is necessary for the defendant to make such a motion at the time of first appearance is the case where the motion is upon the ground that the action has not been brought in the proper county. It is clearly stated in said last-mentioned case that in all other cases of change of place of trial it is not necessary that the motion be made at the time of first appearance.

The defendant in this case did not make its motion under the provisions of section 396, Code of Civil Procedure. It did not set up the fact that San Bernardino county was not the proper county, nor ask for a transfer to the proper county; but it exercised a special privilege granted to it under section 394, Code of Civil Procedure, and demanded a change of place of trial irrespective of and without regard to whether the action was brought in the proper county or not.

As this motion was made under the provisions of section 394, Code of Civil Procedure, defendant was not obliged to make it at the time of its first appearance in the action. Mono Power Co. v. Los Angeles, supra.

The order appealed from is reversed, with instructions to the trial court to grant defendant's motion and transfer said action for trial from said county of San Bernardino to a county or city and county other than said county of San Bernardino and other than the county in which the plaintiff resides or is doing business, and other than the county in which the defendant city is situated.

SOTO v. GLOBE OIL MILLS. (Civ. 3759.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑979(2)—Setting aside verdict as against evidence reversed only for abuse of discretion.

It is the duty of the trial judge to set aside a verdict which appears to him not to be sustained by the weight of the evidence and to grant a new trial, and such order will not be disturbed on appeal, unless it plainly appears that there has been an abuse of discretion.

2. Factors 🔑66—Evidence held to show no abuse of discretion in setting aside verdict for plaintiff.

In an action for the conversion of cattle, evidence that defendant bought the cattle from one whom plaintiff had represented to be his agent, that plaintiff had stated to others that he had transferred the cattle to the agent, and that defendant had paid the agent for the cattle, and tending to show that such person was plaintiff's factor, having possession, with power to sell and collect, held insufficient to support a verdict for plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Louis W. Myers, Judge.

Action by Frank C. Soto against the Globe Oil Mills to recover damages for conversion. From an order granting a new trial after verdict for the plaintiff, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Fred W. Morrison, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

W. G. Van Pelt and Bertin A. Weyl, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. This action was brought to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff by reason of the defendant having appropriated to its own use property of the plaintiff, consisting of 98 head of cattle. A jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff and the trial judge granted a motion for a new trial, from which order plaintiff has appealed. The only question to be considered is as to whether, upon the evidence presented in the trial court, the making of the order complained of amounted to an abuse of discretion.

[1] The rule is a familiar one and well settled that it is the duty of a trial judge, wherever it appears to him that a verdict is not sustained by the weight of the evidence, to grant a new trial, and that such order will not be disturbed unless it plainly appears that there has been an abuse of discretion. Drathman v. Cohen et al., 139 Cal. 310, 73 Pac. 181; In re Martin, 113 Cal. 479, 45 Pac. 813; Weringer v. Rutledge, 180 Cal. 566, 182 Pac. 31. A brief consideration of the evidence as the record shows it will demonstrate, we think, without the aid of further authorities, that the order should be affirmed.

[2] Plaintiff was the owner of cattle in the number mentioned in his complaint. He shipped same from Arizona to Los Angeles. In company with one Zukerman he went to the office of the defendant, where an offer was made to purchase the cattle, which offer plaintiff refused. At that time the plaintiff referred the defendant's purchasing agent to Zukerman for further negotiations. Defendant's agent, who conducted the negotiations, in the course of his testimony, stated that Zukerman in Soto's presence announced that he was the agent of Soto, which claim Soto did not deny, and that Zukerman, in Soto's presence, made a counter offer which defendant in turn refused to accept. The witness stated:

> "I saw Zukerman about two days after when he came into our office. * * * Zukerman came to our office and said he had bought the cattle from Soto, and offered to sell them to me. I bought 40 head from him at that time as I remember. He was given a check for $2,838.70. Before I gave Zukerman the check I had some conversation with Mr. Hickox at the Santa Fé stockyards. He told me that Soto had told him that he had disposed of the cattle to Zukerman. I relied on that statement before consummating this deal with Zukerman. The cattle were delivered in due course and I saw Zukerman again in two or three days. He came and offered me the steers. I bought only the cows the first time. I bought the steers and Zukerman was given a check for $2,597.25."

It appears that Zukerman had failed to account to Soto for the proceeds received from the sale of the cattle and had decamped. Soto admitted that he had delivered the possession of the cattle to Zukerman for the purpose of allowing Zukerman to make a sale thereof, and admitted that he had told a clerk at the Santa Fé freight office that the cattle belonged to Zukerman when he arranged to have the shipping receipts turned over.

We have called attention to enough of the testimony to show that the court was justified in determining that the weight of the evidence was not in support of the verdict of the jury. From that evidence it appears that plaintiff delivered the cattle into the possession of Zukerman for purposes of sale, and the inference is plainly justified that as a factor Zukerman was authorized, not only to sell the cattle, but to collect the proceeds of the sale. The duty of this court being only to determine whether the trial court abused the discretion committed to it, a further discussion or analysis of the evidence would serve no useful purpose.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

CLAYTON et al. v. RANDOLPH MARKETING CO. (Civ. 4035.)

1. Contracts 🔑155—Uncertainty to be interpreted against party writing contract.

In case of uncertainty in a contract, not removed by Civ. Code, §§ 1635–1653, the language should be interpreted most strongly against the party writing the contract, in view of section 1654.

2. Factors 🔑44—Commission merchant held not entitled to percentage of amount expended for freight and expenses.

A marketing company under a contract giving it a commission of "20 per cent. of the net f. o. b. destination sales," held not entitled to 20 per cent. of the gross sales price, which included freight, insurance, ice, demurrage, and detention en route or at the point of destination.

3. Trial 🔑45(1)—Offer of evidence held properly refused as not sufficiently specific.

In action to recover commissions under a contract providing for a certain percentage "f. o. b. destination sales," the trial court did not err in excluding oral testimony under offer that if the court was in doubt as to the meaning of f. o. b. destination sales, or believed plaintiffs were in any doubt as to such meaning, defendant would show that they understood it as defendants did; the offer not clearly indicating its scope.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action by J. D. Clayton and others against the Randolph Marketing Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Henry B. Stewart and Guy L. Rockwell, both of Brawley, and Le Roy M. Edwards, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

C. L. Brown, of El Centro, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J. [1, 2] The plaintiffs sued the defendant for an accounting; the trial court awarded the plaintiffs a judgment for $4,882.13, and the defendant has appealed. The trial court tried the case sitting without a jury, and made findings in which it found that the defendant was a corporation; that on September 20, 1918, the plaintiffs and defendant entered into a written contract which is fully set forth in plaintiffs' complaint; that the plaintiffs have fully performed said contract; that in doing so the plaintiffs delivered to the defendant to be marketed 65 carloads and some broken lots of lettuce; that the defendant received the produce and sold the same for $69,470.98 on board the cars at the place of sale; that the defendant paid freight and expressage in the sum of $15,736.63; that the defendant paid expressage for sundry items in the sum of $65.75, demurrage, $32.36, refrigeration, $175, taxes, $237.30; and that the net sale price on board the cars at point of delivery was $53,223.94. The court also found that the defendant had advanced to the plaintiffs $37,697.03, and that it was entitled to a commission of 20 per cent. on the net sales, or in the sum of $10,644.79. Deducting the advances and the commission from the net sales item above stated, the difference is $4,882.12, the amount for which the judgment was ordered. This controversy involves the correct interpretation of the meaning of the contract in so far as it provides for the payment by the plaintiffs to the defendant of a commission. The contract is quite long, and it is sufficient for the purposes of the decision in this case to state that the provisions concerning the commission are contained in a paragraph worded as follows:

> "That for a consideration mentioned in paragraph 4 of this agreement the growers hereby appoint the distributor their exclusive agent for selling and distributing all lettuce and spinach owned, grown, or controlled by the growers, for the seasons of 1918 and 1919, upon a commission of 20 per cent. for the net f. o. b. destination sales of all lettuce and spinach delivered to and accepted for shipment at Brawley, Cal. * * *"

The dispute between the parties is whether, under the above passage, the defendant was authorized to compute a commission of 20 per cent. on the sales price at the point of destination after deducting freight, or whether it should have computed the commission on the sales price at that point without deducting freight. The contract was written by the defendant, and in case of uncertainty not removed by sections 1635–1653 of the Civil Code, the language should be interpreted most strongly against the defendant. Civ. Code, § 1654. When the defendant answered it annexed to its answer a document which it called a balance sheet. That balance sheet shows the defendant's claim as to its rights with reference to each particular carload. As stated above, there were 65 carloads. As to 33 of these carloads no freight is charged—apparently the contents of the car were sold subject to the freight being paid by the purchaser; as to 12 of the cars charges were made for such items as detention, demurrage, brokerage, and cartage; where freight, refrigeration, and cartage were incurred, as on the first item, the defendant sought to charge commission on the gross sales price, $1,513.35; where a carload was sold without incurring any of those expenses, as on the second shipment, the defendant sought to charge a commission on the sales price, $685; a similar practice was followed with reference to other shipments from the 10th day of February, 1919, the date of the first shipment, until the 5th day of April, 1919, the date of the last shipment. It is claimed by the defendant that it was authorized to base its commission on the gross sales price at the point of destination because it was negotiating and attending to sales in large amounts, and was advancing moneys to finance the transactions. But this same claim could be made, with force less in degree only, with reference to the second car on which the defendant did not advance the freight. If the appellant is right in the contention which it made in the lower court, that its commission should be based on the wholesale price, including freight such contention has its support in this: That the freight item was inserted to augment the commission. But if the parties were seeking to augment the commission, it should have been augmented by the amount of the freight, whether the freight was paid by the defendant or the purchaser. Certainly no one would claim that 20 per cent. was to be allowed as interest for a few days on the freight moneys advanced. If such an argument should be made, it would require express language in the contract to uphold it. When the defendant did, from February to April, on 33 of the carloads, enter a charge for commission based on the sale at destination, without including any freight, the defendant went far by its own act in construing its contract adversely to the contention it now makes.

We think it was correct in the construction which it then placed on its contract, and that it is incorrect in the claim which it is making at this time. The contract provides a commission of "20 per cent. of the net f. o. b. destination sales." The commission is to be based on sales. It is to be based on destination sales. Again, not gross sales, but net sales, and, furthermore, sales free on board. Bearing each one of these calls of the contract in mind it is patent that cartage at the point of destination cannot possibly be considered, because cartage can commence only after the goods leave the car and when the goods have ceased to be "on board." What we have said regarding cartage applies to handling, insurance, demurrage, brokerage, and every other item that was incurred after a sale had been made. By the terms of the contract the appellant became the broker of the grower for the purpose of negotiating a sale; but the plaintiff did not specifically authorize the defendant to delegate its authority at the plaintiffs' expense. Before a sale was made, and down to the time that the car arrived at its point of destination, under the clear terms of the contract, the respondent would be liable for insurance, icing, demurrage, and detention en route or at the point of destination. When a sale had been made, deducting those expenses from the sales price and deducting the freight, we have arrived at a figure which complies with every call of the contract "net f. o. b. destination sale," and on this account so ascertained the appellant was entitled to compute its commission of 20 per cent. To such an interpretation the appellant replies that, "We have construed the words as though they read 20 per cent. of the net f. o. b. shipping point sales." This is manifestly not so. That wording would indicate that the parties intended that the burden would rest on the appellant of paying at its own expense the freight, and all handling, insurance, icing, demurrage, and detention charges which might be incurred after the car left the point of shipment. Moreover, to talk of the subject of sales at shipping point is to ignore the word "net" entirely; that word ceases to have the meaning "net," or to have the meaning "gross," or any other meaning. It is, in effect, stricken out of the contract. When the clause in question was being argued in the trial court, and after counsel had cited authorities and argued the matter, the trial court remarked: "* * * I think it would mean exactly the same reading 20 per cent. of the net sales f. o. b. destination." In this statement we think the trial court was entirely correct and that it did not misconstrue the contract.

[3] The appellant claims that the trial court erred in not allowing it to introduce oral testimony. The proceedings were as follows:

> "Mr. Rickwell: * * * If the court is in any doubt as to the interpretation of f. o. b. destination sales, and if the court is of the opinion that the plaintiffs were in any doubt as to the meaning of f. o. b. destination sales, we will ask them what they understood and we will put on witnesses to show that they understood it as we understood it. [Italics ours.]
> "The Court: I do not think there is any necessity to introduce evidence on that point. * * *"

The specific offer was rightly refused. If the appellant had some other matters to present, it should have made an offer which clearly indicated the scope of the offer.

The judgment is affirmed.

ROTHAERMEL v. AMERIGE. (Civ. 3753.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1. California. Nov. 21, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 19, 1922.)

Injunction 🔑51—Mandatory injunction to compel removal of encroaching foundation between buildings not granted.

Where foundation of building on adjoining lot extended 1½ inches over the boundary line, and could not be removed without tearing down a building on one of the lots, and a judgment in ejectment was had against the encroaching owner, a grantee of the successful party in the ejectment suit was not entitled to a mandatory injunction compelling the removal of such foundation.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; R. Y. Williams, Judge.

Action by Albert H. Rothaermel against George H. Amerige. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

S. M. Davis and Walter Eden, both of Santa Ana, for appellant.

Marks & Launer, of Fullerton, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Judgment was entered in this action as prayed for by the plaintiff, except as to the amount of certain damages, and defendant has appealed.

Plaintiff is the owner of a parcel of land located in the city of Fullerton, county of Orange. Upon this land there was erected by the predecessor in interest of the plaintiff a two-story brick building. The south wall of this building was placed within about 2 inches of the line dividing the property of plaintiff's predecessor from that of the adjoining landowner, title to which latter land was afterward acquired by the defendant. At the time of the erection of the building referred to, there were no building improvements upon the adjoining property. Defendant's grantor in turn caused to be erected a brick wall along the dividing line between the two properties, up to a height of one story, this wall becoming a part of a building thereon constructed. The surface of the latter wall seems not to have intruded upon the property later acquired by the plaintiff, but the contention was made by plaintiff's predecessor in interest that the foundation footings of the wall did extend over and onto the latter's property to the extent of 2 inches. As a result of this contention an action was brought in March, 1916, by plaintiff's predecessor against the defendant here. The action was in form one of ejectment, the complaint containing appropriate allegations as to ownership and the trespass of the defendant. Writ of restitution and damages in the sum of $500 were prayed for. The court, after trial, entered judgment, wherein it was determined that defendant had and held possession of the "south 1½ inches of said real property in plaintiff's complaint described." The court in that action further found that—

> "The plaintiff is not damaged by the foundation of defendant's building extending one and one-half inches upon the plaintiff's property hereinbefore described, and up to plaintiff's foundation wall."

The judgment was one appropriate to an action of ejectment, in that it directed that the defendant "vacate and restore to the possession of said plaintiff the south 1½ inches of that certain lot" describing the parcel, and further directed that "writ of assistance" be issued to restore to the plaintiff the possession of the property without further proceedings. After plaintiff's predecessor had secured the judgment and all of the relief that she had asked for, except that she was found to have sustained no loss in damages, she seems to have been in a quandary as to what should be done to make effectual the right secured. As only the foundation footings of defendant's building protruded onto the land of plaintiff to the extent of the 1½ inches, and as the two brick walls existed there, separated only by a space of about the same width, it was plainly impossible to have the footings removed without taking down one or the other of the walls. A writ of assistance or for possession, as the same is termed in section 380, Code of Civil Procedure, would not have authorized the sheriff to molest defendant's wall other than to remove the footings. After the entry of that judgment the plaintiff here came into the ownership and possession of the north property. Prior to that time, and after the entry of the judgment referred to, the defendant had served written notice upon plaintiff's predecessor that he relinquished all right to the 1½ inches, or the fixtures attached to his wall, which the court had found were intruding upon the land of the opposite party. The plaintiff, however, proceeded to bring this suit, wherein he sought to obtain an affirmative judgment requiring the defendant to remove the inch and a half foundation footings as an existing incumbrance to the free use of plaintiff's property. In the complaint the former judgment was pleaded as establishing the right of ownership and possession in plaintiffs predecessor. The trial was proceeded with, evidence heard, and the court determined that the plaintiff was entitled to the relief prayed for, except that damages for the withholding of the property was placed at the nominal sum of $1. The decree as rendered required the defendant to, "within six months from the date hereof, remove, from the south 1½ inches of the property described, the concrete foundation and brick wall thereon situated, and deliver up and surrender to the plaintiff possession of said south 1½ inches of said property." The appellant properly characterizes this judgment as being in form one for a mandatory injunction. The last action was in no sense an action upon the judgment of ejectment, for, if such were the case, the only judgment proper to be rendered would be one like that first entered, which would leave the plaintiff in precisely the same situation as his predecessor was at the time of the conclusion of the first suit. We have here a case where a bare legal right, unsupported by any damage shown, is sought to be enforced by mandatory writ requiring affirmative personal action to be taken. Appellant makes the point, and we agree wholly with the argument, that the case is one in which the plaintiff is shown to be utterly without the right to claim such equitable relief. As is stated by the editor in Ruling Case Law (vol. 14, pars. 14, 15–57), mandatory injunctions are most frequently employed in cases of nuisances, trespasses of an irreparable nature and for the protection of easements, and the text further states:

> "It is also true, as a general rule, that the court should not interfere by way of mandatory injunction, even though the injury be clearly established, where there has been a long-continued delay in asserting the right, and a remedy exists at law, or where the injury is so slight as to bring it within the maxim de minimis, or full compensation can be made in damages. If there is an adequate remedy at law, no relief will be granted, especially where there is no appreciable damage, and its issuance would require the performance of an act which would be difficult, and involve a considerable expense."

A number of cases are cited from other jurisdictions fully sustaining the statement of the text. Appellant's counsel have also made pertinent citations of California decisions, notably Grandona v. Lovdal, 78 Cal. 611, 21 Pac. 366, 12 Am. St. Rep. 121; Clough v. Healy Co., 200 Pac. 378. It is also insisted that the judgment in the first action which was pleaded in the answer, became res adjudicata as to every form of relief to which the plaintiff was then entitled, also that the facts as disclosed by the evidence were such as to estop the plaintiff from making the claim which he by this suit asserts. Both propositions are fairly debatable, but, in view of the conclusion which we have reached as to the question discussed, we think it unnecessary to give consideration to further points urged against the validity of the judgment. Plainly enough it appears that the plaintiff was awarded relief to which the facts did not show him to be entitled.

The judgment is reversed.

BERRY et al. v. CROWELL et ux.
(Civ. 3747.)

1. Trial ⚷395(1)—If findings fairly determine material issues they will support judgment.

If it can be gathered from the whole of the findings of the court that material issues are fairly determined, the finding will support the judgment, and if the truth or falsity of each material allegation in issue can be demonstrated from the findings, the law is complied with.

2. Appeal and error ⚷1041(2)—Refusal to allow amendment of complaint not error, where it would have been unavailing.

In a suit to rescind a contract for exchange of land, it was not error to refuse permission to amend prayer of complaint by adding a demand that defendants be declared involuntary trustees, where such amendment would have been of no avail to plaintiffs because by reason of the facts found they would not be entitled to any different judgment than that entered.

3. Judgment ⚷139—Setting aside defaults within discretion of trial judge.

The matter of setting aside defaults rests within the sound discretion of the trial judge.

4. Judgment ⚷107—Clerk's entry of default void where answer on file.

Where a default is entered by the clerk against defendants in the face of a plain record showing an answer on file, such entry is void.

5. Judgment ⚷137—Court may expunge void default entries without notice on its own motion.

The court on its own motion without notice to any one may expunge a void default entry made by the clerk, and that the court acts on the suggestion of defendants' counsel does not affect its power.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by C. F. Berry and others against George W. Crowell and wife for rescission of contract. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

D. B. Chapin and Walter W. Little, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

M. Estudillo, of Riverside, for respondents.

JAMES, J. Plaintiffs appeal from an adverse judgment. The appeal is presented by the alternative method. The questions argued relate to orders of the trial judge vacating certain default entries made by the clerk of the court; it is also contended that neither the findings nor the pleadings sustain the judgment, and that prejudicial error was committed by the court in denying a motion to allow plaintiffs to amend their complaint at the trial.

The controversy arose as a result of an exchange of real properties which was had between parties to the action. Plaintiffs were the owners of 80 acres of land in the state of Texas. Defendants were the owners of a lot in the city of Riverside, Cal. Plaintiff C. F. Berry was, at the time of the transaction, a resident of the city of Riverside. W. E. Berry, a son, was part owner in the Texas land, and he resided outside of the state of California. The entire transaction, in so far as the plaintiffs were concerned, appears to have been conducted by C. F. Berry. The complaint in this action stated a cause of action to rescind the contract of exchange upon the ground of alleged fraudulent representations made by defendant George W. Crowell respecting the value of the Riverside property. It was alleged that C. F. Berry was a farmer by occupation, and was ignorant of the values of property in the city of Riverside, and that he was "easily led, imposed upon, circumvented and overcome by cunning, artifice, and undue influence"; it was alleged that George W. Crowell falsely and fraudulently represented that his property in the city of Riverside was of the value of $6,000, and that "plaintiff could rely absolutely upon defendant's statement as to said value because defendant was well posted as to property values in said city, and that it was not necessary for the plaintiff or his son to make any investigation for themselves"; it was alleged that in fact the Riverside property was not worth in excess of the sum of $3,250, all of which the defendant George W. Crowell well knew at the time he made the aforesaid representations. Preliminarily, the plaintiffs alleged that both Crowell and C. F. Berry were members of a religious organization, and that defendant George W. Crowell was an elder of the church. The second allegation contained in the complaint is as follows:

> "That the office of elder, in said religious organization, is by said organization conferred only upon one whose Christianity is unquestioned, and whose integrity is unimpeachable, and, according to the doctrine of said organization, the statements and representations of an elder in said organization are entitled to full faith and credit."

Immediately following this allegation the complaint charges that—

> Crowell, "in addition to the duties imposed upon him by said religious organization, also is, by profession, a trader in lands and property of all kinds, and is an artful and shrewd business man of large experience."

There is the further allegation that Berry was induced to rely upon the statements of Crowell by reason of the fact that the men "were brothers together, in said church." Defendants admitted that Crowell held the office in the church, and that it was of the character alleged, but denied that the statements or representations of an elder in the organization were entitled to any more credit than that of other members. The answer in its further allegations, affirmative and of denial, tendered an issue as to all of the fraudulent acts alleged, and affirmed that no representations as to the value of defendants' land were made except that George W. Crowell stated that said land "stood him" about the sum of $5,660, and in this connection it was affirmed that such representation was true.

[1] The trial judge generally found the facts to be against the allegations of the complaint, and the findings contained the further recital that all of the allegations of defendants' answer were true "except as herein otherwise found." The allegations of denial contained in the answer and the findings of the court covering those matters are prolix; they lack clearness, and are often conjunctive where the statements should be direct and separate. Plaintiffs' counsel complains of that condition, and, because of it, makes an argument that the answer did not sufficiently tender an issue, and that the findings do not support the judgment. We have referred to the fact that, under the general finding of the court, all facts alleged in the answer not specifically referred to in those findings are determined to be true. This general finding is sufficient to embrace that allegation contained in the answer setting forth, from the side of the defendants, just what representations were made and all of them. Necessarily it would follow that, if the representations as alleged by the defendants only were made, and those representations were true, as found by the court, the allegations of the plaintiffs, as to other representations made and their alleged falsity cannot be true. If the answer may be said to have tendered a single material issue, and we have no doubt that it did, a determination by the court of that issue adversely to the plaintiffs would defeat a recovery, irrespective of the fact that other issues may not have been clearly found upon, or the court had made unnecessary findings, or findings as to facts not in issue, or undenied. If sufficient can be gathered from the whole of the findings of the court that material issues are fairly determined, the finding will support the judgment. "It was not necessary that the facts as found should be in any particular form or follow the pleadings. If the truth or falsity of each material allegation in issue can be demonstrated from the findings, the law is complied with." Ready v. McDonald, 128 Cal. 663, 61 Pac. 272, 79 Am. St. Rep. 76; Millard v. Legion of Honor, 81 Cal. 340, 22 Pac. 864. So, also, where findings are seemingly contradictory. American National Bank v. Donnellan, 170 Cal. 15, 148 Pac. 188, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 744.

[2] It was not error for the court to refuse to allow plaintiffs to amend the prayer of their complaint. This amendment proposed to add a demand that the defendants be declared to be involuntary trustees of the plaintiffs. The amendment would not have helped plaintiffs' case at all (assuming that the prayer was not already sufficient to authorize such relief) because, by reason of the facts found, plaintiffs would not be entitled to have the court enter any different judgment than that which was entered. The answer did not admit the confidential relationship which plaintiffs alleged existed.

[3-5] The alleged errors pointed to by counsel for appellants, referring to orders made by the court setting aside defaults entered against the defendants by the clerk, are entitled to but little consideration. The first default for want of an answer was set aside upon seasonable application being made and good cause shown. It has been held so often that the matter of setting aside defaults rests within the sound discretion of a trial judge that we need not refer to the cases. The profession is well advised of the law in that regard. The second default entered against the defendants was entered by the clerk in the face of a plain record showing an answer on file. Plaintiffs complain that they were given no sufficient notice of the application to set aside this second default. Notice of that motion was served upon the plaintiffs; whether the time given was sufficient or not is utterly immaterial. The second default entry as made by the clerk was void, and its character in that regard appeared plainly by an inspection of the record. In such a case the court, of its own motion and without notice to any one, might have caused it to be expunged. That it acted upon the suggestion of defendants' counsel does not affect its power in any respect. There are no other points suggested which require any consideration by the court.

PEOPLE v. CAPELLI. (Cr. 585.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 30, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 26, 1922.)

1. Intoxicating liquors ⚷24—Wylie Local Option Law held strictly a "local option law."

The Wylie Local Option Law constitutes a general scheme whereby the electors of certain designated territories in the state may determine for themselves whether within such territories the sale of intoxicating liquor may or may not be licensed and carried on, and is strictly a local option law.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Local Option Law.]

2. Intoxicating liquors ⚷132 — Wylie Local Option Law held not inconsistent with Volstead Act.

The Wylie Local Option Law, whenever its prohibitory provisions are in practical operation in the manner prescribed thereby, is in no wise repugnant to, or inconsistent with, but, as far as it goes, operates in furtherance of, the purpose of the Volstead Act.

3. Statutes ⚷64(2)—Provision of Wylie Local Option Law sanctioning sale of intoxicating liquors held not to render other provisions invalid.

Section 11 of the Wylie Local Option Law, in effect sanctioning the license and sale of intoxicating liquors in certain districts by popular vote, not being interdependent on the remainder of the act, does not render such remainder inoperative, although that section is without effect.

4. Statutes ⚷64(1)—When void provisions may be disregarded stated.

If the different parts of a statute are severable and independent, and provisions within the constitutional power of the Legislature are capable of being carried into effect after the void part is eliminated, and it is clear from the statute itself that it was the intent to enact these provisions irrespective of the others, the unconstitutional provisions will be disregarded, and the statute read as if they were not there.

5. Statutes ⚷64(2)—Wylie Local Option Law enforceable notwithstanding void subsidiary section.

It being the manifest purpose of the Legislature in enacting the Wylie Local Option Law to provide a mode whereby traffic in alcoholic liquors could be suppressed, and the provisions of section 11 authorizing licenses in certain districts by popular vote being subsidiary to the main purpose of the act, such section was not essential to the validity of the act, and, though such section is void, the remainder of the act may be enforced.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; H. L. Preston, Judge.

E. Capelli was convicted of violating the Wylie Local Option Law, and he appeals. Affirmed.

W. D. L. Held, of Ukiah, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. The defendant was charged with the violation of the provisions of the so-called "Wylie Local Option Law" under an information filed in the superior court of Mendocino county by the district attorney thereof, and which charged him with willfully and unlawfully keeping and conducting a place where alcoholic liquor was sold, served, and distributed within the boundaries of the first supervisorial district of said county and outside the corporate limits of any city or town, said supervisorial district "being then and there no license territory."

This appeal is by the defendant from the judgment of conviction. The sole question in this case is whether the Wylie liquor law, under the provisions of which defendant was convicted, has been superseded or invalidated by the act of Congress known as the "Volstead Act" (41 Stat. 305), the object of which is the enforcement of the terms of the Eighteenth Amendment to the federal Constitution. The contention of the appellant is that the effect of the enactment of the Volstead Act is necessarily to render nugatory or without force the provisions of the Wylie law. The Wylie liquor law, as it may conveniently be termed, was passed by the Legislature of 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 599), and the first section thereof provides:

> "Qualified electors of any incorporated city or town, or of that portion of any supervisorial district not included within the boundaries of any incorporated city or town, numbering not less than twenty-five per cent. of the number of votes cast for all candidates for Governor in the territory described in the petition, at the last preceding election for Governor of the state, may petition the city council, board of trustees or other legislative body of such city or town or the board of supervisors of the county in which such supervisorial district is situated, to call an election to vote upon the question, whether the sale of alcoholic liquors shall be licensed in such city, town, or supervisorial district outside of incorporated cities and towns."

The tenth section of the act reads:

> "Unless a majority of the votes cast on this question at such election are in favor of license, the territory described in the petition shall be no-license territory on and after ninety days from the date of said election; and the city council, board of supervisors or other governing body having jurisdiction thereof, shall thereupon make an entry on its records declaring that such described territory is no-license territory; but a failure to make such entry shall not affect the result or effect of such election."

The eleventh section is as follows:

> "When any city, town, or supervisorial district outside of incorporated cities and towns, becomes no-license territory it shall remain such until at a subsequent election, called, as herein provided, to vote on the question of whether the sale of alcoholic liquors shall be licensed therein, a majority of the votes cast on that question are in favor of license. It shall thereupon cease to be no-license territory within the meaning of this act."

Of the Wylie act, in speaking of the effect thereof upon a municipal ordinance designed to prohibit traffic in alcoholic liquors, this court, in Ex parte Anixter, 22 Cal. App. 117, 120, 134 Pac. 193, 194, had this to say:

> "That law, it is very true, applies to the whole state, and it is, therefore, a general law in the truest sense, and would have to be so to be constitutional, but its purpose is not, and nowhere can there be found in any of its provisions any language disclosing an intention, to prohibit, ex proprio vigore, the retail sale of intoxicating liquors throughout the state or in any subdivision thereof. It merely constitutes and involves a general scheme whereby the electors of certain designated territories in the state may determine for themselves whether, within such territories, the sale of such liquor may or may not be licensed and carried on."

[1] We adhere to the above brief exposition of the nature and scope of the Wylie law, and further declare, notwithstanding the asseveration of the Attorney General in his brief to the contrary, that it is strictly a local option law, which is described by Bouvier's Law Dictionary as:

> "A right granted by legislative enactments to the inhabitants of particular districts to determine by ballot whether or not licenses shall be issued for the sale of intoxicating liquors within such districts"

—or, as it is defined upon the authority of numerous cases in 25 Cyc. p. 1534:

> The term "local option implies the grant of the right to one locality to adopt and another to decline to avail itself of a law."

See, also, Ex parte Handler, 176 Mo. 383, 389, 75 S. W. 920; State v. Brown, 19 Fla. 563, 598; State v. Barber, 19 S. D. 1, 101 N. W. 1078, 1081; Cooley, Const. Lim. 146: In re O'Brien, 29 Mont. 530, 546, 75 Pac. 196, 1 Ann. Cas. 373; Boyd v. Bryant, 35 Ark. 69, 73, 37 Am. Rep. 6. Nor are we in accord with the theory of the Attorney General that the Wylie law, in analogy to the situation as to the insolvency laws existing in the states at the time of the enactment of the national bankruptcy law, is suspended until its provisions are invoked by any of the geographical units contemplated by the statute. The insolvency laws of a state are practically "a dead letter" so long as there exist national bankruptcy laws, although it may be true that a repeal of the latter would operate to revive the former as they existed at the time of the enactment of the bankruptcy laws; but, as suggested, while the national bankruptcy laws are in force, the state insolvency act can no more be put into operation than may a law which has been repealed. While it is true that the operation of the Wylie law remains dormant until its provisions may be or are invoked by the electors of certain of the indicated subdivisions of the state, the law is, nevertheless, in effect and is as much a part of the legal system of the state as any other law. If this were not true, the provisions of the law could never be applied by a resort thereto in the manner pointed out by its own provisions. But this discussion, it seems to us, is entirely dehors the real question which is submitted here for solution and the points which must be considered in the decision of that question.

The learned counsel for the appellant, in support of the theory upon which they urge the validity of this appeal, argue that, since the provisions of the Wylie law are not self-executing, or do not, ex vi termini, operate to prohibit traffic in intoxicating or alcoholic liquors, and since, furthermore, it also authorizes the electors of any of the subdivisions, after any such territory or district has been duly voted a no-license territory, to vote upon the question of whether the sale of alcoholic liquors shall be licensed therein with the result that such territory or district shall cease to be no-license territory within the meaning of said act, the said act is necessarily nullified by the provisions of the Volstead Act. In other words, counsel for the appellant do not contend that the Eighteenth Amendment or the Volstead Law supersedes any legislation, state or local, which by its terms is prohibitory in its nature, but concede that if the Wylie law, by its terms, involved a direct inhibition against the traffic in alcoholic liquors, and the force thereof was not destroyed by the provision therein giving to the electors of any particular geographical unit the right to do that which the federal laws prohibit, namely, to declare by their votes that within the limits of such unit the sale of alcoholic liquors may be licensed, then neither the effect of the amendment to the federal Constitution prohibiting the manufacture, sale, etc., of intoxicating or alcoholic liquors, nor that of the legislation by Congress designed to enforce said amendment would be to render said state law invalid.

In the recent case of the People v. Collins, 202 Pac. 344, the defendant was convicted under the Wylie act of the crime of selling alcoholic liquor in "no-license territory." On his appeal to this court, he contended, as it is here contended, that the Wylie act "was superseded and rendered inoperative by the national prohibition act known as the Volstead Act and, therefore, his conviction was void." In reply to the contention this court said:

> "It is sufficient to refer to In re Volpi, 199 Pac. 1090, and Ex parte Crookshank, 269 Fed. 980."

Both the Volpi and Crookshank Cases involved municipal ordinances prohibiting the manufacture, sale, etc., of alcoholic liquors within the limits of the respective municipalities concerned therein and the question submitted and decided in each case was whether or not the power in a municipality to enact and enforce within its limits an ordinance prohibiting the sale of liquor and not inconsistent with the Eighteenth Amendment to the federal Constitution or the Volstead Act, was destroyed by said amendment or the congressional legislation referred to. In each of said cases it was held (and, of course, properly) that the state or any of its political subdivisions, by virtue of the police power inherent in the people of the former and expressly granted by the people through their Constitution to the latter, may enact any legislation looking to the enforcement of the federal laws prohibiting the manufacture, sale, etc., of alcoholic liquors, and that therefore the ordinances considered in said cases involve a valid exercise of such power. In neither of those cases, however, was the Wylie act involved; nor were there presented and urged in the Collins Case, supra, the points advanced here in impeachment of the validity of the Wylie act as the direct effect of the federal laws, constitutional and legislative, prohibiting the manufacture, sale and transportation of alcoholic liquors for beverage purposes. It will hence be necessary to consider the question whether the force of the Wylie law has been destroyed or in any wise impaired by the federal constitutional amendment or the congressional legislation referred to more extendedly than it was found necessary to do in the Collins Case.

[2] The Wylie act is a state law, and, as is said in the Anixter Case, supra, and as is obviously so, it is in the truest sense a local option law. It in effect declares to the electors of certain designated geographical subdivisions of the state that it is optional with them whether they will avail themselves of its prohibitory provisions and so suppress or disallow the sale of alcoholic liquors within such subdivisions; and if, in any given case, the electors, according to the modo et forma pointed out by the act, invoke the prohibitory provisions thereof, then the act, in so far as the district thus affected is concerned, becomes, ipso facto, a prohibitory law or enactment—as much so, indeed, as if such an act were enacted by the people of the whole state under the power of the initiative or referendum. In other words, the exercise by the electors within any of the territorial units or subdivisions designated in the Wylie act of their option to avail themselves of the prohibitory provisions thereof at once makes that act, as to such unit or subdivision, a prohibitory law. It then stands, as to such territorial subdivision, precisely the same as though the Legislature, if it were not fettered by constitutional restrictions as to the passage of special laws, had passed a law directly prohibiting the sale or possession of alcoholic liquors within such unit or subdivision. It follows, therefore, that the Wylie act, whenever its prohibitory provisions are given practical operation in the manner prescribed thereby, is in no wise repugnant to or inconsistent with, but as far as it goes (while, of course, not specifically intended for that purpose) operates as in furtherance of the purposes of the Volstead act. Ex parte Volpi, supra; Ex parte Crookshank, supra; People v. Collins, supra.

It now remains to be determined whether, in view of the Eighteenth Amendment to the federal Constitution and the congressional legislation designed to enforce the terms of said amendment, the effect of section 11 of the Wylie law is to invalidate the force of the whole act. Section 11 of the Wylie act, it will be observed, in effect sanctions the licensing of the sale of intoxicating liquors in any district or city or town which has previously been voted "dry" by providing that alcoholic liquors may be dispensed therein if a majority of the electors of such district or city or town cast their votes at an election held for that purpose "in favor of license." Obviously, the federal constitutional amendment and the Volstead Act have rendered that section of the Wylie act absolutely void and nugatory; but it does not follow from the fact that said section is invalid or incapable of enforcement that thereby the whole act of which it is a part must fall. It is perfectly plain that, in the enactment of the Wylie law, the principal or central purpose of the Legislature was to provide a mode whereby the traffic in alcoholic liquors in California could be suppressed. It was, in other words, undoubtedly intended as a step looking to prohibition, leaving it, however, to the electors themselves of certain indicated local communities whether they would avail themselves of the prohibitory provisions of the act. This, we say, was unquestionably the main or principal motive actuating the Legislature in enacting the law. The incorporation into the law of section 11, which in effect authorized the electors of any territorial unit or subdivision by a majority vote at an election held for that purpose to nullify the force and effect of the prohibitory provisions of the law previously invoked therein, involved only a secondary or subsidiary consideration—that is to say, it is clear that it was not the controlling consideration prompting the enactment of the law.

[3] It is manifest that section 11 could have been in the first instance or originally eliminated from the act, or, in other words, not incorporated into the act by the Legislature as among the provisions thereof, and still the legal integrity of the prohibitory provisions of the statute would not have been impaired and the act in itself would have been complete for the evident paramount purpose or object for which it was designed, namely, to enable electors within the indicated territorial subdivisions to avail themselves of its provisions with a view of suppressing the traffic in intoxicating liquors within the limits of such subdivisions. Thus it is plainly manifest that section 11 and the prohibitory provisions of the statute are not interdependent, or the one part so dependent upon the other as that the invalidity of said section 11 has the effect of rendering invalid the other provisions.

[4] It is a familiar and cardinal canon of statutory construction that—

> "If the different parts of the statute are severable and independent of each other, and the provisions which are within the constitutional power of the Legislature are capable of being carried into effect after the void part has been eliminated, and it is clear from the statute itself that it was the intent of the Legislature to enact these provisions (the prohibitory provisions of the Wylie act) irrespective of the others, the unconstitutional provisions will be disregarded and the statute read as if these provisions were not there." Hale v. McGettigan et al., 114 Cal. 112, 119, 45 Pac. 1049, 1052.

[5] Again, in the same case, beginning at the bottom of page 119, it is said:

> "For the purpose of statutory construction, the intention of the Legislature, as shown by the general scope and purpose of the law, is to be ascertained. * * * And, if the general scope of an act is within its power, the act is not to be rendered null by reason of a subsidiary provision which was beyond its power to enact. If the manifest purpose of the Legislature can be carried into effect by upholding the act and disregarding such subsidiary provisions, that purpose will not be defeated by an unconstitutional provision contained in a subordinate section in the act."

See, also, Robinson v. Bidwell, 22 Cal. 379; People v. Todd, 23 Cal. 181; Maclay v. Love, 25 Cal. 367; People v. Whyler, 41 Cal. 351; Ex parte Gerino, 143 Cal. 412, 77 Pac. 166, 66 L. R. A. 249; In re Mitchell, 19 Cal. App. 567, 573, 126 Pac. 856.

As above declared, it is very clear that the provisions of section 11 are subsidiary to the main purpose of the Wylie act, and it is equally clear that that section is not essential to the validity of the act for the principal purpose for which it was enacted.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. DAVIS. (Cr. 2370.)

Criminal law ⚷1149 — Refusal to set aside conviction on plea of guilty, on ground that plea was coerced, not disturbed on conflicting evidence.

The trial court's denial of motion to set aside conviction of murder in first degree, entered on plea of guilty, on the ground that accused's plea was obtained by coercion, will not be reversed, where the evidence is in conflict as to such coercion; nothing appearing to show abuse of discretion in denying the motion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Shasta County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

Arthur Owen Davis was convicted of murder in the first degree, and from order denying motion to set aside the judgment of conviction he appeals. Affirmed.

Martin I. Welsh, of Sacramento, and James T. Matlock, of Red Bluff, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Jesse W. Carter, Dist. Atty., of Redding, for the People.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from an order of the superior court of Shasta county denying the motion of the defendant to set aside the judgment of conviction of murder in the first degree entered against him upon his plea of guilty on January 20, 1921. No motion for a new trial was made by said defendant, nor was any appeal from said judgment taken by him, but on March 18, 1921, the defendant made the above motion that the said judgment be vacated and set aside and that defendant be permitted to withdraw his plea of guilty theretofore entered and substitute a plea of not guilty to the information on file therein.

Said motion was based on the following ground, namely:

> "That the said plea of guilty was obtained from defendant and defendant was induced to enter said plea by coercion, fear, threats, misapprehension, persuasion, promises, assurances, inadvertence, ignorance of his rights and of the consequence of his act, without advice of counsel, without being advised of his legal rights, without proper arraignment, without being fully advised as to his rights on arraignment, without being informed or advised by counsel or by said court as to what the punishment for the crime of murder would be, without said court offering to appoint or assign counsel to aid and advise the defendant in his defense, without full knowledge of his rights, without defendant fully comprehending the serious consequences of his plea of guilty, and in violation of his constitutional and legal rights."

The motion was supported by the defendant's own affidavit and by the affidavits of certain other persons presented at the hearing thereon, and was opposed by the presentation of the affidavits of the justice of the peace before whom the defendant's preliminary examination was held, of the district attorney, of the several officers of the law implicated in the charges made in the defendant's motion, and also by affidavits of several other persons who were cognizant of the circumstances surrounding the defendant's arrest, imprisonment, examination, arraignment, plea, judgment, and sentence. The official record of the proceedings of the court was also presented in opposition to said motion. The court denied said motion, and from its order to that effect this appeal has been taken.

In the case of People v. Mooney, 178 Cal. 525, 174 Pac. 325, it was held that a proceeding by way of motion to set aside the judgment, when made after the judgment has been rendered and become final, and after a motion for new trial has been made, or the time therefor has expired, is in the nature of an application for a writ of coram nobis at common law. It was further held in that case that, where remedies exist by statute which did not exist at common law, the office and function of the writ are abridged thereby, and in such cases the writ is unavailable. These remedies are the right to appeal and to make a motion for a new trial, and where they are provided by statute, to that extent an application for a writ of coram nobis cannot be entertained. Upon the hearing of the defendant's motion in the trial court no objection was made to the presentation of any of the various matters urged by the defendant as the bases of said motion, nor has any such objection been urged here; but, notwithstanding this state of the record, this court, in entertaining and passing upon this appeal, is not to be understood as holding that as to any of the grounds urged by the defendant in support of his said motion which would have been reviewable upon motion for a new trial or upon appeal from the judgment, he was entitled to make said motion or to have the order denying the same reviewed upon this appeal.

With respect to the other grounds upon which the defendant predicated his said motion and which were triable thereon, as for example, the ground that the defendant's plea of guilty was extorted from him by coercion or induced by wrongful persuasions, promises, assurances, or threats, we do not consider it necessary to set forth in detail the evidence presented pro and con in regard to these matters. We have fully examined the record and have satisfied ourselves that as to all such matters in fact, as to every ground relied upon by the defendant in support of his said motion, the evidence is in direct and substantial conflict. We may even go further and say that upon the face of the record the preponderance of such evidence is in favor of the proposition that the defendant's plea of guilty was not induced by coercion, or threats, or improperly created fears, or by improper or deceiving persuasions or assurances, and that the defendant's consent to interpose said plea and his subsequent action in declining to avail himself of the aid and advice of counsel, and in consenting to a speedy hearing upon his said plea and to the entry of an immediate judgment thereon, were not procured or induced by any improper conduct on the part of the officers of the law, nor of any failure or neglect on the part of the justice conducting the defendant's examination, or the trial judge presiding at his trial, in the performance of the duties required of them by law to be performed for the defendant's protection, and that the proceedings attending his arrest, detention, examination, arraignment, trial, and sentence were in all respects regular. This being the state of the record, we are constrained to hold that the trial court acted within the bounds of a proper discretion in denying the defendant's motion, and hence its action in so doing will not be disturbed upon appeal.

The appellant urges certain matters upon this appeal relating to the defendant's youth and possible misapprehension as to the enormity of his final crime and as to the severity of the penalty following the perpetration of such a crime; but these are matters which, while properly presentable to the court pronouncing judgment, and while still presentable to the pardoning power upon an appeal for the exercise of clemency, have no place or potency in this tribunal, occupied, as it must be, solely in a consideration of the legal questions presented upon such an appeal.

PEERY v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES et al. (ANDERSON, Intervener).

ANDERSON v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES et al.

(L. A. 7112, 7113, 7124.)

1. Municipal corporations 🔑921(1)—Sale of bonds of municipal corporations at less than par illegal.

Under the charter of Los Angeles providing that in the creation of bonded indebtedness the general laws of the state should be observed and followed, and St. of 1901, p. 29, § 6, provided that municipal bonds issued as provided for in section 2 should not be sold for less than their par value, the sale of bonds at less than par value so as to enable them to bear 6 per cent. interest instead of 4½, as permitted in St. 1921, p. 844, § 1, is illegal, as violating a vital and essential condition upon which a permission from the electors for the creation of the indebtedness and the issue of bonds was obtained.

2. Municipal corporations 🔑918(2)—Terms and conditions of statute under which a bond election is held need not all be set out in the ordinance calling election.

Unless expressly made so, it is not essential that all terms and conditions of the statute under which a bond election is to be held shall be set forth in the ordinance calling the election, or detailed upon the ballot submitting the main question to the voters for their approval; and failure of St. 1901, p. 28, § 2, as amended by St. 1915, p. 97, to require the statement that the bonds shall not be sold below par in the ordinance calling the election does not relieve from the requirements of section 6 that they shall not be sold below par.

3. Municipal corporations 🔑907—Provision in charter that in issuance of bonds the general laws of the state should be followed held not affected by subsequent statute permitting sale of bonds for less than par.

Where bonds were issued by city of Los Angeles under St. 1901, p. 29, § 6, providing that the bonds should not be sold for less than their par value, and among other things that the rate of interest to be paid on the bonds must be specified in the ordinance calling the election for the bond issue, a provision in the charter of the city that in creating bonded indebtedness the general laws of the state shall, so far as applicable, be observed and followed, does not permit a sale of the bonds remaining unsold at less than par, so as to bear an income of 6 per cent. interest instead of 4½ per cent., the rate voted, as permitted by St. 1921, p. 844, § 1, providing for the sale of unsold bonds at a price which would net the purchaser not more than the equivalent of 6 per cent. per annum.

4. Constitutional law 🔑143—New statute cannot affect rights of citizens who voted bonds relying on original charter and statutory provisions.

Where the inhabitants of the City of Los Angeles, in pursuance of St. 1901, p. 29, § 6, providing that bonds issued by a city shall be sold for not less than their par value, voted to issue bonds bearing interest at 4½ per cent., the exercise of the constitutional rights of electors in approving the creation of the bonded indebtedness created a status analogous to a contract, which may not be changed under St. 1921, p. 844, permitting unsold bonds of a municipality to be sold below par so as to bring the purchaser not more than 6 per cent. interest.

Appeals from Superior Court, Los Angeles County, J. P. Wood, Judge.

Suit by Herbert Peery against the City of Los Angeles and others, in which H. W. Anderson intervened, consolidated with a suit by H. W. Anderson against the city of Los Angeles and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs and intervener appeal. Reversed.

Emmet H. Wilson, and Ingle Carpenter and Dana R. Weller, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Jesse E. Stephens, W. B. Mathews, Ray Eberhard, and Trent G. Anderson, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

RICHARDS, Justice pro tem. In these two cases there are three appeals: One by Herbert Peery, and one by H. W. Anderson, plaintiff and intervener, respectively, in the first of said actions, and one by H. W. Anderson as plaintiff in the second of said actions. The same questions are presented upon each of said appeals. These actions were each instituted for the purpose of obtaining an injunction against the defendant city of Los Angeles and its officials, restraining it and them from disposing of certain municipal bonds of said city for less than the par value thereof, or upon terms which would yield to the purchaser thereof a rate of interest in excess of the rate specified in the ordinances calling the respective elections held in said city for the purpose of securing the approval of its electors for the incurring of the indebtedness to be evidenced by said bond issues; and, also, for the purpose of having declared void a certain contract between said city and one I. H. Hellman, relative to the purchase of a certain portion of said bonds. As to the facts in each of these cases, there is no dispute.

In the year 1914 the city of Los Angeles duly and regularly adopted certain ordinances providing for and calling a special election within said city for the purpose of submitting to the qualified voters thereof the proposition of incurring a bonded indebtedness in the sum of $6,500,000, for the purpose of acquiring and constructing certain works for supplying the city and its inhabitants with electricity for heat, light, and power. It was provided in said ordinances that the maximum rate of interest to be paid upon said indebtedness was 4½ per cent. per annum, payable semiannually, which rate, it was specifically provided, should not be exceeded in the issuance of bonds for said indebtedness. The election, provided for in said ordinances was duly held on the 8th day of May, 1914, and resulted in a vote of more than two-thirds of the electors voting at said election approving the incurring of said indebtedness and the issuance of said bonds. Thereafter, at intervals, several issues of portions of said bonds were duly authorized and made, aggregating in all a total of $4,446,000, leaving the balance of said bonds, amounting in their face value to $2,054,000, undisposed of at the time of the institution of these actions. The complaints in these actions allege, with relation to the said portion of said bonds remaining undisposed of, that the city of Los Angeles, through its said officials, are negotiating for the sale of said remaining portion of said bonds, and are intending and threatening to sell the same for less than the par value thereof, and upon terms which will net to the purchaser an amount of interest more than the equivalent of 6 per cent. per annum, payable semiannually on the par value of said bonds.

During the month of May, 1919, the city of Los Angeles duly passed and adopted another set of ordinances, providing for the incurring of a further bonded indebtedness in the sum of $13,500,000 for the purpose of the construction of certain other works for the further supply of electric light, heat, and power to said city and the inhabitants, and also for the acquisition of a certain electric distributing system owned by the Southern California Edison Company, situate within said city, and for the calling and holding of a special election within said city for the purpose of securing the approval of the electors thereof for such bonded indebtedness. In the ordinances providing for the calling of said election it was expressly provided that the maximum rate of interest to be paid on said indebtedness was 5 per cent. per annum, payable semiannually, which rate should not be exceeded in the issuance of bonds for the said indebtedness. The election provided for in said ordinances was duly held on the 3d day of June, 1919, and resulted in a vote of more than two-thirds of the electors of said city voting at said election approving the incurring of said indebtedness and the issuance of said bonds. The entire amount of said bond issue yet remains unsold. The complaints in each of these actions allege that on or about the 1st day of August, 1921, I. H. Hellman made the city council of said city of Los Angeles a proposal in writing whereby he offered to purchase the entire issue of the aforesaid bonds for the sum of $11,965,000 and accrued interest to the date of delivery; that on the 2d day of August, 1921, the said city council of said city passed and adopted a resolution accepting said proposal, and now intends and threatens to sell and issue said bonds in accordance therewith, and for less than the par value thereof, and upon terms which will yield to the purchaser a rate of interest in excess of 5 per cent. per annum upon the par value of said bonds. These actions were accordingly instituted for the purpose of restraining the consummation of the sale of any part of the unsold portion of either of these bond issues for less than their par value, or upon terms which it is alleged would in effect work an increase in the rate of interest to be paid upon said bonds in excess of that provided for in the ordinances calling the special election for the purpose of securing the approval of the electors of the city for each of these bond issues. The complaints in each of these actions proceed to allege that the defendants therein, in thus intending and threatening to sell and dispose of the unsold bonds in each of said bond issues, are acting professedly upon and under the authority of an act of the Legislature of California, approved May 31, 1921, and entitled "An act authorizing any county, city, town, district, or political subdivision organized under the laws of this state to sell any unsold bonds thereof at a price netting the purchaser not more than six per cent. per annum, payable semiannually" (St. 1921, p. 844), and that said statute is in violation of the Constitution of the United States and of the state of California, in that the same is retroactive and impairs the vested rights of the plaintiffs and intervener as taxpayers of said city, and of all other voters, property owners and taxpayers thereof, and changes and impairs the obligation of the contract entered into by the voters of said city by and through said elections, and also of the contract which the said voters at said elections authorized the defendants to enter into in reference to the terms of issuance and sale of said bonds; and in so doing deprives these plaintiffs and all other property owners and taxpayers of said city of their property without due process of law.

The answers of the defendants in each of said actions consist chiefly in the denial that any threatened or contemplated sale of the remaining unsold portion of either of said bond issues would be in violation of the Constitution of the United States or of the state of California, or of law, and in that respect the defendants deny that the act of the Legislature approved on June 1, 1921, relating to the disposal of the remaining unsold bonds of municipalities upon the terms provided in said act, is unconstitutional or void as violating any vested or other rights of said plaintiffs or of the voters, property owners or taxpayers of the city of Los Angeles, or as impairing the obligation of any contract made or authorized by the voters of said city, or as depriving the property owners or taxpayers thereof of their property without due process of law. The defendants, therefore, prayed that the plaintiffs and intervener take nothing by their said actions.

Upon the trial of these actions the court made its findings to the effect that substantially all of the allegations of the plaintiffs in each case and of the intervener were true, with the exception of those allegations attacking the constitutionality of the act of the Legislature approved June 1, 1921, or assailing the legality of the proposed sale of the remaining unsold portion of said bonds thereunder, or upon the terms proposed by said I. H. Hellman for the purchase by him of the whole of the later issue of said bonds. The court accordingly decided that the plaintiffs and intervener were entitled to take nothing by their respective actions, and that the defendants were entitled to judgment in their favor and for their costs. From these judgments the plaintiffs and the intervener, respectively, have prosecuted these appeals.

In order to reach a proper understanding of the questions presented for consideration upon these appeals, it is necessary that the several constitutional and statutory provisions involved in the discussion thereof should be set forth. Section 18 of article 11 of the Constitution of California provides:

> "No county, city, township, board of education, or school district, shall incur any indebtedness or liability in any manner or for any purpose exceeding in any year the income and revenue provided for such year, without the assent of two-thirds of the qualified electors thereof, voting at any election to be held for that purpose. * * * Any indebtedness or liability incurred contrary to this provision * * * shall be void."

The statute of 1901 which provided the procedure for the creation of bonded indebtedness by cities, under which the city of Los Angeles proceeded in respect to both of the bond elections and bond issues in question here, contains, in section 2 thereof, as amended by St. 1915, p. 97, the following provision:

> "* * * The ordinance calling such election shall recite the objects and purposes for which the indebtedness is proposed to be incurred, the estimated cost of the proposed public improvements, the amount of the principal of the indebtedness to be incurred therefor, and the rate of interest to be paid on said indebtedness, and shall fix the date on which such election will be held, the manner of holding such election and the voting for or against incurring such indebtedness, and in all particulars not recited in such ordinance, such election shall be held as provided by law for holding municipal elections in such municipality; provided, however, that if the rate * * * to be paid on such indebtedness shall not exceed four and one-half per centum per annum payable semiannually, the rate of interest need not be recited in such ordinance, but in its discretion the said legislative branch may recite in such ordinance the maximum rate of interest to be paid on such indebtedness, not exceeding six per centum per annum payable semiannually, which rate when so recited, shall not be exceeded in the issuance of bonds for such indebtedness."

The act of 1901 also provides, in section 6 thereof, that such bonds should be issued and sold "for not less than their par value." Stats. 1901, p. 29. The charter of the City of Los Angeles provides, in section 2, subdivision 29, that the city shall have the right and power:

> "To incur indebtedness, by the issuance of bonds, for any of the purposes for which the city is authorized to provide, or for carrying out any of the powers possessed by the city; provided that, in the procedure for the creation of such bonded indebtedness, and for the issuance of such bonds, the general laws of the state of California, in force at the time such proceedings are taken, shall, so far as applicable, be observed and followed."

The bonded indebtedness and bond issues of said city in question herein were proposed and voted for by the electors of said city in conformity with the foregoing provisions of its said charter, and of the act of 1901. The ordinances proposing each of said bond issues and calling the elections for the purpose of authorizing the same expressly provided that the maximum rate of interest to be paid upon the indebtedness evidenced by the first bond issue was to be 4½ per centum per annum, payable semiannually, and by the second bond issue was to be 5 per cent. per annum, payable semiannually; and also expressly provided that said bonds should be issued in accordance with the provisions of the act of the Legislature of 1901.

In 1921 the Legislature adopted the act relating to the sale by municipalities of unsold bonds to which reference has heretofore been made. Section 1 of said act reads as follows:

> "Section 1. Any county, city and county, city, town, district or other political subdivision organized under the laws of this state may sell any bonds thereof remaining unsold, and which have heretofore been authorized by the qualified electors thereof at an election called and held as provided by law, at a price which will net the purchaser not more than the equivalent of six (6) per cent. per annum, payable semiannually, on the par value of such bonds; provided, that this act shall not apply to any such bonds which have been authorized under a law permitting the sale thereof at a price netting the purchaser more than such equivalent." Stat. 1921, p. 844.

The main contention of the appellants is that both the statutes of the state and the charter and ordinances of the city of Los Angeles, having relation to the two bond issues involved in the instant cases, do expressly prohibit the sale of said bonds for less than their par value; and the appellants further contend that this express prohibition reaches back to the very inception of the proposition for the creation of a bonded indebtedness in each case, and enters vitally into the vote of the electors of said city, granting permission to its officials to create a bonded indebtedness and issue these bonds upon the express condition and understanding that they were not to be sold for less than their par value.

[1] The statute of 1901, under the terms of which the proceedings leading up to the creation of the municipal indebtedness evidenced by each of these bond issues were taken, does contain the express provision that municipal bonds isued in accordance with its procedure should not be sold "for less than their par value." The charter of the city of Los Angeles adopts the provisions of the general laws in force at the time as the procedure to be followed in providing for such indebtedness and for the issuance of such bonds. Stats. 1911, p. 2063. The ordinances of said city proposing these respective bond issues and providing the procedure for holding the required elections conformed to the provisions of the said act of 1901, and, while they do not expressly embrace the provision in said act that such bonds, when issued, should not be sold for less than par, they do so in effect by conforming to the general terms of said act and advising the electors that their permission to create such indebtedness and to issue such bonds is sought under its terms and conditions, among which is the express provision that the bonds so issued with their approval should not be sold for less than their par value. We are constrained, therefore, to hold that this express prohibition of the act of 1901 against the sale of the bonds in question at less than their par value forbids the violation on the part of the said city and of its officials of a vital and essential condition upon which the permission of the electors of said city for the creation of said indebtedness and issue of said bonds were obtained.

[2] In arriving at this conclusion we are mindful of the argument put forth by the respondents herein to the effect that the provisions in the act of 1901, forbidding the sale of municipal bonds voted and issued under its procedure for less than their par value, is not to be found in that portion of said statute prescribing what shall be contained in the proposition to be submitted to the electors for their approval; such as the objects and purposes for which the indebtedness is proposed to be incurred, the estimated cost of the proposed public improvements, the rate of interest to be paid, and the like; and hence is not an essential or mandatory portion of said statute, nor one upon which the voters were required to exercise their election. This argument is neither persuasive nor sound. The electors of the city were advised by its charter and by its ordinances calling these bond elections that the law under which the city and its electors were acting in the matter of the proposed creation of a bonded indebtedness and the issue and disposition of these bonds was the act of 1901, all of the provisions of which were presumably known to every elector whose approval was sought thereon. We do not understand that it is essential, unless expressly made so, that all of the terms and conditions of the statute under which a bond election is to be held shall be set forth in the ordinances calling such election, or detailed upon the ballot submitting the main question to the voters for their approval; nor do we understand the case of People, etc., v. City of Los Angeles (Cal.) 200 Pa. 947, to so decide. It follows from the foregoing that any attempt on the part of said city or its officials to dispose of these bonds for less than their par value, while the state of the law under which the said indebtedness was proposed to and approved by the electors of said city remained unchanged, would have been abortive and could have been restrained at the suit of any property owner and taxpayer injuriously affected by such an act.

[3] The respondents, however, contend that the law in relation to the price at which these respective bond issues were to be sold has not remained unchanged, and they direct our attention to the fact that the Legislature of this state has enacted the statute approved June 1, 1921, the title and provisions of which are above quoted, enabling municipalities to sell any of the bonds thereof remaining unsold at the date of the approval of said act at a price which shall net the purchaser not more than the equivalent of 6 per cent. per annum on the par value of said bonds. It is not disputed that the above provision in said act amounts to the granting of permission to municipalities to dispose of their remaining unsold bonds at a price below their par value; but the contention of the respondents is that the Legislature, having originally had power to impose upon municipalities the aforesaid restriction against the sale of their bonds below par, had power through the passage of said act to remove said inhibition and relieve municipalities from the burden thereof. The respondents present this contention in several different forms. They argue, first, that by the terms of the charter of the city of Los Angeles, above quoted, it is provided that—

> "In the procedure for the creation of such bonded indebtedness and for the issuance of such bonds, the general laws of the state of California in force at the time such proceedings are taken shall, so far as applicable, be observed and followed."

The construction which the respondents would have us place upon this provision of the charter is that whatever changes the Legislature might make in the general laws with relation to the bond issues of municipalities up to the time of the actual issuance and sale of such bonds would be controlling as to the issuance and sale of such bonds after the passage of the later enactment. The respondents cite in support of this phase of their contention the case of Fritz v. San Francisco, 132 Cal. 373, 64 Pac. 556. This case does not sustain the respondents' contention in that regard, but rather leans in the other direction, since it is therein decided that when the general law under which proceedings for the issuance of certain bonds had been initiated in the city of San Francisco was entirely superseded by the adoption of the charter of said city, which provided its own complete scheme for the issuance of municipal bonds, the bonds formerly voted for under the general law could not be issued under the provisions of the charter. We are also referred to the cases of Brownell v. Town of Greenwich, 114 N. Y. 518, 22 N. E. 24, 4 L. R. A. 685, and Morgan v. Falls City, 103 Neb. 795, 174 N. W. 421, as sustaining the respondents' contention. But in the first of these cases it was merely held that a subsequent Legislature might correct irregularities in the action of officials conducting a bond election which did not affect the consent of the taxpayers previously given; while in the latter case it was expressly held that an attempted statutory change in the terms of the bonds voted for under a prior law, providing that they should become due in 40 years, but be payable at any time after 10 years, which change would make such bonds fall due in 20 years and payable at any time after 5 years, could not be permitted, the court holding that this was a substantial change affecting the rights of the taxpayers. The court also held that—

> "The proposition to make the bonds payable at any time after 5 years was never submitted to the voters; hence was never adopted by them; bonds issued must conform to the proposition adopted by the electors."

But aside from the inaptitude of these citations we do not accept the construction of the Los Angeles charter provision for which the respondents contend, since to do so to the extent claimed would be to sanction an entire subversion of the will of the electors as to practically all of the conditions upon which their consent to the incurring of the indebtedness and the issuance and disposition of the bonds had been obtained through the simple expediency of a legislative enactment. For reasons hereafter to be given, such an interpretation of the charter provision should not be adopted.

The respondent further urges in support of its main contention in this regard that since the Legislature in adopting the statute of 1901 might have omitted the requirement as to the sale of bonds to be voted and issued thereunder for not less than their par value, a subsequent Legislature would have power to relax or remove this restriction at any time; and we are cited to the case of Cole v. City of Los Angeles, 180 Cal. 617, 182 Pac. 436, as sustaining this view. In the above-cited case the question was whether or not the statement in the ordinance calling the election that "the maximum rate of interest to be paid on said indebtedness shall be six per cent. per annum payable semiannually" complied with the statute which required the ordinance calling the election to state "the rate of interest to be paid on the indebtedness." It was held that such variance could be cured by statute. There the electorate were fully advised as to the maximum indebtedness to be incurred and voted for such maximum, and no constitutional question was involved.

[4] The respondents finally urge that a subsequent Legislature would have power to change this requirement in the earlier statute under which these bonds were voted, for the reason that the electors, in voting to approve the creation of the indebtedness and issue and sale of the bonds in the form and upon the terms specified in such statute, did so with the knowledge that the terms of such statute were subject to legislative change, and therefore gave their approval of these bond issues with the understanding that such changes might be made. This argument is nothing more nor less than a seductive sophistry, since to give it the application for which the respondents contend would be to render every substantial statutory or contractual right of individuals subject to be taken away for no better reason than that they had acted or contracted in view of possible changes in the law. There is one comprehensive answer to each and all of the foregoing arguments of the respondents in support of the general proposition that the act of the Legislature of 1921 has been effectual to remove the requirement of the act of 1901, that these bonds should be voted for and issued upon condition that they should not be sold for less than their par value. It is this: The Constitution, by virtue of the section above quoted, gives to the electors of a municipality the substantial right to grant or refuse their approval to the incurring of any indebtedness beyond the limit expressed in said constitutional provision. The act of the Legislature of 1901, in giving effect to this provision of the Constitution by providing the procedure in conformity with which the electors' approval or disapproval of a proposed bonded indebtedness was to be expressed, has provided the particular terms and conditions upon which the approval of the electors might be secured. Among these were the requirements that the ordinances calling the election should recite the objects and purposes for which the indebtedness was proposed to be incurred, the estimated cost of the public improvement to which the funds secured were to be applied, the amount of the principal of the indebtedness, the rate of interest to be paid thereon. These recitals must be set forth in the ordinances providing for and calling the election, but, in addition to these, there is the added provision that the bonds when issued should be sold "for not less than their par value." This provision in the act has a two-fold purpose: First, to assure the electors that the entire sum for which they vote to burden themselves and their city with a bond issue will be realized from the sale of the bonds; second, to assure the electors that the objects and purposes for which the bonded indebtedness is to be incurred shall be fully subserved through the application of the whole face value of the bonds to such objects and purposes. This thought is well expressed in the case of Uhler v. City of Olympia, 87 Wash. 1, 151 Pac. 117, where the court, in dealing with an attempted payment of commissions and compensation for selling certain municipal bonds, aptly said:

> "This limitation on the power of the council is just as prohibitive, and, if disobeyed would result in the same evil, as if the statute had provided that the bonds should be sold at not less than par. In either case the object of the law is to prevent speculation in municipal securities, and to insure to those who must ultimately pay the bonds, a dollar in lawful currency for every dollar of obligations issued."

In these aspects this stipulation in the statute providing for the bond election is as vital as any other provisions in it, since it goes directly to the matter of the relative amount of the burden and benefit which the electors are to agree by their votes to assume. The proposition having thus been made by the officials of a city to the voters thereof to approve a bonded indebtedness for the specified purposes in the specific amount of principal, at the specified rates of interest and upon the express assurance that the bond issues, if approved, should not be sold for less than their par value, what relation is created as between the city, through its officials on the one hand, and the electors on the other, by the latter's formal acceptance of such proposition through the required vote? In some jurisdictions it has been held that the relation thus created is a contractual one, which cannot be changed in any essential particular by the officials of the city, either with or without the aid of later legislation. In the case of Merchants', etc., Bank v. Escondido Irrigation District, 144 Cal. 329, 77 Pac. 937, which involved the question as to whether the board of directors of an irrigation district, after the property owners forming the district had voted to issue bonds for the purpose of carrying out the object of its formation, under an act declaring how said bonds should be paid, could be permitted by a later and amendatory act to provide a different method of payment of the indebtedness secured by said bonds, this court said:

> "The act providing for the organization of the district, and the organization of the district under the provisions of the act by the vote of its electors, cannot be otherwise regarded than as a contract between the state and the individuals whose property was thereby affected. The contract, indeed, lacks one of the ordinary elements of contracts—namely, the actual consent of all the parties to it; but by the provisions of the statute the majority of the electors were empowered to act and consent for the individual proprietor; and unless this were a legitimate exercise of the powers of the state, the statute itself would be invalid. Hence the consent of all the parties to the contract was in fact given either personally or by their authorized agents; and there was thus created a complete contract between the parties by the terms of which the property owners in the district consented to the burden imposed upon their property by the provisions of section 17 of the original act, and to no other. The burden thus imposed was, that the bonds issued under the act should 'be paid by revenue derived from an annual assessment upon the real property of the district,' and that their lands should 'be and remain liable' for such assessment; and this implied that this should be the extent of the burden. But by the amendatory act the board of directors is authorized, without the consent, or even the knowledge, of the landowners, to pledge or hypothecate the property acquired by their contributions—that is to say, acquired with their money—and thus to subject them to the liability of losing entirely the property thus acquired; which is not only their property, but by the express provision of the statute (section 13) has been 'dedicated and set apart to the uses and purposes set forth in the original act;' which would leave them only the liability for continued assessments until the balance of the bonds shall be paid. We have no doubt, therefore, that in this respect also the Legislature went beyond its constitutional powers."

The authorities in other jurisdictions holding the same view are Deland v. Platt Co. (C. C.) 54 Fed. 823; David v. Timon (Tex. Civ. App.) 183 S. W. 88; Scott v. Forrest, 174 Ky. 672, 192 S. W. 691; Percival v. City of Covington, 191 Ky. 337, 230 S. W. 300; Wullenwaber v. Dunigan, 30 Neb. 877, 47 N. W. 420, 13 L. R. A. 811; Lawson v. Kanawha County Court, 80 W. Va. 612, 92 S. E. 786. We do not, however, deem it necessary to go so far in this case as to hold that a contractual relation, in the ordinary sense of the term, has been created between the electors of the city of Los Angeles and the officials thereof by the proposal and approval of these bond issues, but we are satisfied that a status analogous to such relation was created through the exercise of the constitutional right of the electors of said city in approving the creation of the bonded indebtedness represented in these two bond issues upon the express conditions and assurances contained in the act of 1901, which may not be changed in the manner and to the extent it is sought to be changed under the provisions of the act of 1921, without working, in effect, a fraud upon the electors through securing their votes for the approval of these bond issues upon terms and conditions which will not be kept if the attempted sale of these bonds below their par value is given the sanction of this court. In the case of Wallace v. Ball, 205 Ala. 623, 88 South. 442, the court, in dealing with a similar constitutional provision to ours, and with similar situation to that presented in these cases, through the attempted legislation identical in effect to that of the statute of 1921, says:

> "A majority of the voters answered by ballot, 'Yes.' Now the Legislature attempts by this act, without any clear intimation thereof in its title, to authorize these bonds sold at a discount—below par—which will net to the purchaser 7 per cent. per annum on his investment. The interest on a bond is a part of the bond. If the Legislature can increase the rate of interest or sell the bonds below par after the voters authorized a sale at par and at 5 per cent. interest, then they can take away entirely from the majority of the voters the right to have the bonds issued. The Constitution gives the Legislature the right to fix the mode and manner of getting the will of the qualified voters on a bond issue; and it gives to the majority of the qualified voters at the election the right to authorize the issuance of the bonds by the board of revenue. The voters having fixed by ballot the amount of the bond issue, the maximum rate of interest, and under a law stating they must not be sold below their face value, it is then beyond the power of the Legislature to authorize a higher rate of interest thereon or a sale of these bonds below par."

In the case of Skinner v. City of Santa Rosa, 107 Cal. 464, 40 Pac. 742, 29 L. R. A. 512, which was a case wherein the officials of the city of Santa Rosa had undertaken to change the amount of interest to be paid upon certain municipal bonds of said city, after a vote of its electors approving the issue of such bonds, this court held that the provision for the payment of the added interest upon said bonds would in effect increase the amount of the indebtedness which the electors had by their votes approved, and would to that extent be a violation of the constitutional inhibition. And the court goes on to say:

> "If the terms and conditions submitted to the electors may be departed from, and such election held to authorize the issuance of bonds under other terms and conditions, a door will be opened authorizing the common council to submit a proposition so favorable as to secure beyond question a favorable vote, and then change the conditions as to rate of interest and otherwise, even without any fraudulent purpose or intent, so that, if again submitted, an overwhelming defeat would result. * * * In the case at bar, where the question arises before the bonds have been delivered, we hold that the city has no power to issue them in a form which does not substantially comply with the terms stated in the ordinance of submission and notice of election, and with the statute under which the proceedings were had."

It is not intended by anything said in this opinion to suggest or intimate that there was any actual fraudulent intent on the part of the officials of the city of Los Angeles in seeking to take advantage of the terms of the statute of 1921 by disposing of these bond issues at less than their par value. Nevertheless so to do, either with or without the sanction of said act, would be to accomplish a purpose directly violative of one of the essential conditions upon which the constitutional approval by the electors of said city of these bond issues was obtained, and in that sense a fraud would be wrought by permitting that condition to be violated by the sale of these bonds below par. For this reason we are constrained to hold that the authorization attempted to be conferred upon said city of Los Angeles to dispose of the unsold portion of these bond issues for less than their par value by the act of 1921 is invalid, and hence that the plaintiffs and intervener in these actions were entitled to an injunction restraining such attempted or threatened sales.

The judgment is reversed.

We concur: WASTE, J.; WILBUR, J.; SLOANE, J.; SHURTLEFF, J.; LENNON, J.

SHAW, C. J. I concur in the foregoing opinion. I wish to add, however, that, in my opinion, the vote of the people, by which the city was authorized to sell the bonds at a price not less than par, constituted a part, and a material part, of the contract evidenced by the bonds, as stated in Bank v. Escondido Irr. Dist., 144 Cal. 329, 77 Pac. 937. The city is the nominal obligor or promisor on the bonds. It has no authority to make the promise and issue the bonds, except such as it obtained by this vote, and that authority was conditioned that the buyer of the bonds, the promisee, should pay to the city at least the par value as the consideration thereof. The real payors of the bonds are the people who pay the taxes levied to raise the fund for that purpose. They are, under the constitutional scheme, in substance and effect the principals whose authority must be first given, in order to authorize their agent, the city, to make the contract. This authority, as evidenced by the records of the election at which the authority was given, must be considered as a part of the contract, at least to the extent that the conditions therein stated cannot be disregarded by the city in selling the bonds, nor by the purchaser at the sale, and, this being so, it necessarily follows that an act of the Legislature purporting to authorize a disregard thereof would, if valid, impair a material portion of the contractual obligation.

SAN JOAQUIN & KINGS RIVER CANAL & IRRIGATION CO., Inc., v. WORSWICK et al.

MILLER & LUX, Inc., et al. v. SAME.

(Sac. 3119, 3120.)

1. Waters and water courses 🔑19—Where neither local customs, laws, nor decisions do not recognize rights of lower appropriator superior to upper, acts of Congress do not create right.

Inasmuch as neither the local customs, laws, nor decisions of the California courts had ever recognized or upheld the doctrine that water rights acquired by an appropriation or diversion on private land would be superior to the riparian rights pertaining to land above the place of diversion, Act Cong. July 26, 1866, § 9 (U. S. Comp. St. § 4647), supplemented by Act July 9, 1870, § 17 (U. S. Comp. St. § 4648), protecting rights so recognized neither created such superior right nor provided for the maintenance or protection of the same.

2. Waters and water courses 🔑19—Statute protecting water rights recognized by local customs, etc., construed.

Act Cong. July 26, 1866, § 9 (U. S. Comp. St. § 4647), providing that whenever by priority of possession rights to the use of water have vested and accrued and are recognized by local customs, laws, and the decisions of courts, the possessors and owners thereof shall be maintained and protected therein, refers to the customs, laws, and decisions of the courts of the particular state in which the appropriation is made, and in which the land affected lies.

3. Waters and water courses 🔑138—Riparian owner's rights not affected by any interference or use below his land.

The rights of a riparian owner in the waters of an abutting stream are not affected by any interference with the waters of the stream, made on privately owned land after they have passed below the boundaries of his land, and such use below, no matter how long continued or what may be the nature of the claim of right thereto, in no manner affects the riparian rights of the upper owner, since to establish a right by prescription, the acts by which it is sought to establish it must invade the rights of the party against whom it is set up, and afford ground for an action.

4. Waters and water courses 🔑21—Diversion of water on land of United States gives right to water superior to riparian rights of subsequent purchaser of public land lying above.

Under Act Cong. July 26, 1866, § 9 (U. S. Comp. St. § 4647), and Act July 9, 1870, § 17 (U. S. Comp. St. § 4648), where the diversion of water from a river is made on land then belonging to the United States, the right of the appropriator to the water thereby taken is superior to the riparian rights of a subsequent purchaser of land from the United States lying above the point of diversion.

5. Waters and water courses 🔑21—Appropriation of waters on land belonging to state not paramount to riparian rights of public lands above place of diversion.

Where appropriations of water were made in 1871 and 1872, and the headgates and dams of the appropriators' canals were situated on lands classed as swamp and overflow lands granted to the state by Act Cong. Sept. 28, 1850 (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 4958–4960), but not patented until 1895, such appropriations were not, under Act Cong. July 26, 1866, § 9 (U. S. Comp. St. § 4647), supplemented by Act July 9, 1870, § 17 (U. S. Comp. St. § 4648), paramount to the riparian rights of one subsequently purchasing public lands of the United States situated above the place of diversion.

6. Public lands 🔑58—Title to swamp land relates back to date of grant.

Under Act Cong. Sept. 28, 1850 (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 4958–4960), granting swamp and overflowed lands to the state, when land was identified and a patent issued to the state by the United States in 1895, the title so transferred to the state related back to the year 1850, and inured to the benefit of the state and its successors in interest for all purposes as if the legal title to the land finally identified had passed at the date of such act.

7. Waters and water courses 🔑19—Desert Land Act, declaring waters free for appropriation, refers only to desert land.

The Desert Land Act March 3, 1877 (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 4674–4678), providing that the right to the use of water shall depend on bona fide prior appropriation, and that all surplus water above actual appropriation and use shall remain and be free for appropriation and use by the public for irrigation, mining, and manufacturing purposes, subject to existing rights, applies only to desert lands, and does not apply to all the public lands of the United States, so as to make rights under appropriations of water paramount to riparian rights.

8. Waters and water courses 🔑33—Determination by commissioner that lands are "desert lands" must be shown by plaintiff if material.

In an action to quiet title to water appropriated from the San Joaquin river as against upper riparian owners who acquired title after the passage of the Desert Land Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 4674–4678), which committed the question of determining what were desert lands to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, it was incumbent on plaintiff to show the fact, if material to his case, that such determination had been made with respect to the land in question, and in the absence of such showing it is presumed no such determination by the Commissioner had been made.

9. Waters and water courses 🔑152(6)—Burden on lower appropriator to show appropriation and use for public purposes were known to upper owner, if material.

In an action to quiet title to water rights by one who had appropriated water by means of canals and devoted it to public use for more than 40 years, as against upper owners who had permitted the water to flow by their lands without any use thereof, the burden was on plaintiffs to show defendant's knowledge of their appropriation and use of the water, if material, though such appropriation and use were notorious.

10. Waters and water courses 🔑152(8)—Finding that upper owners did not know of appropriation and use of water not contrary to the evidence.

In an action to quiet title to water rights by one who had appropriated water and devoted it to public use for more than 40 years, as against upper owners who had made no use of the water, a finding that the appropriation and use of such water, though notorious, was unknown to the upper owners, held not contrary to the evidence, consisting of extracts from newspaper articles referring to the size of the canal and the extent of territory to be irrigated thereby.

11. Waters and water courses 🔑138—Elements of estoppel to assert riparian rights stated.

To constitute an estoppel in favor of an appropriator of water, as against a riparian owner, the person sought to be estopped must have failed to do some act which it was within his power to do, and the person claiming the estoppel must have relied on such failure to such an extent and for such a period that the subsequent doing of the act would cause him injury.

12. Waters and water courses 🔑138—Upper riparian owner without right to interfere with lower appropriation not estopped from asserting rights to water.

Since courts had adopted the rule that a diversion below one's riparian land did not concern or injure him, and it had become a rule of property, an upper owner was not estopped from asserting his riparian rights to the injury of the lower owner merely because he had not used the water on his land.

13. Waters and water courses 🔑129—Diverter may obtain title by prescription against lower owner even if public service company.

A person, by taking water from a stream above the place of diversion of water therefrom by a public service corporation for public use, may acquire title by prescription even as against such public use, whether he be a riparian owner or not.

14. Pleading 🔑406(7)—Without demurrer or objection to evidence, pleading lacking in certainty is waived.

Where a pleading is lacking in certainty and no demurrer submitted or objection made to the evidence on the subject, the lack of sufficient averment is deemed waived.

SHAW, C. J. In each of the cases above entitled the plaintiff appeals from the judgment. The two cases were begun separately, and separate pleadings, findings and judgment were filed and made in each case. They were, however, tried together in the court below, and the two cases are submitted, so far as the plaintiffs are concerned, upon the same briefs. As the questions are, for the most part, identical, they may be treated together.

In case No. 3119, that of the San Joaquin & Kings River Canal & Irrigation Company, Inc., the complaint alleges that, under an appropriation and diversion of the waters of the San Joaquin river, made in the year 1871, by the San Joaquin & Kings River Canal & Irrigation Company, the predecessor in interest of the plaintiff, the said company was the owner, from the year 1871 down to the 12th day of June, 1905, of the right to divert from said river a flow of 1,000 cubic feet of water per second; that under a similar appropriation and diversion, made in the year 1897, the said company was the owner, from the last-mentioned year down to the 12th day of June, 1905, of the right to divert from said river an additional flow of 350 cubic feet per second of the waters thereof; that on the day last mentioned said company sold and transferred to the plaintiff all of its said water rights, together with its canals and works for the diversion and distribution of said water, and that plaintiff has been ever since said transfer, and now is, the owner thereof; that both the plaintiff and its said predecessor were public service corporations, and that as such they each, during the time of their respective ownerships thereof, devoted said water to the public use for irrigation of land and other beneficial purposes. It further alleges that during all of this time the defendants were fully aware of the diversion and public use of said water by said plaintiff and its said predecessor, and that the defendants did not object to the same, nor did they, or either of them, divert or use the water of said river until within the last five years preceding the commencement of this action; that during said five years defendants have taken and diverted from the river large quantities of the waters thereof, thereby depriving the plaintiff of the water to which it is entitled as aforesaid, and that the rights of the defendants in said waters are subject and subordinate to the said rights of plaintiff. The action was begun on October 6, 1913. The prayer is that plaintiff's title to its said water rights be quieted and that the defendants be enjoined from diverting water so as to interfere therewith.

In case No. 3120, that of Miller & Lux, Inc., and Union Colonization Company, the complaint alleges a diversion from the San Joaquin river of 120 cubic feet of water thereof by the predecessor of said plaintiffs in the year 1872, and the continuous use thereof by said predecessor in interest and by plaintiffs as owners in common as successors, by the continuous distribution thereof for the irrigation of land and other purposes, through a canal know as the Chowchilla canal, and that plaintiffs as such successors are now the owners of the said canal and of the right so acquired in 1872 by the plaintiffs' predecessors in interest to take said quantity of water for the beneficial purposes aforesaid. It further alleges that the plaintiff Miller & Lux, Inc., owns a number of parcels of land, fully described, bordering upon the said river and the branches and channels thereof; that the plaintiff Union Colonization Company is also the owner of certain described parcels of land riparian to said river; that the plaintiffs, respectively, have for many years diverted and used the waters of the river and its branches and channels for the irrigation of their said lands, and that other portions of the said lands, by reason of their low elevation, are annually and periodically overflowed and moistened by the waters of said river, and thereby its productiveness is greatly increased; that the riparian right of the said plaintiffs to use the waters of said river and its branches upon their land as aforesaid is subject to the right of the plaintiffs by appropriation to take and use the 120 cubic feet of water per second as above mentioned; that within five years last past the defendants have constructed pumping plants above the head of the said Chowchilla canal and above the lands of plaintiffs above mentioned, and by means thereof have taken large quantities of water from the river so as to prevent plaintiffs from diverting or using the water so appropriated and owned by them as aforesaid and from receiving and using the waters necessary for the irrigation and moistening of their lands riparian to said river as aforesaid; that the rights of the plaintiffs to said 120 cubic feet of water and to the use of said water on riparian lands are superior to those of the defendants in said stream; that the defendants have no right to the waters of the said river.

The prayer is that plaintiffs be adjudged to be the owners of the right to divert said 120 second feet of water from said river, and of the right to have said river flow through their said riparian land and to the reasonable use of the waters thereof on said land; that said right to said 120 second feet be quieted and declared superior to any rights of defendants, and that the riparian rights, if any, of defendants and plaintiffs be ascertained and justly apportioned and defined. This action was begun on April 17, 1914.

In case No. 3119 several of the defendants filed separate answers. Each defendant claimed the right to use the waters of the river as riparian owners of land situated on the river above the points of diversion of the plaintiff.

In case No. 3120 the answers set up the ownership of land riparian to the stream and the right to use the waters thereof as riparian owners, all of said land being situated above the riparian lands of the plaintiffs in said action and above the point of diversion by said plaintiffs of said 120 second feet of water.

In case No. 3119 the court found that the plaintiff was the owner, subject to certain rights found to be in the defendants, of the right to divert from said river a continuous flow of 1,360 cubic feet of water per second, of which 760 second feet was held under said appropriation made in 1871, and 600 second feet was held under the said appropriation made in 1897, mentioned in the complaint; that the defendants, within five years last past, have, by means of pumps, diverted from the river above said plaintiff's dams, large quantities of water and thereby the plaintiff has been prevented from diverting and using the amount of water so appropriated and owned by it as aforesaid, and that the said appropriation and use of said water by the plaintiff was notorious, but was unknown to said defendants; and that said defendant did not consent thereto.

As to the defendants' rights in said case the court found that certain of the defendants, respectively, owned tracts of land bordering upon said river above the head of said canals of plaintiff, and that as such owners they are entitled to take and use for the irrigation of said lands a reasonable amount of the waters of said river, and that said riparian rights of the defendants are superior to said rights of the plaintiff.

It further found that of said riparian lands of the defendants, certain parcels, containing in the aggregate nearly 6,000 acres, were a part of the public land of the United States at the time of the appropriation of the 760 second feet of water in 1871 now owned by the plaintiff, and that at the time of said appropriation other parcels of the defendants' riparian land, aggregating over 500 acres, were not at that time part of the public lands of the United States, but belonged to private owners.

It also found that the headgates and dams of plaintiff's said canals are situated on lands which at the time said first appropriation of 760 feet was made were classed and claimed as swamp and overflowed lands by the state authorities; that applications to purchase the same from the state were made and approved in 1864; that pursuant to said applications the state issued patents to said purchasers; that said lands were listed by the United States to the state of California as swamp and overflowed lands on November 21, 1895, and were patented to the state on January 10, 1896, and that the plaintiff had acquired all the title of the original purchasers from the state to the lands on which its headgates and dams are situated. At the time of the 1897 appropriation, under which plaintiff diverts 600 second feet of water, all of the lands involved in the action were in private ownership. On March 3, 1877, when the desert land law was enacted by Congress, 2,162 acres of defendants' said riparian lands were public lands of the United States.

With respect to case No. 3120 the court found that the plaintiffs therein were the owners as tenants in common, subject to certain rights of the defendants therein, of the right to divert and use 120 cubic feet flowing per second of the waters of the San Joaquin river, by and through the Chowchilla canal, which right began in the year 1872, the headgates thereof being in part on land entered from the state as swamp and overflowed land by entry approved on March 23, 1861, and patented by the state to the purchaser in 1874, and in part on lands similarly entered from the state by entries approved and patented in 1869; that all of said land was listed to the state by the United States as swamp and overflowed land in 1895 and patented to the state in 1896 as aforesaid, and that said right of plaintiffs was subject and subordinate to the riparian rights of the defendants therein as found to exist by the court; also that the plaintiffs Miller & Lux, Inc., and Union Colonization Company, respectively, were the owners separately of certain tracts of land riparian to the river, particularly described, as alleged in the complaint, and that the defendants severally have within the last five years pumped out of said river and used on their own land riparian thereto large quantities of water, and thereby have deprived the plaintiffs of the water so appropriated by them through the Chowchilla canal, and have diminished the water available to the said plaintiffs on their said riparian tracts of land.

The riparian lands of the defendants described are the same as those described in the other findings in case No. 3119, so far as they lie above the headgate of the said Chowchilla canal, and the dates when they ceased to be public land are the same as the dates given in the findings in the other case.

The conclusions of law in each case were as follows: That the rights of the several defendants to take and use water from the San Joaquin river on lands riparian thereto, situated above the plaintiff's points of diversion under their respective appropriations, are paramount to the rights of the plaintiffs under such appropriation, regardless of the time when the uses on the riparian land began, and regardless of the fact that large portions of said riparian land were at the time of the inception of the appropriations part of the public land of the United States; in other words, that the rights of said riparian proprietors to use water from the river on the riparian land are superior to the rights of the plaintiffs under the several appropriations made before the use on the riparian land began.

The conclusions in each case also involve the proposition, although not expressly stated, that the fact that when the several appropriations under which plaintiff's claims were initiated, the land on which the headgates and dams were located was swamp and overflowed land, which had been previously entered from the state as such land and afterwards patented by the United States to the state, is not a material factor in the case and the question whether such land is or is not to be regarded as land in private ownership from the time of the entry thereof under the state laws as swamp and overflowed land.

The plaintiffs insist that their rights to the water of the river, under the appropriations of 1871 and 1872, are superior to the riparian rights thereto, pertaining to the land of the defendants situated above the dam and headgates of the plaintiffs' canals, with respect to all of said lands that were public lands of the United States, or of the state of California at the time the plaintiffs' appropriations were made, respectively.

The question, for the purposes of discussion, should be subdivided into two classes: (1) Where the land on which the diversion works are located is, at the time the diversion is effected, in private ownership, or is held in other ownership than that of the United States; (2) where the diversion works are made on land then belonging to the United States, as part of its public domain. We will take up these points in the order stated.

The plaintiffs rely upon the act of Congress of July 26, 1866 (14 U. S. Stats. 253, § 9 [U. S. Comp. St. § 4647]) and of July 9, 1870, supplemental thereto (16 U. S. Stats. 218, § 17 [U. S. Comp. St. § 4648]), and of the Desert Land Act of March 3, 1877 (19 U. S. Stats. 377 [U. S. Comp. St. §§ 4674–4678]). Their contention is that these acts have the effect of giving the appropriator of water for the irrigation of land in private ownership, who makes his diversion by means of a dam or headgate also located on land in private ownership, a right paramount to all riparian rights pertaining to public land situated above such place of diversion.

[1-3] Section 17 of the act of 1870 purports to be amendatory of section 9 of the act of 1866. The appropriations in question were made subsequent to 1870, and therefore the two acts may be taken together in order to determine the effect thereof in the present case. So considered they are as follows:

> "Whenever, by priority of possession, rights to the use of water * * * have vested and accrued, and the same are recognized * * * by the local customs, laws, and the decisions of courts, the possessors and owners of such vested rights shall be maintained and protected in the same; and the right of way for the construction of ditches and canals for the purposes aforesaid is hereby acknowledged and confirmed." Section 9. "All patents granted, or pre-emptions or homesteads allowed, shall be subject to any vested and accrued water rights, or rights to ditches and reservoirs used in connection with such water rights, as may have been acquired under or recognized by" the aforesaid section 9. Section 17.

Proceeding to an analysis of this language, it will be seen that the only water rights which are protected, maintained, acknowledged or confirmed by these enactments are those rights which "are recognized by the local customs, laws and decisions of the courts." This, of course, means in each case, the customs, laws, and decisions of the courts in the particular state in which the appropriation is made and in which the land affected lies. Section 17, taken in connection with section 9, must be construed as declaring that lands granted by patents issued by the United States shall be subject to such water rights as had previously vested or accrued under rules which have been established or recognized as law by the decisions of the courts of this state on the subject. It is necessary, therefore, to determine whether or not the decisions of our courts have established the proposition that an appropriation from a stream for use upon lands in private ownership, and made by means of a dam situated upon land in private ownership, gives to the appropriator a right to the water appropriated which is superior to the right of riparian owners above to the use of water from the stream upon the riparian land. There are no decisions in this state which declare or recognize this doctrine. On the contrary, it has always been held that the rights of the riparian owner of such land above are superior to those of the diverter or appropriator below. The law as established and recognized by the decisions of this state, in every case in which it has been considered, is declared to be that the rights of a riparian owner in the waters of the abutting stream are not affected by any interference with the waters of the stream, made on privately owned land after they pass below the boundaries of such riparian land. Such use below, no matter how long continued, or what may be the nature of the claim of right thereto by the user thereof, in no manner affects the riparian rights pertaining to the land above the place of use and point of diversion. Thus in Hargrave v. Cook, 108 Cal. 77, 41 Pac. 19, 30 L. R. A. 390, the court said:

> "With any use or diversion of the water after it has passed his land the upper riparian proprietor, having no ownership in and no longer any rights to it, would have no concern. * * * None of his rights would or could be impaired thereby, and without such an impairment he would be without injury, and, consequently, without cause for complaint or redress. 'His right extends no further than the boundary of his own estate. He cannot complain of the mere facts of the diversion of the water course either above or below him, if, within the limits of his own property, it is allowed to follow its accustomed channel.'"

And further, speaking of the effect of these facts on the law of prescription, the court proceeds to say:

> "Before one can acquire a right to the doing of an act in which another so acquiesces, the act itself must amount to an invasion of that other's rights, and the doing must either have been so long continued as that a prescriptive claim can be supported upon the theory that the acquiescence presupposes a grant, or under such circumstances as will raise an estoppel against the objecting party. But, as the upper riparian proprietor's right to object to any use or diversion of the water below ceased when it had flowed past his boundary, any such use could not work an invasion of his rights, and he was not called upon to protest against it."

The same doctrine has been declared in Hanson v. McCue, 42 Cal. 310, 10 Am. Rep. 299; Bathgate v. Irvine, 126 Cal. 140, 58 Pac. 442, 77 Am. St. Rep. 158; Cave v. Tyler, 133 Cal. 567, 65 Pac. 1089; Hudson v. Dailey, 156 Cal. 627, 105 Pac. 748; Perry v. Calkins, 159 Cal. 177, 113 Pac. 136; Miller & Lux v. Enterprise, etc., Co., 169 Cal. 423, 147 Pac. 567; and Holmes v. Nay, 199 Pac. 327.

The proposition is settled by these decisions, and it should be adhered to as a rule of property, even if we were doubtful of its soundness in logic, reason, and justice. But we have no such doubt. The rule that such diversions do not affect the upper riparian rights follows logically from the well-settled rule stated in the above-cited cases, and in every other case on the subject of prescription, that—

> "In order to establish a right by prescription, the acts by which it is sought to establish it must operate as an invasion of the right of the party against whom it is set up. The enjoyment relied upon must be of such a character as to afford ground for an action by the other party." Anaheim W. Co. v. Semi Tropic W. Co., 64 Cal. 192, 30 Pac. 625.

The precise question presented in this case was decided in Cave v. Tyler, above cited. It was there expressly held that a diversion or appropriation of water of a stream, the diversion being on land privately owned and for use on such land, at a point below a tract of government land abutting on the stream only at points above such point of diversion, and the use thereof for five years, gave the appropriator or diverter no rights under the aforesaid acts of Congress as against the riparian rights of a subsequent purchaser from the United States of government land situated upon the stream above the point of diversion. The nature of the water rights intended to be recognized and protected by the said acts of Congress are there clearly described by Justice McFarland. We cannot hope to speak with greater authority on such a subject than this eminent jurist. He was an active practitioner at the bar in the mining regions of California during the period when the rights referred to in said acts became established and "recognized" by the "local customs, laws and the decisions of the courts." No one could be better advised than he as to those customs, laws and decisions and the nature of the rights intended to be maintained and protected by the acts aforesaid. Inasmuch as neither the local customs, the local laws, nor the decisions of the California courts had ever recognized or upheld the doctrine that water rights, acquired by an appropriation or diversion below on private land, would be superior to the riparian rights pertaining to any land above the place of diversion, the conclusion is inevitable that section 9 of the act of 1866 neither creates such superior rights nor provides for the maintenance or protection of such rights.

[4] On the second phase of the questions the decisions in this state are to the effect that where the diversion is made on land then belonging to the United States the right of the appropriator to the water thereby taken is superior to the riparian rights of a subsequent purchaser of land from the United States lying above the point of diversion. South Yuba, etc., Co. v. Rosa, 80 Cal. 333, 22 Pac. 222; Healy v. Woodruff, 97 Cal. 464, 32 Pac. 528; Wood v. Etiwanda Water Co., 122 Cal. 153, 54 Pac. 726. The opinions in these cases decide the question but do not state fully the reasons for the conclusion. It is apparent, however, that they must be based on the hypothesis that the reservation provided for by section 17 of the act of 1870 in favor of accrued and vested rights runs to the appropriator of water upon land of the United States and creates in him a right superior to that of the riparian right of the United States pertaining to the land it then owns situated above the place of diversion, so that a subsequent purchaser of such upper lands takes subject to the lower appropriation. We need not go further into the reasons for these decisions, for we are of the opinion that the appropriations under which the plaintiffs claim were not made on land which was at the time thereof the property of the United States in the sense that it must be in order to come within the scope of the two acts of 1866 and 1870. To this question we now address ourselves.

[5] The important facts bearing upon the question last mentioned are as follows: The tracts of land on which the dams and headgates by which said respective appropriations were made are situated are of the character known as swamp and overflowed lands. Said tracts were acquired from the state of California by the respective predecessors in interest of the plaintiffs under applications to purchase the same as swamp and overflowed lands. These several applications were approved in the years 1861, 1864, and 1869, respectively, and patents therefor were issued by the state to the respective entrymen under said applications in the years 1869 and 1874. Said several tracts were listed and set off by the United States to the state of California as swamp and overflowed lands on November 21, 1895, and in pursuance thereof they were patented to the state with other swamp and overflowed land on June 10, 1896.

The theory of the plaintiff on this point is that the title to these swamp and overflowed lands remained in the United States, until they were patented to the state in 1896, that this title was absolute and unqualified, that therefore these appropriations were made on public land of the United States, and accordingly, that the appropriations of 1871 and 1872 were superior in right to all riparian rights pertaining to any land at that time belonging to the United States situated on the stream above said place of diversion.

The swamp and overflowed lands were granted to the state by the United States by the act of September 28, 1850 (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 4958–4960). By that act it was made the duty of the secretary of the interior "to make out an accurate list and plats" of all such lands situated within each state, and, at the request of the Governor thereof, to "cause a patent to be issued to the state therefor." The act declares that "on that patent, the fee simple to said lands shall vest" in such state. It has been decided many times, and upon careful and elaborate consideration, both by the United States Supreme Court and by this court, that this act operated as a present transfer at that date to each state of all lands within its borders coming within the description of "swamp and overflowed" lands, and that the title of the state thereto did not depend on the actual issuance of a patent to the state therefor by the United States. French v. Fyan, 93 U. S. 170, 23 L. Ed. 812; Wright v. Roseberry, 121 U. S. 488, 509, 7 Sup. Ct. 985, 30 L. Ed. 1039; Tubbs v. Wilhoit, 138 U. S. 137, 11 Sup. Ct. 279, 34 L. Ed. 887; Owens v. Jackson, 9 Cal. 322; Summers v. Dickinson, 9 Cal. 554; Kernan v. Griffith, 27 Cal. 89; Tubbs v. Wilhoit, 73 Cal. 63, 14 Pac. 361; Foss v. Johnstone, 158 Cal. 119, 130, 110 Pac. 294.

The decisions in Michigan, etc., Co. v. Rust, 168 U. S. 589, 18 Sup. Ct. 208, 42 L. Ed. 591; Brown v. Hitchcock, 173 U. S. 473, 19 Sup. Ct. 485, 43 L. Ed. 772; McCormick v. Hayes, 159 U. S. 338, 16 Sup. Ct. 37, 40 L. Ed. 171; Chapman v. St. Francis Levee Dist., 232 U. S. 186, 34 Sup. Ct. 297, 58 L. Ed. 564; U. S. v. Chicago, etc., Co., 218 U. S. 242, 31 Sup. Ct. 7, 54 L. Ed. 1015; and Sawyer v. Osterhaus (D. C.) 212 Fed. 765, do not overrule French v. Fyan and the other cases first cited, as the plaintiffs contend. On the contrary, it is stated in all of them that the act of 1850 operates as a present grant to the state of the swamp and overflowed lands within the particular state. They merely hold that while the act of 1850 grants the equitable title, it does not carry the legal title, that identification of the lands as swamp and overflowed lands in the manner specified in the act and the issuance of a patent therefor by the United States to the state is necessary to pass the legal title out of the United States. They further declare that prior to the final identification of the lands as swamp and overflowed lands by the final lists and plats of the Secretary of the Interior, it is within the power of that officer to revise his surveys, lists, and plats, and make corrections therein, under proper proceedings and notice to the particular state, or its successors in interest, and that the identification of the lands cannot be considered as finally settled until this is done and the patent issued in accordance therewith. They all recognize, however, that the beneficial title of the state, under the act, is full and complete, lacking only the identification of the land and the issuance of patent in pursuance thereof, to convert it into a legal title. They also affirm the proposition that the Land Department of the United States has no power arbitrarily to destroy the equitable title so granted to the state, although it has jurisdiction, "after proper notice to the party claiming such equitable title, and upon a hearing, to determine whether or not such title has passed."

[6] It clearly follows, therefore, that the full beneficial enjoyment of the land passed to the state by the act of 1850, and at that time subject to the contingencies incident to identification and to no others. It would also follow of necessity that when thereafter, as appears here, the land is identified, and a patent therefor issued by the United States, all questions concerning the title of the state or any person claiming under it cease to be of any consequence. The title so finally transferred relates back to the year 1850, and inures to the benefit of the state and its successors in interest for all purposes as if the legal title to the land finally identified had passed at the date of the act. The acts of 1866 and 1870 could not have been intended to operate for the benefit of appropriations made upon land in which the United States did not then have, and has never since acquired, any beneficial interest.

Our conclusion is that the appropriations of 1871 and 1872, by which the water rights of the plaintiff were acquired, are not, by the aforesaid acts of Congress of 1866 and 1870, made superior or paramount to the riparian rights pertaining to the public lands of the United States situated on the stream above the place of diversion, and afterwards purchased by the defendants from the United States.

[7, 8] The findings show that some 2,242 acres of land belonging to the defendants, and upon which they are using water from the river, were purchased by them, respectively, from the United States after the passage of the act of March 3, 1877, known as the Desert Land Act. It is contended by the plaintiffs that, with respect to the waters used by these defendants on said lands under claim that they had a right to do so as riparian owners, the rights of the plaintiffs under their said appropriations are made paramount to such riparian rights by the provisions of the said Desert Land Act. 19 U. S. Stats. 377.

The title of this act is, "An act to provide for the sale of desert lands in certain states and territories." It provides for the sale of desert lands in amounts not exceeding one section to any qualified person who declares on oath that he intends to reclaim such desert land by conducting water upon the same within three years thereafter. Then follows a proviso as follows:

> "Provided however that the right to the use of water by the person so conducting the same, on or to any tract of desert land of six hundred and forty acres shall depend upon bona fide prior appropriation; and such right shall not exceed the amount of water actually appropriated, and necessarily used for the purpose of irrigation and reclamation; and all surplus water over and above such actual appropriation and use, together with the water of all lakes, rivers and other sources of water supply upon the public lands and not navigable, shall remain and be held free for the appropriation and use of the public for irrigation, mining and manufacturing purposes subject to existing rights." Section 1 (U. S. Comp. St. § 4674).

Section 2 of the act (section 4675) provides:

> "That all lands exclusive of timber lands and mineral lands which will not, without irrigation, produce some agricultural crop, shall be deemed desert lands, within the meaning of this act."

Section 3 (section 4676) provides further that—

> "The determination of what may be considered desert land shall be subject to the decision and regulation of the commissioner of the General Land Office."

The theory of the plaintiffs is that this act operates as a separation of the riparian rights pertaining to all lands of the United States from the land itself and a dedication of the waters covered by such riparian rights to public use for irrigation, mining, and manufacturing purposes, and that in consequence of this dedication the riparian rights pertaining to the land acquired from the United States by the defendants after the passage of said act are subject and subordinate to the rights of the plaintiffs to take the water so appropriated by them, and devote the same to public use as they have been and are doing. In support of this proposition the plaintiffs rely on the decision of the Supreme Court of Orgeon in Hough v. Porter, 51 Or. 318, 95 Pac. 732, 98 Pac. 1083. The court in that case, in a very elaborate opinion, reached the conclusion that the last clause of section 1 above quoted applied to all lands of the United States, and was a dedication of the waters thereon to public use subject to existing rights. The Supreme Court of Washington, however, in Still v. Palouse, etc., Co., 64 Wash. 606, 117 Pac. 466, and in Bermot v. Morrison, 81 Wash. 538, 143 Pac. 111, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 290, reached precisely the opposite conclusion. In the first-mentioned Washington case the court said:

> "The act itself manifestly relates only to the reclamation of desert lands and confines the use of the water to the amount 'actually appropriated and necessarily used for the purpose of irrigation and reclamation'; such right to be determined by bona fide prior appropriation. As to such lands, Congress recognized and assented to the appropriation of water in contravention of the common-law right of the lower riparian owner to insist on the continuous flow of the stream," —and it proceeded to hold that, as none of the persons making this claim had settled upon or obtained the land as desert lands under the act of 1877, no rights under said act were attached to such lands. This decision was followed in the subsequent case. We think the conclusion of the Washington Supreme Court was correct. It is obvious from the framework and language of the act of 1877 that it was not intended to apply to all the public lands of the United States. Its main purpose was to provide for the sale of desert lands which could be reclaimed by bringing water thereon. It may be true that as to such lands the purpose was to divert the riparian rights in the waters existing thereon and devote the same to the public uses stated. We do not think that question is involved in the present case, and we need not express any opinion on it. There is nothing in the act which justifies giving that particular part thereof so wide an application as to embrace all lands of the United States, wherever situated. The plaintiffs do not claim that any of the land belonging to the defendants was purchased or acquired under the Desert Land Act, and there is no finding that in fact such lands were desert lands. The act itself commits the determination of the question what may be considered desert lands to the Commissioner of the General Land Office. It is not claimed that he has made any determination of the fact with respect to any tract of land in controversy in this action. It was for the plaintiffs to show this fact, if it were material to their case, and as they have not done so we must presume that no such determination was ever made. It follows from what we have said that the rights of the plaintiffs under their appropriations are not affected by the provisions of the Desert Land Act.

[9, 10] Another contention of the plaintiffs is that the defendants are estopped to assert that their title as riparian owners is paramount to the rights of the plaintiffs under their appropriations below. They claim the estoppel on the ground that the plaintiffs have been diverting the water by means of its canals and under its appropriation and devoting the same to public use for irrigation and other purposes for more than 40 years, and that the defendants did, during all of that period, permit the water of the stream to flow by their own lands without any use thereof and to pass on down to the plaintiffs' headgate, there to be taken out and appropriated to the public use, without protest, objection or notice of their respective claims. In support of this estoppel they invoke the rule set forth in the decisions of this court in cases where a railroad company or canal company serving a public use has taken the land of another for such railroad or canal and has operated the same without objection by the owner and without compensating him therefor. In these cases it is held that the owner of the property, after having permitted such public use to begin and continue until public rights have accrued therein, cannot enjoin the operation of the railroad or canal, and that his only remedy is an action for damages for the taking of his property for public use. Fresno, etc., Co. v. Southern Pacific, etc., Co., 135 Cal. 207, 67 Pac. 773; Southern California Co. v. Slauson, 138 Cal. 344, 71 Pac. 352, 94 Am. St. Rep. 58; Gurnsey v. Northern C. P. Co., 160 Cal. 709, 117 Pac. 906, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 185; Katz v. Walkinshaw, 141 Cal. 136, 70 Pac. 663, 74 Pac. 766, 64 L. R. A. 236, 99 Am. St. Rep. 35; Crescent Canal Co. v. Montgomery, 143 Cal. 248, 76 Pac. 1032, 65 L. R. A. 940; Newport v. Temescal Water Co., 149 Cal. 538, 87 Pac. 372, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1098; Barton v. Riverside Water Co., 155 Cal. 515, 101 Pac. 790, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 331.

The finding of the court is:

> "That the taking, appropriation and use of said water by plaintiffs was notorious, but was unknown to the said defendants, and the said defendants did not acquiesce in or assent thereto." (Italics ours.)

It is contended that this finding is contrary to the evidence. It devolved upon the plaintiffs, in support of their estoppel, if the fact was material to such estoppel, to prove that the defendants had knowledge not only of the existence of the canals and the diversion of the water thereby from the river, but also that the same was being devoted to public use. The only evidence on the subject consisted of a number of extracts from articles published in California newspapers in the years from 1871 to 1878, inclusive. The nearest newspaper to the location of the lands of the defendants was the Fresno Expositor, which published one article on the subject in 1873. The articles referred to the size of the canal, the extent of territory to be irrigated thereby, but did not definitely state whether the use to which the water was to be applied was a public or private use. No evidence is called to our attention showing actual knowledge on the part of any one of the defendants that the plaintiffs, or either of them, were engaged in supplying water for public uses, or that either of them had ever seen any of the publications introduced in evidence. The fact that the taking and use of the water was notorious, as found by the court, was not proof of knowledge by defendants, but was merely a circumstance from which, with other circumstances, the court might or might not have inferred such knowledge. Its finding shows that it did not infer knowledge. We do not think the finding was contrary to the evidence. In our consideration of the case, therefore, it must be assumed that none of the defendants had knowledge of the public use to which the water was devoted. We do not mean to say that such knowledge was material, however.

The question presented by the plaintiffs in regard to such estoppel has never been decided by this court. In Miller & Lux v. Enterprise, etc., Co., 169 Cal. 423 to 430, 147 Pac. 567, the court discussed the question at length, and set forth the various decisions on the subject and the reasons which support the doctrine which the plaintiffs invoked. After so doing, however, the court declined to decide the question. After extensive quotations from the decisions holding that injunction would not be granted in the cases stated, the court said:

> "It is to be observed that in all of the above cases the public use involved an interference with the property rights of a private owner, sufficient to give such owner an immediate right of action to abate or prevent the same. * * * This right in the owner to enjoin the public use before it had become established, appears to have constituted an important factor in the statement of the doctrine." Page 430.

This case, it may be observed, involved the same canal and the same appropriation that is involved in S. F. No. 3119, now under consideration.

[11, 12] From what we have already said it is clear that the upper riparian owners could not have maintained any action or proceeding to prevent the appropriation of the water from the stream by plaintiffs after it had passed below defendants' lands. It is difficult to see how they could be estopped by the taking of the water below and its dedication to a public use when they could by no means within their power prevent or restrain the same. In order to constitute an estoppel of this character the person sought to be estopped must have failed to do some act which it was within his power to do, and the person claiming the estoppel must have relied on such failure to such an extent and for such a period that the subsequent doing of such act would cause him injury. In the present case the act which it is now claimed the defendants should have done was not within their power. They could not have prevented the appropriations by the plaintiffs. We may add that since the courts had many times decided that a diversion below his land did not concern or injure the riparian owner above, and they had each presumably rested secure in this rule, which had become a rule of property, it would not be consonant with justice to say to such proprietor that he has lost those rights through no fault or failure of his own, but simply because he has not seen fit to use the waters upon his riparian land, and that to do so would be equivalent to this court erecting a statute of limitations against an upper riparian proprietor, and in the same breath decreeing that it had barred all his rights. For these reasons we are of the opinion that no estoppel is created against the defendants to now claim their riparian rights, although the same may cause injury to the plaintiffs' appropriation by consuming part of the water of the stream before it reaches the plaintiffs' place of diversion.

[13, 14] It appears that the court found that certain of the defendants had obtained by prescription a right to divert from the stream at points above the plaintiffs' places of diversion some $13^{75}/_{100}$ second feet of water, which they had applied to the irrigation of some 31 acres of nonriparian land and 759 acres of riparian land. They claim that this finding is not sustained by the evidence nor by the law. We know of no rule of law that would prevent a person who owned land riparian to the stream above the place of diversion of water therefrom by some other person, even by a public service corporation for public use, from taking water from the stream and acquiring title thereto by prescription as against such public use. A public service corporation is no more exempt from this deprivation than any other owner of a water right. Nor are we aware of any rule of law that any person, although not a riparian owner, may not acquire a prescriptive right as against a public use below by taking water out of the stream above which otherwise would run down to the canals of the public service corporation. It is not claimed that the evidence does not show that the taking and use of the water was adverse, under claim of right, and continuous for a period of five years before the action was begun. Such being the case, there is no merit in the claim that the finding is not sustained by the evidence. Furthermore, with respect to the use on the riparian lands, inasmuch as the owners had the right to use the same without asking leave of the plaintiffs, the finding that they acquired the right by prescription is immaterial. With respect to the finding as to defendants' rights by prescription, the plaintiffs complain that the pleadings did not aver such right, and that therefore such finding was improper. This objection affects only the right adjudged to defendant White & Friant Lumber Company to take about 1¼ second feet of water for irrigation on 31 acres of nonriparian land. The pleading was lacking in certainty as to the quantity claimed and taken. But there was no demurrer for uncertainty and no objection to any evidence on the subject. Under all these circumstances, the lack of sufficient averment should be deemed to have been waived at the trial.

As to the claim that the diversions above did not, so far as appears, diminish the stream flowing at their dams to such an extent as to deprive plaintiffs of the quantity of water they had appropriated, it is sufficient to refer to Horst v. Tarr M. Co., 174 Cal. 436, 163 Pac. 492, and to say that the complaints herein are based on the allegation and theory that the diversions by defendants did deprive plaintiffs of water to which they were entitled.

No other points worthy of mention are presented in support of these appeals.

In each of the cases mentioned herein the judgment is affirmed.

NILES SAND, GRAVEL & ROCK CO. v. MUIR et al. (Civ. 4027.)

1. Interest ⚷19(2)—Recoverable on price of goods sold by written contract.

Where the amount recovered was, as held on a former appeal, due on a written contract to pay a definite price per ton for materials furnished defendants by plaintiff, the amount due, being ascertainable by arithmetical calculation, was an amount capable of being made certain within Civ. Code, § 3287, and interest was properly allowed thereon.

2. Interest ⚷39(3)—Calculated to date of original judgment when merely modified on appeal.

As respects the date from which interest should be calculated, when the judgment of the trial court is merely modified and not reversed on appeal, the modification stands as of the date of the original judgment, and interest was properly calculated from that date.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by the Niles Sand, Gravel & Rock Company against Robert B. Muir and another, doing business as R. C. Storrie & Co. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

R. H. Countryman, of San Francisco, for appellants.

John L. McNab and Byron Coleman, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. In this action Division 1 of this court rendered its judgment on December 27, 1920 (195 Pac. 699), upon a former appeal, directing that the judgment theretofore rendered against defendants by the superior court for the sum of $15,195.31 be modified by reducing the amount thereof by the sum of $1,442.80, leaving a balance due said plaintiff of $13,752.51, and as to said last-named sum the judgment in favor of the plaintiff was affirmed. In modifying the judgment in accordance with the opinion of the District Court of Appeal, Division 1, the trial court allowed interest on $13,752.51 from the date of the delivery of the merchandise to the defendants to the date of the entry of the original judgment. The sole question presented upon this appeal is as to the propriety of the allowance of interest.

[1] The action was brought by plaintiff for the amount due to it for certain goods, wares, and merchandise furnished to defendants consisting of concrete, gravel, crushed gravel and sand for use in the construction of Twin Peaks tunnel in San Francisco. It was found by the trial court that the material was furnished under a written contract between the parties. It was also found that the defendants had agreed to pay 75 cents per ton for the material furnished by plaintiff, and that 135,564.26 tons of same had been delivered by plaintiff to the defendants, and that $87,920.68 had been paid by defendant's upon account, all as alleged in plaintiff's complaint. As a matter of arithmetical calculation, this would leave a balance due plaintiff of $13,752.51. By mistake the judgment of the trial court was originally entered for $15,195.31, and upon appeal, Division 1 of this court pointed out the discrepancy, and reduced the judgment to accord with the findings made by the trial court. The modified judgment, from which the present appeal is taken, stands as a judgment upon a written contract; it having been found by the trial court that there were no offsets or counterclaims in favor of the defendants.

The original judgment, before the modification, allowed interest on $15,195.31 at the rate of 7 per cent. from July 21, 1917, the date of the delivery of the materials, to October 15, 1919, the date of the judgment. This allowance of interest was proper under the rule of section 3287, Civil Code, and an examination of the opinion filed herein upon the former appeal clearly shows that there was no intention to modify the judgment with respect to the allowance of interest; on the contrary, the modification was confined to a change in the principal amount due. In modifying the judgment, the trial court, following the rule of section 3287, Civil Code, allowed interest upon the reduced amount of $13,752.51 for the above-stated period of time from the date of the delivery of the materials, to October 15, 1919, the date of the entry of the original judgment. Since the court had found that the amount due was due upon a written contract to pay a definite price per ton for the materials furnished, the amount due by the defendant was ascertainable by arithmetical calculation, and was an amount "capable of being made certain" upon which interest was allowable. Keyes v. Nims, 184 Pac. 695.

[2] The further question discussed by appellant as to the propriety of the court's action in taking October 15, 1919 (the date of the entry of the original judgment), as the date of judgment in making its interest calculations rather than the later date when the modification of the judgment was actually made, is without merit. That question was considered in the case of Barnhart v. Edwards, 128 Cal. 572, 61 Pac. 176. It is clear that when the judgment of a trial court is merely modified upon appeal and not reversed, the modification thereof stands as of the date of the original judgment.

There are no other matters which require discussion. The judgment is affirmed.

BECK v. SWANK et al. (Civ. 3754.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Dec. 6, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 2, 1922.)

1. Vendor and purchaser 🔑8—Vendor's lack of title held not to justify rescission.

That title was not vested in a vendor at the date of making a contract of sale on monthly payments, did not entitle the purchasers to rescind and recover the money paid by them where they were not induced to purchase by reason of any representation of the vendor that he had title.

2. Vendor and purchaser 🔑186—Execution of mortgage by vendor does not excuse default in payment.

The execution by a vendor of a mortgage on the property he had contracted to sell did not excuse defaults in the payment of installments on the contract, where the mortgage was for less than the unpaid installments, and it did not appear that the vendor could not have satisfied the mortgage and conveyed a clear title whenever the purchasers were ready to pay the full consideration.

3. Vendor and purchaser 🔑95(2), 101—Acceptance of past-due installments did not prevent restoration of right of forfeiture by notice.

The acceptance by a vendor of a past-due installment on a contract of sale was a waiver as of that date only so far as installments due were concerned, and was at most a temporary suspension of the right of forfeiture which could be restored at any time by definite notice of an intention to demand prompt payments.

4. Vendor and purchaser 🔑335—Sale to third person after long default does not authorize recovery of payments.

Where a purchaser had paid nothing on a contract of sale providing for monthly payments for about a year and a half, and until the vendor had satisfied a mortgage and sold the property to another purchaser, the purchaser was not entitled to recover the moneys paid, even though the subsequent purchaser was an innocent purchaser, as the long continuance of default entitled the vendor to remain inactive and retain for his own use the moneys paid.

5. Vendor and purchaser 🔑343(4)—Purchaser suing for breach in conveying to another purchaser must show such purchaser was an innocent one.

One suing for breach of a contract for the purchase of real estate on the theory that the vendor by conveying the land to an innocent purchaser had put it out of his power to convey, and that such conduct was a fraud on plaintiff, could not recover where it was not shown that the subsequent purchaser was an innocent purchaser, who bought without knowledge of plaintiff's contract, and did not take title subject thereto.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action by S. Beck against J. A. Swank and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. W. Hocker and Robert E. Austin, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Minor Moore, Ward Chapman, and L. M. Chapman, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. Action to recover moneys paid on account of contract for the purchase of real property. Judgment was entered in favor of the defendants. The plaintiff appeals therefrom.

On February 7, 1911, the defendant Swank, as vendor, entered into a contract with John C. Wood and George H. Schroeder, as vendees, for the sale and conveyance of the lot described in the complaint. The purchasers agreed to pay the sum of $2,500 in numerous monthly installments, with interest. At the date of the contract title was vested in one Vassar. On June 17, 1911, Vassar executed to Scott a mortgage on the lot for the principal sum of $1,000. On October 2, 1913, the contract, without any certificate of acknowledgment thereon except an acknowledgment by the purchaser Wood, dated October 2, 1913, was recorded in the records of deeds of Los Angeles county. On October 21, 1911, Vassar conveyed the lot to Swank & Letton, a corporation. On June 16, 1914, that corporation conveyed the lot to defendant Gibson, subject to the mortgage. Gibson admits that at the time of receiving that deed he knew of the outstanding contract. On January 8, 1918, Wood and Schroeder assigned their contract to Maude Mason, who on March 15th following assigned the contract to Ida Miller. On April 20, 1918, Miller executed a quitclaim deed and an assignment of the contract to the plaintiff Beck. On June 10, 1918, Scott commenced an action to foreclose the mortgage. The decree of foreclosure having been entered, a foreclosure sale took place on October 1, 1918. In September, 1919, Gibson redeemed from the foreclosure sale.

The last payment made on account of the contract was made by Miller to Gibson on March 28, 1918, and at the time of assignment of the contract to the plaintiff there was a balance of more than $1,600 remaining to be paid under the contract. The court found that no part of said balance has ever been paid or tendered by the plaintiff or any one to the defendants, or either of them, nor has the making of said payments or the tender of said payments, or any of them, been excused or waived by the defendants, or either of them; that after making said redemption Gibson sold the property to a third party, but at the time of making such sale the plaintiff had been and was in default for more than 15 months, and the defendant was led to believe, and did believe, that the vendees of the contract had abandoned any claim or rights thereunder, and that, in fact, all right of the plaintiff under the contract, by reason of said default, was terminated.

[1, 2] The fact that the title was not vested in Swank at the date of making the contract with Wood and Schroeder did not entitle the purchasers to rescind the contract and recover the money paid by them. Neither did the execution of the mortgage excuse defaults in the payment of installments on the contract. The vendees never claimed that they were induced to purchase by reason of any representation made by Swank that he had title to the lot. They made payments to Gibson after the title was vested in him. The mortgage was for a sum less than the unpaid installments on the contract. There is no evidence that Gibson could not have satisfied the mortgage and conveyed a clear title whenever the vendors were ready to pay the full consideration and demand their deed.

[3] Appellant contends that he was not in default. This contention is based upon the claim that the provision of the contract making time of the essence thereof was waived by the acceptance by Gibson of overdue payments. This refers to the fact that on March 28, 1918, when the last payment was made to Gibson (and this payment was made by Miller), that payment covered the installments due February 1, and March 1, 1918. Such acceptance of a past-due installment was a waiver as of that date, only so far as installments then due are concerned. At most it was only a temporary suspension of the right of forfeiture, which could be restored at any time by definite notice of an intention to demand prompt payments. Boone v. Templeman, 158 Cal. 290, 110 Pac. 947, 139 Am. St. Rep. 126; Stevinson v. Joy, 164 Cal. 279, 285, 128 Pac. 751, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 961.

The complaint alleged that on March 28, 1918, Gibson informed Miller that there was a mortgage on said property for $1,000, and that said property was subject to said mortgage at the time Gibson purchased the property, and stated to the said Ida Miller that "all the money you put in this property will be thrown away," and afterwards, on the 9th day of April, 1918, confirmed said statement in writing; that, acting upon such information and the circumstances aforesaid, the said Ida Miller made no other or further payments on said property, and afterwards assigned said contract and conveyed her interest in said property to the plaintiff herein. In its findings the court stated that on said date, and at other times both before and afterwards, Gibson informed Ida Miller that there was a mortgage on the property for $1,000, and that in his opinion her rights as assignee of the vendees to said contract were subject to said mortgage; that the same was overdue, and that the mortgagee demanded payment and threatened foreclosure unless the same was paid; and informed said Ida Miller that in his opinion the property was not worth the amount of the balance which she would have to pay under the terms of said contract in order to get the deed to said property, and that in his opinion all moneys that she paid upon the property would be thrown away; but at that time, and both prior thereto and subsequent to that date, he did by letter inform said Ida Miller, and likewise her successor, the plaintiff, that he did then, and at all times would, insist upon the prompt payment of all installments as they became due under the contract, and that unless such installments were paid when they became due, the rights of the vendees under said contract would terminate, but that the defendants in this action never did, by any act or declaration, induce the plaintiff, or any of his predecessors, not to make payments under the contract, and did not waive the obligation for the payment of any of said installments, or interfere with the making of such payments. Nevertheless no payment was made after March 28, 1918, and no tender of any payment thereon has ever been made.

[4, 5] The fact seems to be that the plaintiff, knowing that the contract was in default on the part of Ida Miller, purchased the contract on April 20, 1918, for a comparatively trifling consideration, and then remained quiescent for about a year and a half until the owner had satisfied the mortgage debt and sold the property to another purchaser. He now claims, in addition to the alleged waiver of default, that, without tendering performance of the contract, he is entitled to recover the moneys paid by his assignor and her predecessors, upon the further ground that, by conveying the land to a third party, Gibson has put it out of his power to convey as required by the contract, and that he (the plaintiff), standing in the shoes of the vendees, may treat the contract as rescinded. Reliance is placed upon the decision in Brimmer v. Salisbury, 167 Cal. 522, 527, 140 Pac. 30, to the effect that, where the vendor under an executory contract of sale, who has title to the property, conveys to a third party, who is an innocent purchaser, and who takes it freed from the obligations of the contract, the conduct of the vendor is a fraud upon the vendee. But the benefit of the rule thus stated, if applicable at all, should be denied to the plaintiff in this case, because the long continuance of default on the part of the plaintiff and his assignor, under the circumstances stated, entitled the owner, Gibson, to "remain inactive, yet retain to his own use the moneys paid by the vendee" (Glock v. Howard, 123 Cal. 1, at page 10, 55 Pac. 713, at page 716 [43 L. R. A. 199, 69 Am. St. Rep. 17]), and also because it has not been shown by the record herein that the party to whom Gibson sold the lot was an innocent purchaser who bought without knowledge of this contract or without taking the title, subject to such right as might be vested in the plaintiff to have the property conveyed to him on payment of the agreed consideration.

The judgment is affirmed.

PALMER v. LOS ANGELES, O. P. & S. M. RY. CO. et al. (Civ. 4050.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2. California. Dec. 5, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 2, 1922.)

1. Railroads ⟹72(7)—Promises by grantee held not to state condition or forfeiture.

Promises of grantee of strip of land to construct an electric railroad and operate cars held not to state a condition subsequent or a forfeiture which would entitle the grantor to a forfeiture if the line was not constructed.

2. Railroads ⟹62—Land conveyed for construction railroad for "railroad purpose" within Code.

Conveyance of land on which to construct a construction railroad was for a railroad purpose under Civ. Code, §§ 360, 465.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Railroad Purposes.]

3. Corporations ⟹387(2)—Only state can complain that corporation purchased lands for unauthorized purposes.

That a grantee corporation has purchased lands for purposes not authorized by its charter is a question that may be examined into by the state, but the grantor may not complain.

4. Limitation of actions ⟹50(1)—Agreement of grantee to construct railroad not enforceable after 4 years on theory of continuing contract.

Contract by grantee railroad corporation to construct a railroad over strip conveyed cannot be specifically enforced in an action brought 17 years after the conveyance, on the theory of a continuing contract.

5. Limitation of actions ⟹24(1)—Action for specific performance of contract to construct railroad barred in 4 years.

An action by grantor of strip of land to railroad for specific performance of contract of railroad to construct a line on the strip, and to operate trains thereon, was, under Code Civ. Proc. § 337, subd. 1, barred in 4 years after the date when performance was due.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Action by Wilton H. Palmer against the Los Angeles, Ocean Park & Santa Monica Railway Company and others. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Waldo M. York and Harry M. Irwin, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Frank Karr, R. C. Gortner, and W. R. Millar, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendants; the defendants appeared and interposed demurrers; the demurrers were sustained; the plaintiff elected not to amend; and judgment was thereafter entered in favor of the defendants for their costs. From that judgment the plaintiff has appealed.

The complaint alleged the incorporation of the corporations; that on the 27th day of March, 1903, the plaintiff was the owner of a tract of land near Santa Monica in the county of Los Angeles, and that the tract was bounded on the south by the Compton and Santa Monica road; that the defendant Los Angeles, Ocean Park & Santa Monica Railway Company was incorporated to build and operate a railroad from Los Angeles to Santa Monica; that on the 27th day of March, 1903, the said company offered plaintiff that if plaintiff would convey to it a right of way for a railroad across plaintiff's land 50 feet wide and adjoining the Compton road, the company would construct an electric railroad between the two places named, and would operate cars upon said railroad for the transportation of passengers so that plaintiff could make his home upon said land and maintain an office in Los Angeles, and that it would permit plaintiff to maintain three passageways from the lands of plaintiff to the Compton road, and also made other promises, and in addition thereto offered to pay plaintiff $1,500; that thereupon plaintiff made and executed to the defendant for a consideration recited as $10, a deed, which in form is an ordinary grant, bargain and sale deed describing a tract "running northeasterly and parallel to the said Compton and Santa Monica road about 2,700 feet to a point distant at right angles 25 feet northerly from the point of intersection of the northerly line of said Compton and Santa Monica road with the southerly line of the road commonly known as Zanja street, which said line is in the center line of the strip of land 50 feet in width located as the right of way of the above named second party"; that plaintiff would not have executed said deed except for said promises; that the company has not constructed said road; that no railroad except a construction railroad has been built on the tract described; that plaintiff has been damaged "by said failure of said defendant to perform its said contract and by his being excluded from said land so claimed as a right of way in the sum of more than $2,000"; that the other defendants claim an interest in said strip, but that their rights are subject to and subsequent to the rights of the plaintiff and were acquired with full notice and knowledge of plaintiff's rights. The prayer of the complaint was that the company be directed by the court to construct and equip and operate the said railroad and fix a time for such performance, and that if the company fail to comply within the time so fixed by the court, that then the interest of the defendant company be declared forfeited and plaintiff's title be quieted and for general relief. The demurrers included nearly all of the statutory grounds, and also pleaded that the plaintiff's cause of action, if any, was barred by plaintiff's laches and the statute of limitations. Code Civ. Proc. § 337, subd. 1, section 338, subds. 1, 2, 4, section 340, subd. 1, sections 343, 318, 319, and 322.

[1-3] In the first place the plaintiff asserts that the deed dated March 27, 1903, is a grant of a right of way. In the second place the plaintiff contends that the deed is, in legal effect, a conditional deed—contains certain conditions subsequent. However, there is not a word in the deed showing or even hinting at a condition subsequent. Nor does the instrument contain any passage that can be said to be ambiguous. The deed must be measured according to its terms. The promises made by the grantee were merely the personal covenants of the grantee. It is not alleged whether the promises were made orally or in writing. We will assume they were made in writing, and as authentic as the deed itself. Certainly those promises are of no greater force than parts actually incorporated into the deed. But the language of those promises, as alleged by the pleader, does not even purport to state a condition or a forfeiture; and, if it did, such language would be strictly construed as against a forfeiture. Behlow v. Southern Pac. R. R. Co., 130 Cal. 16, 62 Pac. 295; Reclamation District v. Van Loben Sels, 145 Cal. 181, 184, 78 Pac. 638; Shaw v. Caldwell, 16 Cal. App. 1, 6–9, 115 Pac. 941. We may not hold that the deed, on its face, or as aided by the allegations of the complaint, was a deed containing conditions subsequent. Furthermore, we must hold that the deed conveyed the fee. Hannah v. Southern Pac. R. R. Co., 192 Pac. 304. But, the plaintiff says, under the provisions of sections 360, 465, Civil Code, the grantee had no power to purchase land except for railroad purposes. To this contention there are two answers. The plaintiff alleged that the grantee thereafter constructed, and now has on the land, a construction railroad—this is a railroad purpose. The other answer is that if the grantee has purchased land for purposes not authorized by its charter the question may be examined into by the state, but the grantor may not complain. Union Water Co. v. Murphy's Flat Fluming Co., 22 Cal. 620, 630; Savings Bank of San Diego v. Barrett, 126 Cal. 413, 417, 58 Pac. 914; Ingle Mfg. Co. v. Scales, 36 Cal. App. 410, 412, 172 Pac. 169.

[4, 5] The plaintiff claims that the promises made by the railroad company became a part of the deed. We do not understand the appellant to controvert that proposition. But the claim does not assist the plaintiff. It leads us to the position of holding that the plaintiff, at the time he filed his complaint, May 18, 1920, was attempting to enforce a contract made March 27, 1903. As an action for damages for a breach of contract, the action was barred in 4 years. Code Civ. Proc., § 337, subd. 1; Ahlers v. Smiley, 163 Cal. 200, 204, 124 Pac. 827. As an action for specific performance of the alleged contract, the action was barred in 4 years after the date when performance was due. Archer v. Harvey, 164 Cal. 274, 128 Pac. 410. To meet this point the plaintiff claims that the duty the grantee owed him was in the nature of a continuing contract. 1 Wood on Limitations, p. 659. That authority, does not support the plaintiff's contention. The rule stated in the text is but another form of stating that the statute of limitations does not run against a public nuisance, because each day a new cause of action arises. In this case this plaintiff claims that the grantee promised in 1903 to construct a railroad, and that it has not done so. That such contracts will not be enforced, we need do no more than cite Texas, etc., Ry. Co. v. Marshall, 136 U. S. 393, 10 Sup. Ct. 846, 34 L. Ed 385, and the cases cited in 15 Rose's Notes, p. 191. As an action in specific performance, the complaint did not state sufficient facts.

The plaintiff cites and relies on City of Tyler v. St. Louis Southwestern Ry. Co. of Texas, 99 Tex. 491, 91 S. W. 1, 13 Ann. Cas. 911; Aikin v. Albany, etc., R. R. Co., 26 Barb. (N. Y.) 289; Gray v. Burlington, etc., R. R. Co., 37 Iowa, 119; Hubbard v. Kansas City, etc., R. R. Co., 63 Mo. 68; and Elliott on Railroads, vol. 2, p. 441, § 942.

Each of those authorities is to the effect that, when the action is brought at a proper time, a railroad company may be compelled, in certain instances, to specifically perform its real estate contracts. We have not held to the contrary except as to the facts before us in this particular case.

The judgment is affirmed.

HARLAN v. ALDERSON et al., State Board of Medical Examiners. (Civ. 3921.)

Physicians and surgeons ⚷11(2)—License of osteopath revoked where he wrote prescriptions and performed surgical operations.

License of one granted a reciprocity certificate from another state to practice osteopathy, who wrote prescriptions and performed minor and major surgery and engaged in the practice of medicine and surgery, was properly revoked on a verified complaint charging him with a violation of St. 1913, c. 354, § 14, subd. 9, as amended by St. 1915, p. 196, St. 1917, p. 109, and St. 1919, p. 1296.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George E. Crothers, Judge.

Action by William F. Harlan against Harry E. Alderson and others, members of the Board of Medical Examiners of the State of California. From judgment annulling an order of the Board revoking plaintiff's license to practice as a doctor of osteopathy, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Harry A. Encell, of San Francisco, and Frank M. Smith, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Frank M. Carr, of Oakland, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal from a judgment annulling on certiorari a certain order of the board of medical examiners revoking respondent's license to practice as a doctor of osteopathy in the state of California.

In the month of May, 1916, the respondent, William F. Harlan, was granted a reciprocity certificate from another state to practice osteopathy in the state of California by the board of medical examiners of the state of California. Thereafter, early in the year 1920, proceedings were initiated before the state board of medical examiners by a verified complaint against the respondent, charging him with a violation of the ninth subdivision of section 14, c. 354, Statutes of 1913, as amended by the Statutes of 1915 (page 196), 1917 (page 109) and 1919 (page 1296), of the state of California. That complaint alleges that William F. Harlan was on or about the 4th day of May, 1916, licensed by the state board of medical examiners "as a drugless practitioner." With the complaint he was served with a citation directing him to appear at a certain time and place to show cause why the license and certificate theretofore issued to him to "practice as a drugless practitioner in the state of California" should not be revoked. In due time, by a verified answer, William F. Harlan denied the charges contained in the complaint and denied that he was licensed as a drugless practitioner, but, on the contrary, alleged that he was licensed by said board of medical examiners to practice osteopathy in the state of California.

The uncontradicted evidence introduced at the hearing showed that the respondent wrote prescriptions and performed both minor and major surgery and engaged in the unlicensed practice of medicine and surgery.

The question presented here is whether or not the case falls within the provisions of subdivision 9 of section 14 of the act of 1913, which provides what shall constitute misconduct which shall warrant the board of medical examiners in revoking a license granted under the provisions of this act, and which reads as follows:

> "Ninth. The use, by the holder of a 'drugless practitioner certificate,' of drugs or what are known as medicinal preparations, in or upon any human being, or the severing or penetrating by the holder of said 'drugless practitioner certificate' of the tissues of any human being in the treatment of any disease, injury, deformity, or other physical or mental condition of such human being, excepting the severing of the umbilical cord."

We think it does so fall. Prior to 1901 licenses to practice medicine were issued to members of the medical profession by separate boards of examiners representing the schools of medicine then recognized in this state. In 1901 (chapter 51, Stats. 1901) a combined board of examiners consisting of five members from the Medical Society of the State of California, two members from the California State Homeopathic Medical Society, and two members from the Eclectic Medical Society of the State of California was provided for and empowered to issue certificates to practice medicine and surgery. Chapter 99, Statutes of 1901, enacted by the same Legislature as the chapter just referred to, provided for a board of examiners from the Osteopathic Association of the State of California, which was empowered to license persons to practice osteopathy in this state. Under the provisions of chapter 212, Statutes of 1907, the osteopathic board was abolished, and two osteopaths were added to the board of medical examiners, which was then empowered to issue licenses to (1) physicians and surgeons, (2) osteopaths, and (3) persons to "practice any other system or mode of treating the sick or afflicted not referred to in this section."

The act of 1913 (chapter 354, Statutes of 1913), which with some subsequent amendments, is the act now in force and under which the respondent's license was granted and subsequently revoked, continues the combined board provided for in the act of 1907, but provides for only two classes of certificate:

"First, a certificate authorizing the holder thereof to use drugs or what are known as medical preparations in or upon human beings and to sever or penetrate the tissues of human beings and to use any and all other methods in the treatment of diseases, injuries, deformities, or other physical or mental conditions, which certificate shall be designated 'physician and surgeon certificate'; second, a certificate authorizing the holder thereof to treat diseases, injuries, deformities, or other physical or mental conditions without the use of drugs or what are known as medicinal preparations and without in any manner severing or penetrating any of the tissues of human beings except the severing of the umbilical cord, which certificate shall be designated 'drugless practitioner certificate.'"

It also provides for the issuance of "reciprocity certificates," which provision was in 1915 (Stats. 1915, c. 105, § 11) amended (section 13) to read (in part):

"The applicant shall produce a certificate entitling him to practice a system or mode of treating the sick or afflicted, as provided in this act or any preceding practice act of the state of California. * * *"

The reciprocity certificate to practice osteopathy issued to the respondent was issued on the basis of a license secured by him in the state of Missouri in May, 1904, which must have been based upon qualifications equal to those required by our act of 1901 (chap. 99, supra). Manifestly such certificate could confer no greater power or privilege than was granted to an osteopath by the last-mentioned act, section 9 of which provides (Stats. 1901, p. 115):

"The system, method, and science of treating diseases of the human body, commonly known as osteopathy, is hereby declared not to be the practice of medicine or surgery, within the meaning of an act entitled 'An act to regulate the practice of medicine in the state of California,' approved April third, eighteen hundred and seventy-six, or any of the acts amendatory thereof."

The well-settled definitions of osteopathy, both in the decisions and in dictionaries, uniformly hold that the system of osteopathy "uses no drugs." "It administers no drugs; it uses no knife." Nelson v. State Board of Health, 108 Ky. 769, at page 777, 57 S. W. 501, at page 504 (50 L. R. A. 383). "A method of treating diseases of the human body without the use of drugs. * * *" Parks v. State, 159 Ind. 211, at page 229, 64 N. E. 862, at page 869 (59 L. R. A. 190). "As a remedy a form of manipulation is used." Century Dictionary. From the foregoing and from the very comprehensive history of the practice of osteopathy written by Mr. Justice Wilbur of our own Supreme Court in Re Rust, 181 Cal. 73, 183 Pac. 548, it appears that under the present classification there can be no doubt that one holding an osteopath's license issued prior to the act of 1913, or subsequent thereto on the basis of a previously secured license from another state, would, if originally licensed in this state since the act of 1913, be licensed as a "drugless practitioner." As section 21 of the act of 1913 provides:

"Nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit the practice by any person holding an unrevoked certificate heretofore issued under or validated by any medical practice act of this state, but all such certificates may be revoked * * * in the same manner and upon the same grounds as if they had been issued under this act." (Italics are ours.)

It is manifest that the proceedings for the revocation of a reciprocity certificate must be had under the provisions of the section under which such certificate would have been issued if originally issued under the provisions of this act.

We think, therefore, that the proceedings were properly brought under subsection 9, and that the decision of the board of medical examiners should not have been annulled.

The judgment of the superior court is reversed.

We concur: WASTE, P. J.; RICHARDS, J.

DEAN et al. v. POWELL UNDERTAKING CO. (Civ. 3890.)

Nuisance ⚷3(7)—Undertaking parlors constituting a nuisance.

Maintenance in a residence district of undertaking parlors from which would escape foul and noxious odors, or which would endanger health from infectious and communicable diseases, can be enjoined as a nuisance under Civ. Code, § 3479, but such parlors cannot be enjoined on findings that they will greatly disturb plaintiffs in the comfortable and quiet enjoyment and free use of their premises, and that plaintiffs will be annoyed and mentally and physically depressed and their health injured thereby and their properties depreciated in value.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; D. A. Cashin, Judge.

Action by Martha Dean and others against the Powell Undertaking Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Everts, Ewing & Wild and T. M. Stuart, all of Fresno, for appellant.

Frank Kauke and G. L. Aynesworth, both of Fresno, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J. This is an action to abate an anticipated nuisance. The plaintiffs had judgment in the trial court, and the defendant has appealed under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

Plaintiffs and defendant own lands in the same general neighborhood in the city of Fresno. Plaintiffs and others use their lands for residential purposes; but there are in the neighborhood some business establishments. As the trial court found the district to be a residential district or neighborhood, we will consider the case in accordance with the finding of the trial court. The plaintiffs' lands are on Coast avenue, and 70 feet removed from the property owned by the defendant, which is also on Coast avenue. In their complaint the plaintiffs alleged:

> "That defendant threatens and intends to and will, unless restrained by an order of this court, erect and construct on its said property and within 70 feet of the residence of plaintiffs Martha Dean and Nellie Dean, and within 120 feet of the residence of plaintiff Ruth E. Gall, an undertaking establishment and funeral parlor at which dead human bodies will be received and kept for burial and will be embalmed and prepared for burial and where autopsies will be held and funeral ceremonies and funeral rites will be performed and at which large numbers of people will constantly come and go and assemble for such purposes and for the purpose of seeing such dead bodies and attending such autopsies and funeral ceremonies; that, if the said building is so constructed and used, plaintiffs and their respective families will be greatly and seriously disturbed in the comfortable, peaceable, and quiet enjoyment of their homes and premises by reason of the constant knowledge and depressing influence of the presence and close proximity of said undertaking establishment, and of said dead bodies and said funeral ceremonies, and the constant coming and going of persons visiting said funeral parlor for the purpose of seeing the dead and of attending funeral ceremonies thereat and being present at autopsies, and of the funeral processions and gathering of vehicles for the same; that by reason thereof plaintiffs and their families would be so greatly disturbed and depressed in mind and in spirits as to destroy their comfort and peace of mind and to seriously affect plaintiffs' health and the health of their respective families, and to destroy the value of their said property as a residence and make it impossible for them to continue to occupy the same, all of which damage will be suffered by plaintiffs, in addition to the damage suffered by other residents of the neighborhood, and the public in general; that the value of the property of plaintiffs and other property in the neighborhood will be greatly impaired and depreciated."

The briefs of counsel proceed as though the first part of paragraph 6 of the findings were worded as follows:

> "That if defendant's said premises be used for (1) embalming, storing, and keeping for burial the dead bodies of human beings, as a place for the holding of autopsies and inquests, and as a morgue, such use will greatly and seriously disturb plaintiffs and the families of each of them in the comfortable, peaceable, and quiet enjoyment and free use of their premises herein described, and said plaintiffs and each of them and their families will be annoyed and mentally and physically depressed and injured thereby; that the health and peace of mind of said plaintiffs and each of them and their families will, by reason of said use, be affected and injured and the value of their said premises for residence purposes will be depreciated and the comfortable enjoyment thereof interfered with; that all of said injuries to plaintiffs and their said premises will cause damage to them in addition to the injury and damage suffered by other residents of the neighborhood and the public in general."

Except as herein stated, there was no pleading, no evidence, and no finding of any injury or anticipated injury to the plaintiffs by any intended use, or manner of use, to which the defendant may hereafter put its property.

Counsel on both sides have copiously, industriously, and with great learning briefed and argued the case. The appellant contends that it should not have been enjoined from conducting upon its own property a business in all respects lawful and in all respects operated with the highest degree of care and under the latest approved methods, solely and entirely because a few people living in the neighborhood believe that such business so conducted will hereafter cause them mental depression. In reply to this contention the respondents have stated they are entitled to the relief awarded and that their position is supported by authorities. They cite cases that arose in those jurisdictions where a statute or ordinance had been passed limiting the locations in which an undertaking establishment might be located. City of St. Paul v. Kessler, 146 Minn. 124, 178 N. W. 171; Meagher v. Kessler, 147 Minn. 182, 179 N. W. 732; and Brown v. City of Los Angeles, 183 Cal. 783, 192 Pac. 716. As Fresno has not adopted an ordinance on that subject, the cases are not helpful. The respondents cite other cases which involved an issue and a finding by the trial court to the effect that from the building in question there escaped, or would escape, foul and noxious odors, or, as in some instances, that by reason of the operation of the particular building there was great danger to health from infectious and communicable diseases from the bodies of persons taken to the premises in question. Rowland v. Miller, 139 N. Y. 93, 34 N. E. 765, 22 L. R. A. 182; Densmore v. Evergreen Camp, 61 Wash. 230, 112 Pac. 255, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 608, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1206; Barnes v. Hathorn, 54 Me. 124; Saier v. Joy, 198 Mich. 295, 164 N. W. 507, L. R. A. 1918A, 825; Goodrich v. Starrett, 108 Wash. 437, 184 Pac. 220; Osborn v. Shreveport, 143 La. 932, 79 South. 542, 3 A. L. R. 955; Everett v. Paschall, 61 Wash. 47, 111 Pac. 879, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 827, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1128; Stotler v. Rochelle, 83 Kan. 86, 109 Pac. 788, 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 49. The doctrine announced in those cases is statutory in his state. Section 3479, Civ. Code. But the plaintiffs have not made any showing to the effect that the defendant's building will be so constructed and operated that there will escape from the building any noxious odors or that any disease will be allowed to spread therefrom. That we have not misunderstood the doctrine stated in Everett v. Paschall, supra, and Stotler v. Rochelle, supra, is made clear by an examination of Rea v. Tacoma Mausoleum Association, 103 Wash. 429, 174 Pac. 961, 1 A. L. R. 541. In that case the Supreme Court of Washington was called upon to interpret both of those cases, and (174 Pac. at page 962) it used this language:

> "No decision has been called to our attention wherein any court has awarded injunctive relief, rested upon the sole ground of the mere presence of a cemetery or other place of sepulture, unattended by injurious or offensive drainage or fumes, sensible to the complaining party, and our own search leads us to believe that no such decisions have been rendered."

Beisel v. Crosby, 104 Neb. 643, 178 N. W. 272, is the one case which the respondents cite that comes most nearly sustaining their contentions. In that case the Supreme Court of Nebraska was considering a set of facts that was altogether peculiar. The properties involved were located on a tract known as Kountze place. Commencing on page 645 of 104 Neb., on page 272 of 178 N. W., the court says:

> "Originally Kountze place was a quarter section of land platted as an addition to Omaha. The deeds for the lots limited the grant to residential purposes for 25 years. With this common purpose Kountze place became an exclusive, compact, residential district, where there are paved streets, ornamental grounds, well-kept lawns, private driveways, and beautiful homes. In the pursuit of health, recreation, and happiness, families resorted to open porches and children played on lawns. In the midst of these homes and grounds defendant bought a large, handsome residence, after the limitation restricting the use of the lot to residential purposes had expired. Over the protest of plaintiffs, defendant occupies and uses this residence for an undertaking establishment. In front of it he erected a sign, 4 feet high and 9 feet long, advertising the premises before their eyes as 'Crosby's Funeral Home.' In addition, he has constructed and intends to maintain an electric sign. There is an operating and embalming room in the basement, where the dead are prepared for burial To and from the premises an automobile hearse, with unavoidable noises, is driven night and day. Mourners and friends of the dead visit the place. The building is used as a chapel, where sermons are delivered and dirges are sung. Funerals are weekly occurrences, and there were as many as two services in one day. The congestion in the street more than once prevented neighbors from stopping automobiles in front of their own doors. Boxes, used to protect caskets, are piled on the grounds of the funeral home, in view of the public. The dead are carried to and from the hearse a few feet from the windows in the home of one of the plaintiffs. Flowers intended for the funeral home have sometimes been delivered by mistake at private residences. Complete freedom and full enjoyment of home life in the neighborhood have been lost. Lawns, porches, and front rooms have in some instances been partially abandoned, and property in the vicinity has decreased in value. There is a natural shrinking from the scenes and the sounds at the funeral home. Respect for the presence of the dead and for the mourners at funerals grows out of gentle manners and good impulses and influences human conduct. Recurring changes from happy demeanor in private homes to solemnity in the presence of death affect the spirits of rightly constituted individuals, both old and young. The business which defendant conducts among the homes of plaintiffs will tend to depress them mentally, to lower their vitality, and to weaken their power to resist disease. With full knowledge of their protest, the conditions of which they complain were forced upon them by defendant. In exercise of their right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness they had united as a community in a lawful purpose to confine their district to residential purposes. On these facts and conclusions are plaintiffs entitled to equitable relief?"

It is sufficient to state that the facts involved in the foregoing case are so different from the facts in this case that we do not consider that case as controlling.

In plaintiffs' complaint they inserted something regarding the blocking of the streets, etc.—that the blocking was expected to occur by reason of the holding of funerals. But the trial court did not enjoin the holding of funerals, and this appeal is not concerned with the subject of the blocking of streets.

The appellant cites Westcott v. Middleton, 43 N. J. Eq. 478, 11 Atl. 490. The showing made by the plaintiffs in that case is more nearly parallel to the showing made by the plaintiffs in this case. In stating its views the Court of Chancery of New Jersey quoted from an English case, and at page 486 of 43 N. J. Eq. (11 Atl. 494) said:

> "In this case, then, we have the broad, yet perfectly perceptible or tangible ground or principle announced that the injury must be physical, as distinguished from one purely imaginative; it must be something that produces real discomfort or annoyance through the medium of the senses, not from delicacy of taste or a refined fancy. This is very comprehensive; indeed, I cannot conceive of a more liberal or broad statement of the law; yet I apprehend it is a true delineation of the law."

And then at page 488 of 43 N. J. Eq. (11 Atl. 495) the court said:

"The results of my inquiries are that, while the defendant has no right to conduct his business so as to endanger or threaten the health of the complainant or to make his home uncomfortable, either by filling the air with noxious vapors, or of the germs or seeds of disease, the evidence does not show that he has done either, and that the business of an undertaker is not a nuisance per se."

That statement squares with our views as to the rights of the parties in this case.

No case has been cited to us in which the Supreme Court of California has considered the exact question involved in this case. However, the doctrine announced by the Court of Chancery of New Jersey has been announced and followed in California. The rule was followed and applied in Varney & Green v. Williams, 155 Cal. 318, 320, 100 Pac. 867, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 741, 132 Am. St. Rep. 88, to the maintenance of billboards; in Judson v. L. A. Suburban Gas Co., 157 Cal. 168, 172, 106 Pac. 581, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 183, 21 Ann. Cas. 1247, to the operating of a gasworks; and in People v. Selby Smelting & Lead Co., 163 Cal. 84, 92, 124 Pac. 692, 1135, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 1267, to the operation of a smelting plant.

If the particular acts enjoined in this case under the facts found can be legally enjoined, then it would seem to follow that for the very same reasons nearly every hospital in the land could be enjoined. We cannot believe such is the law.

The trial court found that the value of the plaintiffs' property for residential purposes will be depreciated. Such findings, standing alone, and not supported by other findings showing that the defendant is maintaining, or is about to maintain, a nuisance, will not support the judgment. In many instances in populous neighborhoods the property of one person is depreciated by the near proximity of the property of another. Such burdens are ordinary incidents to residence and ownership in a city. McCloskey v. Kreling, 76 Cal. 511, 512, 18 Pac. 433; Siskiyou Lumber, etc., Co. v. Rostel, 121 Cal. 511, 513, 53 Pac. 1118. Other points are discussed in the briefs, but in view of what has been said above, it is not necessary to discuss any other points.

The judgment is reversed.

GRAYDON v. DOANE. (Civ. 3460.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Dec. 13, 1921.)

1. Landlord and tenant ⚷291(13)—Evidence of rental value held sufficient.

In forcible entry and detainer, testimony that the rental value of the premises during June, July, and August was "in the neighborhood of, I should say, $150 a month," was sufficient to support a judgment for $300 based on a finding that the value of use and occupation "from May 17" to date of trial on August 19 was $300, though the finding was technically without support as to the period from May 17 to June 1.

2. Trial ⚷396(2)—Finding that plaintiff was not liable for rent held not responsive to pleadings.

In forcible entry and detainer, an averment in an amended answer to the effect that at the time of the forcible entry plaintiff was indebted to defendant in certain sums due as rentals for the premises, made merely to justify the entry, did not warrant court's finding that defendant was "not entitled to recover any further or other rentals for said premises from plaintiff under the existing lease thereon"; such finding not being responsive to the pleadings.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Monroe, Judge.

Action by McCullough Graydon against Julia Doane. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Modified and affirmed.

Clyde R. Burr, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Walter L. Bowers, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This is an action in forcible entry and detainer. At the time of the forcible entry plaintiff was in possession of the entered premises as a tenant of defendant. Plaintiff had judgment and defendant appeals.

The cause was tried on August 19, 1920, and the trial court found that the value of the use and occupation of the premises from May 17, 1920, the date of the forcible entry, was $150 per month, that plaintiff was damaged by the detention of the property in the sum of $300, and that defendant was "not entitled to recover any further or other rentals for said premises from plaintiff under the existing lease thereon."

[1] The first point made by appellant is that there is no support in the evidence for the finding that the value of the use and occupation, from May 17, was $150 per month. A search of a portion of the reporter's transcript, which is printed in full as an appendix to appellant's brief, the appeal being under the alternative method, discloses the fact that plaintiff testified that the rental value of the premises in question during June, July, and August was "in the neighborhood of, I should say, $150 a month." This testimony does not cover the period from May 17 to 31, it is true, but we have made no further examination of the record for the purpose of ascertaining whether there is evidence elsewhere in it to cover that period. Granting, merely for the sake of argument, that there is no such evidence, the fact that the finding is incorrect in so far as it refers to that period is immaterial, and the error, if there be any, is harmless. It is to be noted that the judgment for damages covers but 2 months at the rate of $150 each, while the time from June 1 to August 19, a period completely embraced within the testimony of the witness, is more than 2½ months.

[2] Appellant contends that there is no evidence to support the finding that defendant is not entitled to recover further rentals under the lease between the parties. We may concede the point, although we do not decide it. The finding is responsive to no allegation in the pleadings. There is an averment in the amended answer to the effect that at the time of the forcible entry respondent was indebted to appellant in certain sums due as rentals for the premises, but the allegation was made, as the context of the paragraph in which it is contained shows, merely by way of attempt, although a fruitless one (Kerr v. O'Keefe, 138 Cal. 415, 71 Pac. 447; California Products, Inc., v. Mitchell, 198 Pac. 646), to justify the entry. The question whether appellant can collect "further" or any rentals under the lease was not in the case, and nothing on the subject was in fact carried into the conclusions of law. The judgment, however, does follow in terms the finding now in question, and disposition must be made of that part of the judgment before an affirmance may result.

Respondent has filed no brief in the case, and we therefore have been deprived of an aid to which we were entitled and which it was a dereliction on the part of counsel not to extend to us. We make particular mention of the circumstance because of the fact that the number of cases in which we are called upon to perform the labors of counsel, either in whole or in part, is truly alarming.

The judgment is modified by striking therefrom the following:

"It is further ordered, adjudged and decreed: That defendant do not recover from plaintiff any other or further rents under the existing lease on said premises."

As so modified the judgment is affirmed.

1. Fraud 🔑31—Remedy available.

One who has been induced by fraud to enter into a contract may elect to rescind it by restoring whatever he has received, or may affirm it, retaining whatever advantage he may have acquired, and still have his action for damages for deceit, in which case the adverse party is entitled to the benefit of his bargain.

2. Fraud 🔑31—Party defrauded by compromise of pending suits not limited to restoration of suits but could sue for damages.

A party to pending suits who was induced to enter into a compromise agreement by fraudulent misrepresentations was not confined, in his remedy, to a restoration of the suits, even though the agreement provided that on other party's failure to comply with conditions, the suits might be restored to the calendar upon motion, but he could elect to affirm the agreement and sue for damages.

3. Fraud 🔑47—Complaint, in action for fraud inducing execution of compromise agreement pending suits, not demurrable for failure to allege plaintiff has entered satisfaction of suits.

In action for fraud, inducing execution of compromise agreement pending suits, failure to allege that plaintiff had entered satisfaction of the suits did not render complaint demurrable.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by Fred G. Howland against the Meximerican Company, S. A., a corporation, and another. From judgment for defendants rendered upon an order sustaining demurrer to complaint, plaintiff appeals. Judgment and order reversed.

Pillsbury, Madison & Sutro, of San Francisco, and Carnahan & Clark, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Goldman, Nye & Surr, of San Francisco, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. This action was brought to recover damages for alleged false representations on the part of defendants, and for a breach of warranty made by them in connection with a certain compromise agreement in writing entered into by and between the parties hereto. A demurrer was interposed to an amended complaint, and this is an appeal from a judgment rendered upon an order sustaining such demurrer.

It appears from the complaint that prior to the time the compromise agreement was entered into plaintiff herein had filed and there was pending in the superior court of the county of Los Angeles, two suits involving a large sum of money which the parties hereto were desirous of settling. These actions were on the calendar for trial on November 2, 1917, and for the purpose of settling and adjusting all matters involved between them the parties hereto entered into the compromise agreement which is the basis of this action.

🔑For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

The agreement in substance provided that the Meximerican Company should convey and transfer unto plaintiff all the real, personal, and mixed property belonging to that company, including all of its interests in certain lands in the state of Sonora, Mexico, which had been acquired by the Meximerican Company by virtue of the assignment to it of two certain contracts relating to such land. By the terms of these contracts defendants had acquired a right to purchase the land from its then owners, Victor and Fernando Aguilar, upon certain conditions. Defendants agreed that they would at any time, upon request of plaintiff, execute to him such instruments of conveyance as would completely effectuate a transfer of their interests in such lands, and that they would also, within 60 days, procure and deliver the written acknowledgment of the Aguilars that they were able and willing to deed a portion of the tract, consisting of some 8,000 acres, for which it was represented to plaintiff the Aguilars had been fully paid, but which had not yet been conveyed to defendants. In consideration of the execution of this document plaintiff agreed that the pending suits heretofore referred to would be taken off the calendar, and in the event that defendants should secure the said acknowledgment of the Aguilars as to the payment to them of the purchase price of the 8,000 acres, plaintiff would enter a full and complete satisfaction of such suits. It was further agreed that upon failure of these requirements the suits might be restored to the calendar upon motion of plaintiff. Defendants failed to carry out the terms of the compromise agreement, and in consequence this action was brought.

The action, as before stated, is one to recover damages for false and fraudulent representations made to plaintiff by defendants at the time of the execution of the compromise agreement, and for a breach of a written warranty given to plaintiff by defendants at that time, and upon which representations and warranty it is alleged the plaintiff relied, and was thereby induced to enter into said agreement. These representations and warranty were to the same effect, namely, that there were at least 8,000 acres of land in the tract for which the defendants had paid the Aguilars, which had not yet been conveyed to the defendants or either of them by said Aguilars, and which the defendant the Meximerican Company, S. A., was entitled to have conveyed to it upon request without further payment or consideration therefor. It is charged that the defendants made the statements to deceive and defraud plaintiff, and that he was deceived thereby; that the 8,000 acres of land had not been paid for; that plaintiff had demanded of defendants and the Aguilars a conveyance of the land, and that each of them had refused to make such conveyance. Defendants demurred generally and specially to the amended complaint and to each count thereof, the said demurrer including practically all of the statutory grounds. Defendants contended below, and do here, that because of the fact that the compromise agreement provided that appellant might, upon respondents' default, restore to the calendar the suits heretofore referred to which were pending when the compromise agreement was entered into and which were dropped from the calendar in pursuance thereof, appellant is confined in his remedy to a restoration of these suits.

[1-3] The trial court adopted this view, and the demurrers were sustained upon the ground that as the parties thus had prescribed the consequences that would follow the breach of the agreement, plaintiff was precluded from invoking any other remedy. We are of the opinion that the trial court was in error in its conclusion. The principle is well established that where one has been induced by fraud to enter into a contract, that he may elect to rescind the contract by restoring whatever he has received under it, or he may affirm the contract, retaining whatever advantage he may have acquired and still have his action for damages for deceit practiced upon him in making the contract. Burne v. Lee, 156 Cal. 221, 104 Pac. 438; Spreckels v. Gorrill, 152 Cal. 383, 92 Pac. 1011; 12 Corpus Juris, 360; Hines v. Brode, 168 Cal. 507, 143 Pac. 729; Christensen v. Hamilton Realty Co., 42 Utah, 70, 129 Pac. 412. In such a case the purchaser is entitled to the benefit of his bargain. And there is nothing in the contract of the parties as claimed that prevents plaintiff from pursuing the remedy here sought. The mere recital in the compromise agreement that plaintiff might restore his suits has no such effect. This right the plaintiff would have had upon the failure of defendants to perform their agreement without any express stipulation to that effect. The provision simply confers a remedial right which in any event, and without the expression of which, the law would have implied in appellant's favor. Then, too, the right of plaintiff to be remitted to his original causes of action was one for his benefit which he might waive, and sue upon the compromise if he so desired. 12 Corpus Juris, 360. True, he may not pursue both remedies, but here plaintiff has elected to stand upon the compromise agreement instead of proceeding upon his original cause of action. His suit to recover damages for false representations and false warranties inducing him to enter into the compromise agreement constitute such election. Birkel v. Nast, 20 Cal. App. 651, 129 Pac. 945. Nor is this conclusion in any manner affected by the lack of allegation that plaintiff has entered satisfaction of the suits. As before stated, the pursuit of the remedy here invoked constitutes his election.

For the reasons given the judgment and order are hereby reversed.

1. Municipal corporations 🔑705(2, 10)—Automobile having right of way to cross street intersection does not have right of way to turn around; plaintiff not negligent where injured after defendant's car was completely turned at street intersection.

Where two automobiles were approaching a street intersection, the one nearer and approaching from the right, under St. 1919, p. 215, § 20, subd. f, had the right of way to cross the intersection, but, on turning around the central point and returning in the direction from which it had come, lost the right of way to the other automobile, which at that time was nearer the intersection, and entering the intersection by the other automobile was not contributory negligence, preventing recovery for damages.

2. Municipal corporations 🔑705(11)—Collision of automobiles held to be proximate cause of one automobile striking telephone pole.

Where two automobiles were approaching a street intersection and one turned completely around the central point at the intersection and started back in the direction from which it came and in so doing struck the rear fender of the other, immediately after which the other automobile became uncontrollable and hit a telephone pole, the proximate cause of its striking the telephone pole was being struck by the first automobile.

3. Negligence 🔑56(1) — "Proximate cause" defined.

The "proximate cause" of an injury is the efficient cause; the one that necessarily starts the other causes in motion; the moving influence.

TYLER, P. J. This is an action to recover damages for injuries sustained to person and property as the result of a collision between two automobiles and between one of them and a telephone pole immediately thereafter. Judgment went for plaintiffs against both defendants, and the appeal is from such judgment.

[1] The accident occurred at the intersection of Russell street and College avenue in Berkeley. The first-named street runs approximately east and west, and the latter north and south. Plaintiff Nellie P. Hill was driving a Dodge automobile in an easterly direction along the southerly side of Russell street, and at the same time defendant Mrs. Achille Jacquemart was driving a Franklin sedan in a northerly direction along the easterly side of College avenue; both being headed toward the intersection of the two named streets. It was Mrs. Hill's intention, on reaching the intersection, to turn to her right and proceed southerly along College avenue. It was Mrs. Jacquemart's purpose, upon reaching said intersection, to turn completely around thereon and to stop in front of a garage situated on the westerly side of College avenue a short distance south of the intersection. Both vehicles were being driven at a lawful rate of speed, not exceeding 15 miles an hour. Mrs. Jacquemart entered said intersection and proceeded to circle the central point thereof. Mrs. Hill did not observe the maneuver until the Franklin car was about its length from her and heading in a southwesterly direction, and Mrs. Jacquemart did not observe the Dodge automobile until the two cars were about four feet apart. As Mrs. Jacquemart was making this turn she observed a third automobile approaching rapidly from the north, and for a moment was uncertain whether said automobile would continue along the westerly side of College avenue on which it was traveling, or swing over to the easterly side of said street, which it finally did, and thereupon Mrs. Jacquemart proceeded to complete her turn. It was at this moment that she first observed the Dodge automobile turning southerly on said intersection about four feet away, and she applied her brake for the purpose of preventing a collision. She did not succeed in doing so, and the end of the bumper on the right hand side of her automobile came in contact with the left rear fender of the car driven by Mrs. Hill, which at this moment was headed in a southeasterly direction a few feet from the curb on the southwest corner of said streets. Seventy-six feet south of the southerly curb on Russell street there was a telephone pole situated between the curb on College avenue and the cement portion of the sidewalk; and immediately after the collision the speed of the Dodge automobile noticeably increased, and thereupon it was turned towards the curb on the westerly side of College avenue, and about midway between the point of said collision and the telephone pole its right wheels rode upon and over said curb, and the automobile continued astride of the curb until it struck the pole. Immediately thereafter Mrs. Jacquemart stated to Mrs. Hill that she (Mrs. Jacquemart) had tried to stop, but that she could not, as her foot slipped off the brake; and that she herself was to blame. It was this second collision which caused most of the damage suffered.

It is claimed by appellants that Mrs. Jacquemart, having originally had the right of way as the two cars approached the intersection of the main streets, she being nearer thereto than Mrs. Hill, never lost it, and was therefore entitled to the right of way while circling the central point of such intersection, and that the accident was due to the negligence of Mrs. Hill in entering this position while Mrs. Jacquemart was upon it; that in so doing she violated the provision of the Motor Vehicle Act governing the question of right of way at intersecting points. The provision referred to reads as follows:

> "Except where controlled by such traffic ordinances or regulations as are permitted under this act, the operator of a vehicle shall yield the right of way at the intersection of their paths to a vehicle approaching from the right, unless such vehicle approaching from the right is further from the point of intersection of their paths than such first named vehicle." Stats. 1919, § 20, subd. F, p. 215.

We do not think the provision invoked warrants or supports the claimed construction. If the driver of the Franklin car was nearer to the intersection, it may be considered that she had the right of way as between her and the driver of the Dodge car, provided she desired to proceed northerly across the intersection; but it certainly would be a strained and unreasonable construction of the law to hold that a person having the right of way upon entering an intersection continues to have it until he has passed out of the intersection notwithstanding a complete change of course of his vehicle. It is obvious in the present case that when Mrs. Jacquemart had so far completed her turn upon the intersection that she was to the left of the vehicle of Mrs. Hill, she no longer had the right of way, and that such right had then passed to Mrs. Hill. The construction contended for would not diminish but rather increase congestion in traffic, one of the objects which the statute was designed to prevent. One exercising a right of way under the circumstances here involved has several courses open to him to pursue. As suggested by counsel, he might turn to the right, proceed straight across, or turn to the left and proceed westerly, or he may make a complete turn. It is obvious, considering the width of some of our streets in the outlying districts, that the claimed construction would add to, rather than diminish, congestion in traffic. Aside from these considerations, if the Legislature had intended any such right it would have been a very simple matter for it to have said so.

[2, 3] The contention is also made by the appellants that the momentary contact of the two cars resulting from the negligence, if any, of Mrs. Jacquemart, was not the proximate cause of the damage resulting from the more violent collision between plaintiffs' automobile and the telephone pole. The proximate cause of an injury is the efficient cause; the one that necessarily starts the other causes in motion; the moving influence. Smith v. Los Angeles Railway Co., 98 Cal. 210, 33 Pac. 53; Merrill v. Los Angeles Gas & Electric Co., 158 Cal. 499, 111 Pac. 534, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 559, 139 Am. St. Rep. 134. Here the proximate cause of the injury was the collision occasioned by the negligence of Mrs. Jacquemart running her automobile into that of Mrs. Hill. Without this collision the impact of the telephone pole happening immediately thereafter would not have occurred. It would be difficult to arrive at the conclusion that there was any intervening negligence on the part of the driver of the Hill car, which had been struck and deflected from its course by the impact of defendants' automobile, with the consequent natural perturbation of mind of the driver of the car so struck, because within a second or two thereafter she had not regained complete control. The finding of the trial court that the negligence which produced the first collision was the proximate cause of the damage will not be disturbed by this court.

[4] The judgment, in so far as it affects Achille Jacquemart, cannot, however, be sustained. The theory upon which the trial court held him to be also liable for the plaintiffs' injuries is that of responsibility for the negligence of Mrs. Jacquemart by reason of the fact that the automobile driven by her was owned by him, and was driven by her with his knowledge and consent, and was kept and maintained by him for the use, comfort, and enjoyment of his family, these circumstances in some cases having been held sufficient to constitute a member of the family undertaking to use and drive the car, an agent of the husband or owner in so doing. But this basis of liability was negatived in the recent case of Spence v. Fisher (Sup.) 193 Pac. 255, 14 A. L. R. 1083.

It follows from what we have said that the judgment against Mrs. Jacquemart must be affirmed and that against Achille Jacquemart must be reversed, and it is so ordered.

POWERS et al. v. HOLMES, Tax Collector, et al. (Civ. 2373.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 30, 1921. Rehearing Denied Dec. 30, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 26, 1922.)

Municipal corporations ⚷284(1), 304(4) — Resolution excepting work already done if satisfactory to street commissioner not a delegation of authority; description in resolution of street work to be done held sufficiently definite to authorize the work done.

Under Improvement Act 1911, § 3, providing that a city council may except from improvements ordered in streets any work already done to the official grade, and section 20, subd. 9, providing that when work is ordered on a street and any property owners have already done the work at their own expense that it shall be excepted from the order for the work if it is on the official grade "and in condition satisfactory to the street superintendent," a resolution of intention to make the street improvement excepting any part thereof already done to official line and grade and satisfactory to the superintendent of streets is not objectionable as rendering the description of the work uncertain or as a delegation of authority to the street superintendent, since he is not designated as arbiter and by section 26 his decision is subject to review by the city council.

Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; W. T. O'Donnell, Judge.

Suit by Frank E. Powers and others against H. H. Holmes, as Tax Collector of the City of Vallejo, John Doe, and others. From judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Frank E. Powers, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Heller, Powers & Ehrman, of San Francisco, Kirkbride & Gordon, of San Mateo, and Harry A. Gee, of Vallejo, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J. The plaintiffs sued to enjoin the sale of certain lots to satisfy an assessment for street work under the Improvement Act of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 730) and for the cancellation of bonds based thereon issued under the Improvement Bond Act of 1915 (St. 1915, p. 1464). The defendants' demurrer to the complaint was sustained and judgment was thereupon rendered in favor of defendants.

The only point involved is whether the resolution of intention to make the street improvement was sufficient to confer jurisdiction to order the work done. The attack is upon that part of the resolution which, after describing the proposed work, continues as follows:

> Excepting from said work and improvement any part thereof already done to official line and grade and satisfactory to the superintendent of streets of said city of Vallejo."

It is argued that, by reason of the italicized part of the exception quoted, the resolution "does not describe with certainty the work to be done thereunder" and delegates to the street superintendent the determination of "the extent of the work to be done." The statute provides, in section 3, that—

> "The city council may include in one proceeding, under one resolution of intention and in one contract, any of the different kinds of work mentioned in this act and any number of streets and rights of way or portions thereof [contiguous or otherwise] and it may except therefrom any of said work already done upon a street to the official grade."

Subdivison 9 of section 20 provides:

> "Whenever any owner or owners of any lots and lands fronting on any street shall have heretofore done, or shall hereafter do any work (excepting grading) on such street, in front of any block, at his or their own expense, and the city council shall subsequently order any work to be done of the same class in front of the same block, said work so done at the expense of such owner or owners shall be excepted from the order ordering work to be done, provided, that the work so done at the expense of such owner or owners, shall be upon the official grade, and in condition satisfactory to the street superintendent at the time said order is passed."

The statute itself is a part of the notice (Emery v. S. F. Gas Co., 28 Cal. 377), and it is not perceived in what manner the inclusion in the resolution of intention of the statutory provision, which is a part of the resolution without such inclusion, can render the description of the work uncertain or constitute a delegation of authority to the street superintendent.

The resolution is not uncertain as to the work to be done or that to be excepted. Before any work can be excepted, it must, of course, be of the same character as that proposed (Barber Asphalt Paving Co. v. Crist, 21 Cal. App. 3, 130 Pac. 435), and must be "done to official line and grade." The resolution evinces no intention of authorizing the street superintendent to exercise any discretion or to permit the exception of any work not measuring up to the express standard fixed by the council. "Whether any portion of the work authorized under the resolution of intention had been 'already done,' as well as the extent to which it had been done, was a question of fact, to be determined by the superintendent of streets, subject to the right of appeal to the city council on the part of any one aggrieved by his determination." San Francisco Paving Co. v. Dubois, 2 Cal. App. 44, 83 Pac. 73. See, also, McDonald v. Conniff, 99 Cal. 389, 34 Pac. 71; Perine v. Erzgraber, 102 Cal. 237, 36 Pac. 585; San Francisco Paving Co. v. Egan, 146 Cal. 638, 80 Pac. 1076. In Reid v. Clay, 134 Cal. 212, 66 Pac. 264, the improvement was described as being "for laying granite curbs * * * where not already laid, and that the roadway * * * be paved with bituminous rock, where not already so paved." The court said:

> "It is claimed that this was a delegation of power to the street superintendent or contractor to determine the character and amount of the work to be done. * * * But here nothing is left to the discretion of the superintendent. The parts of the street to be excepted are definitely described by reference to unmistakable marks on the ground. Accordingly, precisely similar assessments have been repeatedly sustained by this court."

In Williams v. Bergin, 116 Cal. 59, 47 Pac. 878, where a similar description was under consideration, the court said:

> "Whether granite curbs had been laid on any part of the street, or any part of the roadway had been paved with basalt blocks, as well as the extent thereof, was capable of exact ascertainment, and did not depend on the arbitrament or discretion of the superintendent of streets. If the assessment should include any expense for paving, or for curbs that were laid at the date of the order, it could be corrected on an appeal therefrom."

The resolution of intention does not designate the street superintendent as arbiter in the determination of what work had been done in accordance with the proposed improvement, but, under the provisions of section 26 of the statute, his decision is subject to review by the city council. Neither is vested with any discretion in determining the character of the work already done, but their sole function is to ascertain as a fact the extent and character of such work.

Respondents urge that since there is no allegation by plaintiffs that "work has already been done in front of their property, * * * the notice was as complete to them as it would have been without the reference to the street superintendent," and that therefore they are in no position to complain. In view of the conclusion reached on the main question in dispute, it is not necessary to consider this contention. In the oral argument, counsel for appellants said:

> "If the city council acquired original jurisdiction to order this work, then I am out, because any defect in the proceedings after original jurisdiction was acquired, whether through illegal enactments made by the Legislature or through the omission of proceedings—statutory proceedings—have been cured through the issuance of the bonds."

Having reached the conclusion that the city council acquired such jurisdiction, the case must be decided against appellants.

The judgment is affirmed.

LEE v. DAY. (Civ. 2360.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 14, 1921.)

Judgment ⚿256(2)—Findings held sufficient to sustain judgment.

A finding "that each and all the allegations set forth in plaintiff's complaint are not true," followed by the finding "that all the allegations contained in defendant's answer are true," sufficiently supported a judgment for defendant as against the contention that there was no finding that "no one" of the allegations of the complaint was true.

Appeal from Superior Court, Placer County; J. E. Prewett, Judge.

Action by Dick Lee against J. J. Day. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

P. H. Johnson, of Sacramento, for appellant.

Lowell, Lowell & Lowell, of Auburn, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The only ground presented for reversal is that the findings "are insufficient to sustain the judgment."

The complaint contains three allegations: (1) That the defendant had received a certain sum of money "to and for the use of the plaintiff." (2) That plaintiff had made demand for the same. (3) That the defendant had not paid the money to the plaintiff. The answer denied the first allegation and, by failure to deny, admitted the others.

The appellant quotes the finding attacked as follows: "That all the allegations set forth in plaintiff's complaint are not true"—and argues that this is not a finding that "no one of the allegations of the complaint is true, but the finding is as to all collectively; that all are not true." The respondent has failed to file a brief or argue the question raised by the appeal. Appellant, however, has fallen into error in quoting the finding. The finding contained in the transcript is as follows: "That each and all the allegations set forth in plaintiff's complaint are not true"; then follows the finding "that all the allegations contained in defendant's answer are true."

In McLennan v. Wilcox, 126 Cal. 52, 58 Pac. 306, the finding claimed to be insufficient was as follows: "That each of the averments of the answer are not true." The court held the finding to be sufficient. While the use of the word "untrue" would have been more appropriate than the words "not true," the criticism of the finding of which complaint is made is somewhat hypercritical, and under the authoritiy of the case cited the finding must be held sufficient.

The judgment is affirmed.

CASO v. KEBONI et al. (Civ. 3568.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Dec. 12, 1921.)

1. Damages ⚷159(5)—Income of truck driver injured in collision held admissible in action for personal and property damage.

In an action based on a collision between plaintiff's truck and defendant's truck, for injuries both to the person and to the truck, wherein it was alleged and denied that plaintiff lost the use of his truck for 10 days, court properly permitted plaintiff to testify as to how much he was earning with his truck at the time of the accident.

2. Municipal corporations ⚷706(8)—Instruction as to rights of truck driver at street intersection held properly refused.

In an action for damages occasioned by collision of motor trucks, court properly refused defendants' request to instruct "that, if you should find * * * that the defendants, * * * in turning to the left, * * * had the right of way over any vehicle approaching him from the left while he was making such turn, and if * * * defendants * * * were turning into the intersection of the streets, * * * then they had the right to maintain possession of the crossing until they had completed their turn, and if the plaintiff entered said intersection while it was then being used by the defendants, * * * such entrance would be negligence," since one entering upon a street intersection does not have the exclusive control of the entire area.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Louis W. Myers, Judge.

Action by F. Caso against K. Keboni and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. I. Gilbert, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

J. H. Ardis, Dailey S. Stafford, and W. S. Knott, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. The action is one for damages for injuries to the person sustained in a collision between the plaintiff's truck and the truck of the defendant, and also for damages resulting to the plaintiff for the loss of the use of his truck for a period of 10 days. Defendant answered, and alleged contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff. Among other denials is one "that plaintiff has lost the use of said truck for a period of 10 days," etc. From a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff, the defendant appeals.

[1] Two grounds are presented by appellant's brief. The plaintiff was a witness in his own behalf. He was asked the following question:

> "Mr. Caso, how much money were you earning with your truck at the time of this accident?"

Counsel interposed an objection, on the ground that the question was immaterial. The objection was overruled, and the witness answered that he was earning "$10 or $12 or $20 a day." The question and answer were clearly material to the issue presented by the complaint and the denial contained in the answer above quoted.

[2] The defendant requested the court to give the following instruction:

> "You are instructed that, if you should find from the testimony that the defendants, at the time of the accident, in turning to the left on Long Beach boulevard, had the right of way over any vehicle approaching him from the left while he was making such turn, and if you should find that the defendants had entered said intersection and were turning into the intersection of the streets involved in this accident, then they had the right to maintain possession of the crossing until they had completed their turn, and, if the plaintiff entered said intersection while it was then being used by the defendants under the circumstances just mentioned, such entrance would be negligence, and, if you find that this negligence contributed in any degree to the plaintiff's injury, then your verdict shall be for the defendants."

This the court properly refused to do. If this instruction were a correct statement of the law, one entering upon a street intersection would, without regard to any other consideration, have the exclusive control of the entire area of the intersection until he had passed therefrom, and any other vehicle entering any portion thereof would do so at its peril. The principal issue presented by the evidence was as to whether or not the defendant in making a turn at the street intersection in question was proceeding upon his right or his left hand side. The appeal is without merit.

The judgment is affirmed.

2. Sales 🔑181(12)—Finding that peach kernel oil sold was of reasonably good quality sustained.

In an action by the seller of peach kernel oil to a sardine packer for damages for failure to accept the oil furnished, a finding that the oil was of reasonably good quality held supported by the evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; E. A. Luce, Judge.

Action by W. J. Bush & Co. against the Van Camp Sea Food Company for damages for breach of contract. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Kemp & Clewett, of Los Angeles, and Patterson Sprigg, of San Diego, for appellant.

Wright & McKee, of San Diego, for respondent.

JAMES, J. This action was brought by the plaintiff to recover damages from the defendant for an alleged breach of contract. Plaintiff had judgment, from which defendant appeals.

It is alleged in the complaint that on the 15th day of August, 1918, defendant entered into a written contract with the plaintiff whereby the plaintiff agreed to sell, and the defendant to buy, 50,000 pounds of oil manufactured from peach kernels at a price of 36 cents per pound; that defendant accepted 4,800 pounds of the oil and refused to accept any more; that the oil manufactured to fill defendant's order was not resold; and that the value of the oil to the plaintiff was 29 cents per pound. The difference of 7 cents per pound for the unaccepted part of the oil ordered was claimed as damages, according to the measure fixed by section 3311, Civil Code. The trial court found that the value of the oil to the plaintiff was 31 cents per pound, and calculated damages accordingly at 5 cents per pound. Upon defendant's part, the answer alleged that the oil was sold under representations that it was suitable for canning fish and sardines for human consumption, and that for such purpose it was equal to the "best grades of imported olive oil." Under this allegation defendant claimed an express warranty was made. In this connection, and as supporting that defense, there was testimony tending to show that some of the oil delivered contained stearine, which, expressed in ordinary terms, was congealed vegetable fat appearing as white particles in the oil. The appellant insists that the defense of a particular warranty was completely made out by the evidence.

We will refer first to the evidence as to the circumstances under which contract was made, and the terms of the latter. It may be stated that it must be taken as established under all the evidence that peach kernel oil, of fair quality and free from stearine, is fit for human consumption and altogether suitable for use in the packing of sardines, which was the use to which the defendant intended to put it. The presence of stearine would be detrimental only as it affected the appearance of the oil. On August 7, 1918, the agent of the plaintiff, in response to previous inquiry, wired to the defendant a quotation of 36 cents per pound on peach kernel oil. On the same day the same agent addressed a letter to the defendant, confirming the quotation made in the telegram, and adding the following statement:

> "Peach kernel oil or fruit kernel oil, as some of the packers call it, is the same as the sample I left with your Mr. Van Camp last year, and on which I quoted him. This is being used very successfully by a large number of the fish packers, and while we have been compelled to raise our price some on account of the price of raw material advancing, when you take into consideration the quality of the oil, which I believe for your purpose is equal to the best grades of imported olive oil, it is still low."

On August 9th the defendant wired to plaintiff's agent as follows:

> "Enter our order fifty thousand pounds peach kernel oil price terms your wire August seventh confirm."

This order was acknowledged and confirmed by letter from plaintiff's agent dated August 9th, in which it was stated:

> "As per your instructions I have entered your order for 50,000 lbs. or 125 drums at 400 lbs. each, to be taken as wanted up to January, 1919, terms to be net cash in 10 days. * * * You will note that I have given you until January to draw this oil. I believe the factory can deliver it all at once if you so wish."

A letter from the defendant was received by the plaintiff in response to the last communication, in which defendant requested that a contract be forwarded covering the order. Such a contract was prepared under date of August 15, 1918, providing for deliveries to end December 31, 1918, and stating the price to be 36 cents per pound for 50,000 pounds, describing the merchandise simply as "oil peach kernels." Referring first to the claim that there was a representation and, consequently, a warranty that the oil to be furnished would be equal to the best grades of imported olive oil: We think the conditions surrounding the transaction do not justify this claim. The letter of the agent which followed the telegram quoting the price referred to a sample of oil left with Mr. Van Camp the preceding year, and expressed the opinion of the writer only that the oil for the purpose intended was equal to the best grades of olive oil. This opinion was expressed in connection with the statement as to an advance in price of the commodity. The statement was made, too, with the qualification that the oil was of the kind shown by sample previously left with Van Camp, who was at the head of defendant's establishment. Defendant, in the evidence furnished by it, made no denial as to its having been furnished a sample of kernel oil as stated in the letter. If it did in fact receive such a sample, then, irrespective of other considerations, it would have not the slightest ground for relying upon the opinion of the plaintiff's agent that the oil was equal to the best grade of olive oil for fish packing purposes. The packing of fish was the business of the defendant, and it was better able to determine the suitability of oil for its purposes than was the plaintiff.

[1] However, even without reference to the statement concerning the sample having been furnished, the expression comparing the product to olive oil expressed a mere opinion, and could by no means be relied upon as a warranty. The trial court then had to determine, first, as to whether the peach kernel oil offered to be furnished by the plaintiff under its contract with the defendant was of reasonably good quality. In the manufacture of that oil it was common to find congealed portions which showed white in the liquid. A filtering process was used in connection with the production of the oil and, as the testimony showed, the greater part of the congealed portions was capable of being taken out. The filtering process was shown to have been made use of by the plaintiff, although it was admitted that occasionally a defective filter might permit some of the oil to retain a greater amount of stearine than other portions. Up to nearly the end of the year 1918 the defendant had required but little of the oil which it had contracted should be all delivered by the end of December of that year. The fact is made clear by letters written by the defendant to plaintiff that the run of sardines had been sparse and consequently the cannery of the defendant had had little occasion for use of the oil. Some few drums had been furnished and accepted. On the 16th of November, 1918, the defendant wrote to the plaintiff as follows:

> "Referring to our contract of August 15th for peach kernel oil, we are inclined to think that it will be necessary for us to either cancel or materially reduce the quantity as the season is now far advanced and we are not receiving any sardines at all. We therefore suggest that you make an effort to sell elsewhere at least half or two-thirds of the quantity covered by our contract."

To this letter the plaintiff replied, stating that in order to be prepared to fill the order given by the defendant it had purchased many tons of kernels and that the greater part of the oil was then ready to be shipped, adding:

> "We regret therefore that we cannot cancel the order or reduce the quantity we have to deliver to you. We might also add that we have a large stock of our own oil to dispose of."

On December 12th the defendant wrote to the plaintiff, stating that the fish had been "running in a small way for the past week," and that it might be able to use the oil during the winter and spring if plaintiff would carry the stock for it. On December 31st plaintiff wrote to the defendant as follows:

> "We beg to inclose herewith invoice for 48,000 lbs. of oil which we are holding at our factory at National City and shall be glad to have your shipping instructions for same. This is in completion of contract dated August 15, 1918."

In January defendant requested 5,000 pounds of oil to be shipped, and on February 5th began to complain about the quality, stating that the appearance of stearine made it unsuitable for the intended use. From this time on the defendant continued to insist that the oil was not of good quality nor in accordance with the terms of the contract, and refused to accept the same, and expressed its rescission of the contract for that cause. A number of drums of oil which defendant returned to the plaintiff as containing a large amount of stearine, according to the testimony of the plaintiff's witness, contained but little, and that in certain of the drums only. The plaintiff at no time refused to furnish clear oil in lieu of oil in which an excessive amount of stearine was present. This according to its testimony, which the court had before it in making up a decision.

[2] We have suggested enough as to the situation respecting the testimony to show that there was a fair conflict of the evidence upon the question as to whether the oil furnished was of reasonably good quality. The trial judge resolved the question of fact in favor of the plaintiff as to that matter, and with that determination the defendant must be content. Nor are we inclined to agree with appellant that the amount of damage for which judgment was allowed is not supported by the evidence. There was testimony to show that the plaintiff was the only business concern engaged in manufacturing kernel oil in the United States; that there was no regular or constant market for the product. It was shown that plaintiff purchased raw material in anticipation of its requirements in order to fill the order of the defendant, and that at the time of the refusal of the defendant to accept more oil it had on hand a great deal more than enough oil to complete this order. There was testimony from which the court could reasonably conclude that this oil manufactured for the defendant could not readily be disposed of at the time of the attempted rescission. Plaintiff certainly was not called upon to dispose of oil contracted for by the defendant in preference to other oil in stock and which it had intended for the general market. Without narrating any considerable part of the testimony to the point, we think it sufficient to state further that, in our opinion, there was enough evidence as to conditions and circumstances concerned in the manufacture of kernel oil and as to the market to warrant the trial judge in deducing, as he did, that the value of the oil to the plaintiff was the sum of 31 cents per pound. Agreeing with that conclusion, it follows that the amount of damage was correctly estimated at the sum which is fixed by the judgment. At to whether there was error in the admission of any of the testimony is not important to be discussed, because on the whole case we are well satisfied that any such error as is complained of was not so prejudicial as to have produced in this case a miscarriage of justice. The judgment is affirmed.

HIND et al. v. UCHIDA TRADING CO., Limited. (Civ. 4019.)

1. Partnership ⚷64—Affidavit of publication of certificate received without objection sufficient evidence thereof.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 2466, 2468, requiring partners doing business under a fictitious name to file and publish a certificate where an affidavit showing a publication of the certificate with the county clerk's filing mark thereon was received in evidence, and no objection was made to the proof of publication, it may be taken for granted that this was a full compliance with the statute.

2. Partnership ⚷64—Not necessary that copy of certificate offered to show publication should contain acknowledgment.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 2466, 2468, requiring partners doing business under a fictitious name to file and publish a certificate, it was not necessary that a copy of the certificate offered in evidence for the purpose of showing publication should contain the acknowledgment; that being no part of the certificate and not being required to be published.

3. Evidence ⚷83(4)—Presumed that county clerk did not accept partnership certificate for filing unless acknowledged.

Where an affidavit showing a publication of the certificate required by Civ. Code, §§ 2466, 2468, in the case of partnership using a fictitious name, with the county clerk's filing mark thereon, was received in evidence, the presumption is justified, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, that the county clerk regularly performed his duty and did not accept for filing a certificate not acknowledged as required by the Code.

4. Evidence ⚷450(8), 461(1) New trial ⚷89—Evidence properly admitted as to intention of parties when contract uncertain, and such evidence was no basis for surprise.

A contract for the sale of tin plate to be packed in tin-lined boxes, strapped for export for "$9.60 per base box * * * cost, insurance and freight to Kobe, Japan," was uncertain as to whether cost, insurance, and freight to Japan included the cost of tin lining and strapping, or whether the seller was entitled to charge extra therefor, and evidence to ascertain the intent of the parties were admissible, and defendant could not have been surprised by its admission.

5. Interest ⚷19(2)—Recoverable on overpayments when time of payments but not amount was in dispute.

In an action to recover overpayments on a contract where there had never been any dispute as to the amount of the payments, the only dispute being as to whether they were due, interest was recoverable under the general rule that interest is allowable from the time a sum becomes due if it is certain or can be made certain by mere calculation.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by George U. Hind and another, copartners doing business as Hind, Rolph & Co., against the Uchida Trading Company, Limited. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Crabbe, Webster & Mayer, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Ira S. Lillick, of San Francisco, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued on a complaint setting forth two causes of action: (1) An action for money paid to defendant under a mistake; and (2) a common count for money had and received. Judgment was given plaintiffs in the sum of $2,520 and defendant appeals. The judgment is attacked upon the ground that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings. Error is also assigned in the admission of certain evidence and in the denial of the motion for a new trial.

As to the sufficiency of the evidence, two assignments require consideration: (1) the finding on the question of respondents' legal capacity to sue, and (2) the finding that the money was inadvertently paid to appellant.

[1-3] As to the first, the complaint alleged compliance with the provisions of sections 2466 and 2468 of the Civil Code. This was denied by the defendant. An affidavit showing a publication of the certificate with the county clerk's filing mark thereon was received in evidence. No objection was made to the proof of publication and it may be taken for granted that this was a full compliance with the terms of the statute. It is, however, argued that the certificate itself is insufficient because it does not show an acknowledgment, and also that it was not shown to have been filed. The proof was that the original certificate was filed in the office of the county clerk of San Francisco in 1898 and that the original was destroyed in the fire of 1906. It is true that the copy of the certificate which was offered in evidence did not contain the acknowledgment by the parties. It was not necessary that it should do so for the purposes of publication as the acknowledgment is no part of the certificate and the certificate alone is required to be published under section 2468. Proof might well have been offered that the original certificate was duly acknowledged, but in the absence of any evidence to the contrary the trial court was justified in invoking the presumption that the county clerk regularly performed his duty, and that therefore he did not accept for filing a certificate which was not acknowledged as required by the Code.

[4] As to the finding on inadvertent payment, the evidence presents a clear conflict which the trial court was called upon to determine. The finding of the court on that issue cannot be disturbed upon appeal. The case of respondents was that, having entered into a written contract with appellant for the purchase of a large quantity of tin plate, they had paid four separate invoices on the request of appellant before they discovered that these invoices included charges for extras which they claim were included in the contract price. Their protest and demand for the return of these overpayments was refused by appellant, and it is these overpayments which are the subject-matter of this litigation. The contract contained specifications that the boxes in which the tin plate was to be packed should be tin lined and strapped for export. The price was designated as "$9.60 per base box (112 sheets —14x20—100 lbs.) cost, insurance and freight to Kobe, Japan." The dispute between the parties arose over the question whether cost, insurance, and freight to Japan included the cost of tin lining and strapping specified in the contract, or whether the seller was entitled to charge extra for that work. That the contract was uncertain in this respect admits of no doubt. The trial court received evidence for the purpose of ascertaining the intention of the parties. This evidence was in conflict, and the trial court resolved the doubt in favor of respondents. No error was committed by the trial court in receiving this evidence and appellant could not have been taken by surprise when it was admitted.

As to the denial of appellant's motion for a new trial it is sufficient to say that the showing on the motion added nothing to what had been before the court at the trial, and no error was committed in this respect.

[5] Appellant also attacks that portion of the judgment which allows interest on the amounts recovered from the date of the so-called overpayment. There had never been any dispute as to the amounts of these respective payments, and this was admitted at the time of the trial. The only dispute between the parties was whether the amounts so paid were due. "The general rule is that interest is allowable from the time the sum in suit becomes due if the same is certain or can be made certain by mere calculation." Gray v. Bekins, 199 Pac. 767.

Judgment affirmed.

KEARNEY v. CASTELLOTTI. (Civ. 3997.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 6, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 2, 1922.)

1. Municipal corporations 🔑706(5)—Finding of negligence of driver cutting corner at speed of 15 miles an hour held warranted.

Evidence that the driver of a motor truck turned into a heavily traveled thoroughfare at an obstructed corner at a speed of 15 miles an hour, without passing beyond and to the right of the intersection, warranted a finding that he was guilty of negligence.

2. Municipal corporations 🔑706(7)—Motorcycle rider not negligent as matter of law in not adopting best means of avoiding collision.

Where the driver of a motor truck turned into a street at a speed of 15 miles an hour without passing beyond and to the right of the intersection, and was thus on the left-hand side of the street, a motorcycle rider meeting the truck was not negligent as a matter of law in veering to the left and proceeding approximately parallel with the truck in an attempt to avert a collision instead of turning into the intersecting street which would have proved to be the better alternative.

3. Negligence ⚿72—Care required in emergency.

One in great peril, when immediate action is necessary to avoid it, is not required to exercise all the presence of mind and carefulness justly required of a careful and prudent man under ordinary circumstances, but is only required to do what seems reasonable under the circumstances known to him.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; A. F. St. Sure, Judge.

Action by William J. Kearney, by S. Kearney, his guardian ad litem, against J. B. Castellotti. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Charles E. Snook and Snook & Brown, all of Oakland (F. P. Tuttle, Jr., of Auburn, of counsel), for appellant.

Augustin Donovan and Homer R. Spence, both of Alameda, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. This is an appeal by defendant from a judgment in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $3,000, in a case brought to recover damages for personal injuries sustained as the result of a collision between the motorcycle ridden by plaintiff and a motor truck driven by the defendant. The case was tried by the court sitting without a jury. The injuries to plaintiff were of a serious nature, consisting of a cerebral concussion, a fracture of the skull, lacerations and severe contusions of the face and mouth, loss of teeth, and internal and permanent injuries.

The collision occurred at or about the intersection of Forty-Seventh street and Telegraph avenue in Oakland. The first-named street runs in a general easterly and westerly direction terminating in Telegraph avenue, and is 36 feet wide from curb to curb. Telegraph avenue pursues a general northerly and southerly course, and has a width of 60 feet. Constructed upon it are two street car tracks, the nearer of which to the westerly curb of the avenue is about 20 feet therefrom. At the northwest corner of the intersection of these two thoroughfares there is a two-story building adjacent to other structures, and the district generally is fairly closely built up.

On the 21st day of July, 1919, in the morning, the defendant was driving an empty auto truck in an easterly direction on the south side of Forty-Seventh street and turned into Telegraph avenue, intending to proceed northerly thereon. At the same time the plaintiff was proceeding down Telegraph avenue in a southerly direction upon his motorcycle, pursuing a course about 9 feet from its westerly curb. The driver of the truck, in turning into Telegraph avenue, gave no signal of his intention so to do, and he also failed to pass to the right of and beyond the center of the intersection of the two streets before making the turn to the left; in other words, "cut the corner." In this respect the testimony is uncontradicted. He himself said that he went to the left of the center because it was hard to go straight through on the south side of the intersection and then turn the truck abruptly. He testified: "I swung to the left because it was the easiest to go in" on Telegraph avenue. The collision occurred at a point about 20 feet north of the center of the intersection (being about 3 feet north of the north line of Forty-Seventh street projected), and about 5½ feet west of the median line of the avenue. When the truck came out of Forty-Seventh street it was traveling, according to the testimony of the plaintiff, at the rate of about 15 miles an hour, he himself at that moment being from 45 to 70 feet north of the intersection and proceeding at a speed, as variously estimated by witnesses, of 8, 12, or 15 to 17 miles an hour. Both drivers, appreciating the danger, applied their brakes; but neither succeeded in coming to a stop before the impact. The plaintiff also testified that there was no sufficient room to pass to the rear of the truck, so he veered to the left; that his motorcycle did not skid and fall under the truck, but that he was struck in the rear by some part of the front of the truck.

[1-3] To recapitulate, according to the evidence introduced by plaintiff, defendant entered a heavily traveled thoroughfare at an obstructed corner from the left-hand (wrong) side of Forty-Seventh street at a speed of 15 miles an hour. It is clear, we think, that this evidence sustains the finding of the court that defendant was guilty of negligence. Indeed, he does not contend to the contrary, but claims that from the uncontradicted evidence it is established as a matter of law that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence which should bar his recovery. This contention is based upon the theory that respondent was traveling at an excessive rate of speed in approaching the crossing, and upon the further contention that plaintiff had abundant time to have slowed down sufficiently to have passed to the rear of the truck or to have turned to the right into Forty-Seventh street, and have thus avoided the collision. We think under all the circumstances of the case that these were questions of fact for the trial court to determine. The evidence in regard to speed was conflicting, but it is sufficient to sustain the finding of the trial court that respondent was traveling at a moderate rate of speed. It may be that the wiser course would have been for the plaintiff, if he could not have stopped his motorcycle in time to avoid the collision, to have turned into Forty-Seventh street; but he was not bound at his peril to adopt what later would have proved to be the better alternative, and whether or not he was guilty of negligence in veering to the left and proceeding approximately parallel with the truck for a short distance in an attempt to avert the collision was not a question of law, but, as before stated, a question of fact for the court or jury. One in great peril, when immediate action is necessary to avoid it, is not required to exercise all that presence of mind and carefulness which are justly required of a careful and prudent man under ordinary circumstances. Tousley v. Pacific Electric Railway Co., 166 Cal. 457, 137 Pac. 31.

In such a situation plaintiff was only required to do what seemed reasonable under the circumstances known to him, and the reasonableness of his effort to avoid the injury after discovery of the danger is a question of fact. It follows, in our opinion, that the judgment should be, and it is, hereby affirmed.

FINKLE v. TAIT et al. (Civ. 3726; L. A. 6755.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Nov. 29, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 26, 1922.)

1. Municipal corporations 🔑706(6)—Evidence held insufficient to take negligence of automobilist to jury.

In an action for death of a pedestrian struck by automobile at a street intersection, evidence held insufficient to take to jury question of negligence of driver.

2. Trial 🔑171—Right to direct verdict in case tried by jury.

If, on the conclusion of the taking of the evidence, it appears to a trial judge that a case for the plaintiff has not been made out, it is his duty to direct a verdict, unless it reasonably appears that on another trial the plaintiff may be able to secure better evidence, under Code Civ. Proc. § 2061.

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

3. Municipal corporations 🔑705(10)—Pedestrian, killed by automobile, held guilty of negligence.

A pedestrian, carrying a box of raisins, run down and killed at a street intersection by an automobile in the nighttime, with proper lights, while going at a speed of 15 miles an hour, was negligent, since he either failed to look for automobiles, or saw the automobile and carelessly walked in front of it, or carried the box of raisins so that it obscured his vision.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by Charlotte Finkle, as administratrix of the estate of Nathan Finkle, deceased, against Jessie Tait and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed in the District Court of Appeal, and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

Turnbull, Heffron & Kelley, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Chandler P. Ward and Stephens & Stephens, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

JAMES, J. The husband of Charlotte Finkle was struck by an automobile which was being operated by Georgia Tait, receiving injuries from which he died almost immediately. The administratrix of his estate brought this action to recover damages, alleging that the automobile which caused the death of Finkle was at the time being operated in a negligent manner and at a dangerous and excessive rate of speed. After hearing the testimony of the witnesses for plaintiff and defendants, the trial judge advised the jury to return a verdict in favor of the defendants, which verdict was thereafter recorded and judgment entered thereon. The plaintiff has appealed, and the question presented is as to whether the action of the trial court in requiring the verdict to be rendered as indicated was error. It is insisted that there was substantial evidence tending to show negligence on the part of the operator of the automobile and that the evidence did not show that the injuries received by Finkle were produced or contributed to by any careless or incautious conduct on his part. The position of the defendants, as contended for, is that the evidence failed to establish negligence on the part of the driver, and did show that the accident was produced through the contributory negligence of Finkle. Mrs. Jessie Tait is the mother of Georgia Tait, and it was admitted that she would be legally responsible for any damage which might be shown to have been caused by her daughter Georgia through the operation of the automobile which collided with Finkle. For convenience we will hereinafter, when discussing the evidence affecting the operation of the automobile, refer to Georgia Tait as though she were sole defendant.

[1, 2] Hollywood boulevard, in the city of Los Angeles, is a wide street extending in an easterly and westerly direction. On the northerly side of it Ivor street emerges, but is not cut through the southerly line of the boulevard. The accident happened at a point on Hollywood boulevard on the southerly side thereof, and about in the space which would be occupied by the westerly sidewalk of Ivor street, had it been projected across the boulevard. The testimony of Georgia Tait, who was operating the car on the night in question, shows that on the 26th day of November, 1919, at about the hour of 5:30 or 6 o'clock p. m., she was driving a touring car, accompanied by a young lady friend, easterly along Hollywood boulevard; that she was on the right-hand side of the street, between the car tracks and the curb; that it had been raining that afternoon, and that portions of the street were dry and portions wet; that it was fairly dark; that her car was equipped with headlights of usual character, and that they were lighted. The witness stated, in answer to a question, that the headlights illuminated the street ahead of her car for more than 10 feet. In that connection she said, "I know that my headlights were very good, and I could see a great distance"; that she had, after crossing a street at the westward of the point where the accident occurred, shifted her machine into high gear, and that she noticed ahead of her a white object, which was shown to be a box carried upon the shoulders of Finkle; that at the time she saw the man and box they were directly in front of her machine, and that almost at the same instant the automobile struck the man. The witness said, "It was just a second before I hit him." In order to show what attention the driver of the automobile was giving to the roadway ahead of her, the witness was asked as to whether she looked down at the time she shifted gears, and replied that she did not; that she made the shift, as she was accustomed to do, without looking down. She further made replies to questions asked as follows:

> "A. I looked up, and the first thing I saw was this great white object. Q. You looked up from where? A. I looked ahead of me, and this great white object was in front of me. Q. Were you looking somewhere else before you looked up? A. No; but it was very dark, and it just seemed that he appeared right in front of my car."

The witness further stated that she had driven the automobile since January of 1919, which was a period of more than ten months preceding the day of the accident; that she was accustomed to drive in the dark, and that she was the only member of her family who operated the machine. She stated, further, that immediately after the automobile collided with Finkle she threw on both brakes and brought the car to a standstill within a space not exceeding its length; that at the suggestion of a bystander, who had arrived to assist, she drove the car forward and to the curb about 100 feet and remained there until she was again told to back the car up where the injured man was, when he was placed in the car and taken to a place where medical help was obtained. She further stated that at the time the accident occurred her machine was traveling at a rate of speed between 12 and 15 miles per hour. The witness Constance Rimpau, who was riding with Georgia Tait at the time of the accident, corroborated the driver's statement as to all of the circumstances testified to by the latter. No other witness was produced who saw Finkle on the street at that place before he was struck by the automobile, so that, except for the testimony of the young women, the court was not advised as to what the actions of Finkle had been up to the moment when the automobile collided with him. All of the other testimony, as referring to the immediate occurrence, illustrates only what certain witnesses saw after their attention had been attracted to the point upon hearing the sound of the collision between the automobile and the man and box.

Taking the case as its facts were illustrated by the testimony of the two young women alone, it must at once be apparent that not only was there a failure on the part of the plaintiff to establish the negligence of the driver of the automobile, but that such testimony showed in an affirmative manner that the machine was being operated with reasonable caution. Nor are we able to find, summing up all of the circumstances shown by the testimony of those who observed the situation after the accident, that the jury, had the case been submitted to it, would have been authorized to draw an inference of negligence as against the defendant. Gorham and McKelvey were two witnesses who made certain observations from points across the street after they heard the noise of the collision. The claim is made that, from testimony of these two witnesses particularly, supplemented by that of a witness Page, who made certain measurements, to which we will later refer, the jury would have been entitled to infer that the automobile did not come to a stop after the collision with Finkle until it had traveled approximately one hundred feet easterly. Neither of the first-named two witnesses testified that the automobile did not stop, as the driver and her companion had stated it did, before proceeding onward and to the curb. Gorham was on the opposite side of the street, and he said that, after hearing the noise of the collision, and seeing a box flying in the air, he heard the brakes go on squeaking and "heard the skidding process of the machine that I supposed hit him, which proved later to be the one." He stated, however, that when he saw the automobile in question it was approximately 100 feet from where the man was lying. McKelvey was at another point diagonally across the street when he heard the noise of the collision, and, looking across, saw the man and box fall. He testified in part as follows, referring to the automobile:

> "Q. Did you see it before it came to a stop? A. I seen it while it was running; yes. Q. Did you see it after it came to a stop? A. Yes, sir; I seen it pull over to the curb. I seen the tail light. It was about 100 or 125 feet from where the man was lying when it stopped."

Contrary to the observation of Gorham, this witness, when asked the question, stated that he did not hear any noise of scraping of brakes. Page, a police officer who arrived just as the injured man was being taken away, testified that he noticed "skid" marks which showed on the street, commencing at what would be the east line of Ivor street if the same were produced across Hollywood boulevard, 9 feet from the south curb of the boulevard, and extending for a distance of 65 feet east and to the curb. This question was asked and answer made:

> "Q. These skid marks ran parallel one with the other? A. Yes, sir; they swerved a little to one side."

By all the testimony it appeared that the collision occurred at what would be the west line of Ivor street, and from the diagram shown in the record the width of Ivor street appears to have been 33 feet; hence the so-called "skid" marks did not commence until the automobile had gone 35 feet past the point of the accident. The evidence of these conditions, to our mind, in no wise presented a substantial conflict as to the facts in opposition to the testimony of the two occupants of the automobile. Without some informative evidence as to the conditions under which the automobile in question might make marks which the witnesses term "skid tracks," we can attach no significance to that testimony. It might as well be inferred that the driver had allowed her brakes to make contact while she proceeded to conduct the automobile to the curb after the accident, as to infer that the marks were due to an opposite cause, to wit, the resistance offered by the application of brakes to the momentum of the machine, and, if the latter is to be assumed, there is utterly no means by which the rate of speed can be deduced from the fact. To add to the factors which would have to be taken into consideration is the wet and dry condition of the street; the evidence being that the surface was damp and slippery in spots. The evidence showed that there was considerable traffic to and fro on either side of Hollywood boulevard at the time the accident happened, and approximately two-thirds of the width of the street intervened between the points from which the observations of Gorham and McKelvey were made and the place of the accident. The statements of these witnesses as to the automobile having moved forward after the noise of the impact was heard by them were wholly consistent with the statements of the driver and her companion. An inference that they observed closely enough to be able to know that the automobile did not, in fact, stop immediately after the collision, and intended to so express themselves, would be speculative.

The trial judge, we may conclude from oral observations made during the argument of counsel on the question as to whether an instruction to the jury to find for the defendant was proper, was of the opinion that Finkle had been shown to have been guilty of negligence on his part, which contributed to produce his injuries. If the judgment to be determined upon here depended upon the correctness of that view, we would not be inclined to agree with the trial judge's conclusion; but we are required to determine whether the instruction was proper to be given under any aspect of the evidence. In reaching the opinion indicated on the question of contributory negligence, the judge was undoubtedly making application of decisions which we do not believe were appropriate to the situation here. Those decisions are more particularly applicable to cases where a person is approaching a situation which threatens danger to him, and where it is easy to apprise himself of the danger by looking. It will be presumed in such circumstances, upon injury being received by him, that he did not look and was hence negligent. We think here that, before any inference of negligence could be drawn as against the injured party, the whole situation as to the condition of the street traffic, number of vehicles passing, and the actual movements of Finkle would necessarily have to be illustrated in the evidence. In a congested condition of traffic a person might, without negligence, get himself into a position of great danger. If he acted in the emergency of the situation as a reasonable man might, then such conduct would not bar recovery, where negligence was proved against the driver of an automobile colliding with him. From all that can be gleaned from the record presented to us, we are unable to conclude that the evidence produced before the trial judge and jury established either negligence on the part of the driver of the automobile or of Finkle, now deceased.

A trial by jury, under the practice established in this state, does not mean that the party calling for the jury has the right to its verdict, irrespective of any control on the part of the trial judge. On the contrary, the jury's determination as to questions of fact, when made, is no more conclusive upon a trial court, as against motions for a new trial, than are the findings of the trial judge, where the case is tried without a jury. It is not only the right, but it is the duty, of the trial judge to grant a new trial, whenever he is of the opinion that the verdict of the jury or his own findings of fact are not sustained by the weight of the evidence. Section 2061, Code Civ. Proc.; Drathman v. Cohen et al., 139 Cal. 310, 73 Pac. 181; In re Martin, 113 Cal. 479, 45 Pac. 813; Weringer v. Rutledge, 180 Cal. 566, 182 Pac. 31. And if, upon the conclusion of the taking of the evidence, it appears to a trial judge that a case for the plaintiff has not been made out, it is likewise his duty to give direction for a verdict, unless it reasonably appears that, upon another trial, the plaintiff may be able to secure better evidence. In the case of Lacey v. Porter, 103 Cal. 597, 37 Pac. 635, the court was considering the claim of error for the giving of an instruction similar to that shown to have been given in this case, and it was there said:

> "The general rule undoubtedly is that these questions should be submitted to the jury where the evidence is conflicting; but it is equally well settled that the court may within certain limits control the verdict, either by such an instruction as was here given, or by setting it aside and granting a new trial, either upon motion of the defeated party or upon its own motion. To justify the court in directing a verdict it is not necessary that there should be no conflict in the evidence; but where the evidence is such that it is clearly insufficient to support a verdict in favor of the party against whom the direction is given, the instruction is proper, unless the circumstances of the case indicate that upon another trial the evidence may be materially different, in which case the facts should be submitted to the jury in order that a new trial may be had. But in either case the decision of the court below will be sustained, unless the appellate court can clearly see that its conclusion is wrong upon the facts."

Again, in Jacobson v. Northwestern Pac. R. R. Co., 175 Cal. 468, 166 Pac. 3, the court said, quoting from the Estate of Baldwin, 162 Cal. 471, 123 Pac. 267:

> "To warrant a court in directing a verdict, it is not necessary that there should be an absence of conflict in the evidence, but, to deprive the court of the right to exercise this power, if there be a conflict, it must be a substantial one."

See, also, Diamond v. Weyerhaeuser, 178 Cal. 540, 174 Pac. 38; Davis v. Cal. St. C. R. R. Co., 105 Cal. 131, 38 Pac. 647; Stephenson v. Southern Pac. Co., 102 Cal. 143, 34 Pac. 618, 36 Pac. 407; Kalish v. White, 36 Cal. App. 604, 173 Pac. 494.

No conditions are indicated, from all that is disclosed by the record before us, that upon another trial the evidence would be different.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; SHAW, J.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. The petition for a rehearing of this cause in the Supreme Court is denied.

[3] We deem it proper to say that, upon looking into the evidence in the record, we are of the opinion that the direction to the jury to return a verdict for the defendant was warranted, on the ground that the negligence of the decedent, Nathan Finkle, was a proximate cause of the collision with the defendant's automobile. It occurred after dark on a public street; the headlights of the automobile were lighted, and would have been plainly visible to him, if he had looked. The automobile was going at a speed not exceeding 15 miles an hour. He was crossing the street at the time, and it was a part of his duty to use such reasonable ordinary care as the conditions demanded to see passing vehicles and avoid colliding with them. Niosi v. Empire Steam Laundry, 117 Cal. 260, 49 Pac. 185; Scott v. San B., etc., Co., 152 Cal. 610, 93 Pac. 677. A failure by him to exercise such ordinary care would be negligence on his part. The only evidence on the subject shows that the headlight was in good order, and that it was clearly visible at a considerable distance. It follows, therefore, that he either failed to take the trouble to look for automobiles on that side of the street as he crossed, or that he saw the automobile and carelessly walked in front of it. There was evidence that he was carrying a box of raisins 23 inches long, 13 inches wide, and 10 inches thick on his shoulder, in such a position that it may have obscured his vision. If that was the case, then it was negligence for him to attempt to cross the street with his vision obstructed in that manner. Hence, under either theory as to his conduct, he failed to use due care, and that failure was one of the proximate causes, if not the only one, of his injury and death.

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 15, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 9, 1922.)

Exchange of property ⇨8(1)—Judgment on rescission of exchange in alternative.

In an action for rescission of contract for exchange of property on the ground of fraud of defendant, judgment may be in the alternative, either for a reconveyance of the property or for the payment of money; as, where the return of the property might not be effectual or adequate to restore possession in the same condition in which it was obtained, a writ of assistance is not an exclusive remedy.

Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; W. T. O'Donnell, Judge.

Action by Seraphim Marks and another against Alfred Howkins and others. From an order of execution on judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

James Carter, of Oakland, and Elston, Clark & Nichols, of Berkeley, for appellants.
W. E. Rode, of Oakland, for respondents.

HART, J. This action was brought by the plaintiffs for the purpose of securing a decree rescinding a certain transaction involving a contract in writing, whereby the plaintiff Seraphim Marks and the defendant Alfred Howkins mutually agreed to exchange certain real properties of which they were the respective owners, and also certain deeds of conveyance passing between the parties under the terms of said agreement. The agreement was entered into on the 13th day of June, 1919. The property of the plaintiffs involved in the agreement consists of a house and two lots situated in Emeryville, Alameda county, and of the value of $2,500, and the property of the defendant is situated in Solano county, and consists of 106 acres of agricultural land, with improvements thereon, and of the alleged value of $17,000. The agreement was that the defendants would exchange their property for that of the plaintiffs upon the payment by the latter in addition to the conveyance of their property to the defendants, of the sum of $14,500, of which $1,000 was to be paid in cash and the balance, $13,500, to "be paid at any time that the party of the second part (plaintiff Seraphim Marks) desires to pay it in full." At the time of the execution of said agreement the plaintiff Seraphim Marks paid to the defendants $50 of the $1,000 which was to be paid in cash upon the execution of said agreement.

The amended complaint alleges and the court found that an exchange of the properties was consummated by the execution of deeds of conveyance by the respective parties; that thereupon the plaintiffs paid to the defendants the balance of the sum of $1,000, which was to be the cash payment on the transaction, and assumed the payment of the sum of $5,600, which was secured by a certain trust deed to the lands of the defendants, and gave their note for the balance and a trust deed to the Solano county property to secure the same. The said complaint further alleges and the court found that the plaintiffs were induced to enter into said contract and to consummate the same by certain false representations which are specifically set out in the complaint. These alleged false representations pertain to the quality and productivity and value of the land of the defendants. It is alleged and found that the defendants falsely represented to the plaintiffs that the land of the former and the improvements thereon were of the value of $17,000, but the court found that said land and improvements were of value not to exceed $7,500 or thereabouts. It is further alleged and also found that at the time of the execution of the agreement for the exchange of their properties the defendants assured the plaintiffs that they could procure an extension of the time for the payment of the $5,600 secured by the trust deed on the lands of defendants; that the defendants after the contract was made failed, neglected, and refused to procure the extension of time for the payment of said money and "by reason thereof the consideration for the consummation of said agreement as to plaintiffs has failed, and that said plaintiffs would not have entered into said agreement or the consummation thereof but for the agreement of said defendants to procure such extension"; that after discovering that the defendants had made the false representations regarding the productive capacity and value of their land, and discovering the defendants had failed and refused to procure an extension of the time at which the note secured by the trust deed should be paid, the plaintiffs immediately rescinded said contract and "then and there tendered to said defendants Howkins a deed and bill of sale executed and acknowledged by plaintiffs, reconveying to said defendants said 106 acres of land and said personal property, and also tendered said defendants possession of said land and personal property, and tendered them everything else of value received by plaintiffs under said contract, or under said consummation thereof, and made said tender on condition that said defendants should reconvey to plaintiffs said Alameda county real property, and should repay to plaintiffs said sum of $1,000, and should pay plaintiffs the further sum of $100 for the value of work done and improvements made on said premises by said plaintiffs while so in possession of said Solano county property, * * * and should surrender said note and second deed of trust executed by plaintiff on said 106 acres, but said defendants Howkins then and there absolutely refused and rejected said demand, but made no objections whatsoever to said tender, or to any part thereof, or to the mode thereof; that plaintiffs then were, ever since have been, and now are ready, willing and able to restore to said defendants Howkins whatever of value plaintiffs, or either of them, received from defendants Howkins, or either of them, in said exchange." The complaint further alleges and the court found that subsequently to the date of the rescission of said agreement by the plaintiffs and in order to avoid the effect of the same, the defendants Howkins made a pretended sale and conveyance of said Alameda county property, but without consideration, to defendant H. H. Bayliss and with full knowledge on the part of said Bayliss that plaintiffs had rescinded said contract and said consummation thereof as aforesaid; that at all times herein mentioned the value of said Alameda county property was and is $2,500, and has at all times herein mentioned had a rental value of $25 per month and at all of said times the reasonable value of the use and occupation of said Alameda county property was and is the sum of $25 per month; that said defendants Alfred Howkins and Christine Volina Howkins, his wife, have been in the sole and exclusive possession of said Alameda county property ever since June 20, 1919, and are now in the possession thereof; that at all times herein mentioned said Alfred Howkins and Christine Volina Howkins were and are husband and wife. The prayer of the complaint is for a decree rescinding the contract and for the restoration of the real and personal property conveyed by the plaintiffs to the defendants and for the repayment of the sum of $1,000 which was paid in cash by the former to the latter and for such other relief as the complaint may warrant.

The defendants, answering, deny specifically each and every of the material allegations of the complaint and further allege that each of said plaintiffs, prior to the making of the contract for exchange of the properties, visited the land of the defendants and fully and thoroughly inspected the same, and also that they obtained and inspected the search of title of said land, which showed the boundaries thereof, and also that the same was subject to said deed of trust of $5,600.

The defendant Bayliss filed an answer to the original complaint and therein denied all the vital averments thereof, and it was stipulated at the trial that said answer to said original complaint should stand as an answer to the amended complaint.

The court concluded as a matter of law that the plaintiffs were entitled to a decree against said defendants rescinding and setting aside the agreement, and the consummation thereof, as the same were alleged in the complaint; that the plaintiffs were entitled to the return of the $1,000 cash payment made upon the execution of the transaction, with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from August 10, 1919, and for the sum of $90 as rental value of said Alameda county property for five months; that plaintiffs are entitled to a further decree against all of said defendants that plaintiffs are the owners of the Alameda county property, describing the same, free from all claims of said defendants or any of them; that the conveyance of said property by the defendants Howkins to the defendant Bayliss be set aside; that said defendants "do deliver possession of said premises in the same condition in which they were received by them from plaintiffs to said plaintiffs within 60 days after the entry of judgment herein, and in the event that said defendants do not, within such time, deliver up such possession of said property to plaintiffs, then plaintiffs are entitled, in lieu of the foregoing decree determining them to be the owners of said property in the town of Emeryville, Alameda county, to a further judgment against said defendants, Alfred Howkins and Christine Volina Howkins, in the sum of $2,500, the value of said property"; that defendants Alfred Howkins and Christine Volina Howkins are entitled to a decree that they are the owners of the Solano county property involved herein, together with certain agricultural implements and other personal property. It is further concluded as a matter of law that the plaintiffs are entitled to a lien upon the Solano county property to secure the payment of the judgment in their favor for the sum of $1,090 and interest, and to secure the further judgment of $2,500 against said defendants Alfred Howkins and Christine Volina Howkins, in the event that said defendants do not deliver the possession of said Emeryville (Alameda county) property to said plaintiffs, as above provided. The judgment was in accord with the findings and the conclusions of law, and, among other things, adjudges as follows:

> "It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed against said defendants Alfred Howkins and Christine Volina Howkins and H. H. Bayliss, that plaintiffs are the owners of said real property in the town of Emeryville, county of Alameda, state of California, described as follows, to wit" (describing said property), and "* * * that defendants, Alfred Howkins and Christine Volina Howkins, are the owners of that certain real property in the county of Solano, state of California, described as follows" (describing said property).

The decree then proceeds:

> "That said defendants do deliver possession of said real property last herein described (the Emeryville property) to plaintiffs within 60 days after the entry of judgment herein in the same condition in which said premises were received by said defendants from plaintiffs. It is further ordered, adjudged and decreed that in the event that said defendants do not deliver up such possession of said property to plaintiffs accordingly, then plaintiffs, in lieu of the foregoing decree determining them to be the owners of said real property, have a further judgment against said defendants Alfred Howkins and Christine Volina Howkins in the sum of $2,500, the value of said real property."

Upon the expiration of the 60 days within which the defendants were required by the judgment to deliver possession of the Alameda county property to the plaintiffs, the court made an order directing execution to issue, said order containing a recital of the provisions of the judgment, and further proceeding thus:

> "And it further appearing that said defendants did not at any time within sixty days after the entry of said judgment herein, or at all, deliver or tender possession of said real property to plaintiffs, and that plaintiffs' said judgment is unsatisfied in whole, and good cause appearing therefor,
> "It is ordered, adjudged and decreed that the Clerk of said court issue a writ of execution against said defendants Alfred Howkins and Christine Volina Howkins, in the sum of $1,000 and interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from August 10, 1919, and for the sum of $90 and $2,500 and $108.25 costs and interest on said sum from the date of entry of judgment herein."

The appeal is from the said order and is supported by the judgment roll alone.

A motion to dismiss the appeal is pending and urged here by the respondents; but, in view of the peculiar character of the decree, it is conceived preferable to consider the appeal upon its merits, from which, as the sequel hereof will show, the respondents will suffer no injury.

The principal objection to the order involves a complaint against the character of the decree entered herein, it being the contention of the appellants that the court was without the power to make an alternative judgment in this case. In other words, the position of the defendants is that the decree itself operated as a reconveyance of the Alameda county property to the plaintiffs and that all that was necessary to be done to carry out the terms of the decree was for the plaintiffs to sue out a writ of assistance and thus secure possession of the property.

It is admitted that an appeal was taken by the appellants here from the judgment, but that said appeal was dismissed by agreement of the parties. The judgment, thus becoming final, was, of course, conclusive upon the parties, and the attack here upon the same is collateral. Obviously the order appealed from cannot be disturbed unless we can say that the judgment is void upon its face. This we cannot say. We can conceive of no reason why a judgment, in a case of this character, may not legally be in the alternative; that is, that a party to an agreement for the exchange of properties, where said agreement is set aside on the ground of fraud upon the part of one of the parties thereto, may not be adjudged to be entitled either to a reconveyance of the property or to the payment to him by the other party of the value of said property as found by the court. There are cases (not, as to the facts, precisely this case, it is true) in which alternative judgments have been entered. Indeed, even the appellate courts have often rendered and entered a judgment in the alternative; that is, a judgment to the effect that the same will stand reversed or affirmed according to whether a party to the action complies with a certain condition contained therein. See Durkee v. Garvey, 84 Cal. 590, 24 Pac. 929; Messer v. Hibernia Savings & Loan Society, 149 Cal. 122, 84 Pac. 835; Armstrong v. Sacramento Valley Realty Co., 198 Pac. 217; Minneapolis Threshing Mach. Co. v. Currey, 75 Kan. 365, 89 Pac. 688; Murkowski v. Murkowski, 61 Wash. 103, 112 Pac. 92; Witham v. Walsh, 156 Mich. 582, 121 N. W. 309; Kornblum v. Arthurs, 154 Cal. 246, 249, 97 Pac. 420. What is said in Swan v. Talbot, 152 Cal. 142, 94 Pac. 238, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1066, as to the power and duty of a court of equity in an action to set aside a bill of sale of personal property is strikingly pertinent to the course pursued in this case, although there the property involved was personal and the property here involved is realty. We can, however, see no distinction, so far as the principle applicable is concerned, between the two cases. It must be assumed, and in truth presumed, since all intendments favorable to the support of the judgment must be indulged in the absence of a record of the evidence before this court, that there was substantial reason for the making of the judgment in this case in the alternative. Valid reasons for such a judgment in a case of this character may readily be conceived or conjectured. A court of equity possesses broad and extensive powers and may in a given case before it so frame its decree, within the issues, of course, as to adjust the equities of the case according to the just rights of the parties. It may be that the court had reason for concluding that the property conveyed to the defendants by the plaintiffs might, if possession thereof was not returned to the latter within 60 days, greatly depreciate in value; or, since no lis pendens was filed until September 27, 1919, almost a month after the institution of this action by the plaintiffs, it may be that prior to the filing of the lis pendens the defendants had leased or transferred the Emeryville property to an innocent lessor or purchaser for a valuable consideration and so were without ability to deliver possession thereof to the plaintiffs within the time required by the decree or at all. Certainly, in either of the supposititious cases, the plaintiffs would be entitled to be paid, in lieu of the delivery to them of the possession of the property, the value thereof at the time of the consummation of the agreement of exchange. Moreover, while the court was without authority to require the defendants to purchase the Emeryville property (as is the practical effect of enforcing the alternative provided by the decree) by way of a penalty, still since the transaction was, as we must assume, brought about by the fraud of the defendants, and, furthermore, since they refused to deliver to plaintiffs possession of the property within the time limit fixed by the decree, the former have no just ground for complaining against the terms of the judgment or of the order from which they have appealed.

No complications can follow from the fact that the decree is in the alternative or from the fact that the decree is lacking in certain particulars in specificness. As we have seen, the court adjudged that the Emeryville property was the property of the plaintiffs and that the Solano county property was the property of the defendants, and while it did not specifically decree a reconveyance, the adjudication that these properties belonged to the respective parties vested in them absolute title thereto, and all that was necessary to complete the rights of the parties under the decree was to effect a delivery of the possession of the properties, one to the other as the decree ordered. The court found, as also seen, that the plaintiffs, upon notifying defendants of the rescission of the transaction, tendered to the latter a deed conveying back to the defendants the Solano county property, and, of course, they are under the decree entitled to such reconveyance. The defendants still have the record title to the Alameda county property in them, and the rational and just interpretation of the judgment is that the absolute title thereto will remain in them upon the satisfaction of the judgment under and by virtue of the order of execution from which this appeal is prosecuted. Indeed, there could be no other interpretation given the judgment without working manifest injustice to the defendants.

As to the contention of the appellants that the plaintiffs are limited to the remedy by a writ of assistance to obtain possession of the property which they exchanged to the defendants, it is to be said that, while certainly they could have invoked that writ for the purpose stated, such writ is not always the exclusive remedy in such a case as this. Trope v. Kerns, 83 Cal. 553, 23 Pac. 691; Miller v. Bate, 56 Cal. 135. As above pointed out, the mere return of possession of the property to the plaintiffs might not have been effectual or adequate, since the defendants might not be able to restore possession of the property, if at all, in the same condition in which they obtained possession thereof as is required by the decree.

Our conclusion is that the order appealed from is impregnable against successful attack, and it is therefore affirmed.

JOSEPH HERSPRING CO. v. JONES. (Civ. 2361.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 13, 1921.)

1. Fraudulent conveyances ⚷150—No valid sale of automobile to corporation by its president, where there was no change in possession.

Where owner of personal property organized a corporation, was elected its president, and made no change whatever in the control of an automobile, which he claimed to have sold to the corporation, and made no transfer in the office of the state automobile department, he could not claim that his possession became that of the corporation, in view of Civ. Code, § 3440, relating to transfers.

2. Fraudulent conveyances ⚷132(3)—Notice to creditor held not substitute for delivery and change of possession.

On failure to comply with Civ. Code, § 3440 which requires an immediate delivery and continuous change of possession, the fact that one who is a creditor at the time of the attempted transfer may otherwise have notice of such transfer does not make it valid as to him.

Appeal from the Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by the Joseph Herspring Company against Ellis Jones. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Arthur C. Huston, of Woodland, and Robert H. Schwab, of Sacramento, for appellant.

Aaron Sapiro and Milton D. Sapiro, both of San Francisco, and Lawrence L. Levy, of New York City, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The action was brought to recover possession of an automobile seized by the sheriff of Sacramento county under a writ of execution issued against Joseph Herspring upon a judgment in favor of California Pear Growers' Association. Prior to August 19, 1919, Joseph Herspring was doing business under the name of Joseph Herspring & Co. On that day he organized a corporation under the same name composed of himself, his wife, and his brother, which continued the same business. On August 23, 1919, he executed a bill of sale purporting to transfer to plaintiff the title to said automobile. At that time said association had a claim against Herspring for goods sold and delivered, which was subsequently reduced to judgment, upon which said execution was issued. At the trial these facts were stipulated:

> "At the time of the execution of the bill of sale Joseph Herspring as an individual was the owner and in possession of the Paige car; that at that time the car was kept by Joseph Herspring in his garage, and that his garage was located at Joseph Herspring's residence; that ever since that time the car has been kept in Joseph Herspring's garage by him, and that since the time of the transfer he has continued to keep it in the same garage, and that since the time of the transfer he continued to drive it and use it for his own personal use; that since the time of the transfer he was the only one who drove the car; that at the time of the transfer—no transfer was made in the office of the state automobile department—there was no registration of any automobile under the name of Joseph Herspring Company; that at no time during the year 1919 was there any transfer made on the records of the motor vehicle department, nor was the transfer slip which is provided by the Motor Vehicle Act filled out, and in the year 1920 the registered owner of the car was Joseph Herspring."

[1] There is a controversy between the parties as to certain other facts, but the foregoing is sufficient to show that the case falls clearly within the provisions of section 3440 of the Civil Code. The stipulation shows that there was no delivery whatever of the automobile to the corporation and no change of possession. The stipulation that the automobile remained all the time in the possession of the vendor is, of course, entirely inconsistent with the theory that it was for a moment in the possession of any one else. It can make no difference that the vendor became the president of the corporation. The law cannot be evaded by a device like that. To hold that an owner of personal property may organize a corporation, have himself elected its president, make no change whatever in the actual custody or control of the property, and that it may then by virtue of these facts be successfully claimed that there was a delivery to the corporation and that his possession became its possession, would be to nullify the plain provisions of the statute and multiply the opportunities for fraud. The language of the law is clear and its purpose is manifest. As is well known to the profession this section has been considered in many decisions of the higher courts of the state, a few of which have been cited by counsel. It is not necessary to review these authorities, as they illustrate an admitted principle and present a somewhat different state of facts from the case before us.

We may add, however, two instructive decisions that may well invite consideration: McKee Stair Building Co. v. Martin, 126 Cal. 557, 58 Pac. 1044, and Sequeira v. Collins, 153 Cal. 426, 95 Pac. 876. In the former John McKee had been the owner of the property for years, but respondent corporation claimed to have succeeded to his title by virtue of a bill of sale. Appellant relied upon said section 3440 of the Civil Code. For nine years prior to said sale McKee had carried on the business of stair builder, and had used said personal property therein at a certain place in San Francisco. He also had in his employ in said business his three sons, one of whom, Thomas W., had been his foreman during this period. Annie McKee, the daughter, held as assignee of the mortgagee a chattel mortgage for $500 against the property. She was advised by an attorney to incorporate a company and purchase the property from her father, so as to get her money out of it. She then had the plaintiff corporation formed; the stockholders being herself, her father, her sister, and her said three brothers. After the alleged sale to the corporation the father and the three brothers continued down to the time of the levy of the execution to carry on the business with this same property, at the same place, and in the same way as before such sale, the son Thomas still acting as foreman; the only difference being that before the sale the "father went out and figured upon work, and made bids for it, and told the foreman what to do," but after the sale the foreman did this work and the father was under his orders receiving the sum of $50 per month. Prior to the sale the sign on the building where the business was carried on was: "John McKee, Stair Builder." After the sale the name "John McKee" was removed. After reciting the foregoing facts, the Supreme Court said:

> "It would seem from this evidence that there was no delivery of the property to the vendee, and that the possession of the personal property here in controversy, leaving out of consideration the business of the concern, remained after the sale in the same persons that it had previously rested in."

That case was stronger for the respondent than this for appellant, in that the father, after the purported sale, was subject to the orders of the foreman who "did the figuring and bidding and looked after the work and also acted as manager" while before the sale the father had been in complete control. Herein, Herspring continued to run the business in the same manner after as before the purported transfer. It is to be understood, also, that therein the finding of the lower court was in favor of the validity of the transfer while herein the trial court held that the attempted transfer was void as against creditors. The effect of the decision therein was therefore that only one rational inference could be drawn from the evidence, that is, the transfer was invalid; but herein if there is any ground for a reasonable inference that the attempted sale was invalid under said section 3440, the judgment must be affirmed. The fact is, however, that we are entirely satisfied that no other conclusion than the one reached would be supported by the evidence.

Some contention is made by appellant that respondent had notice of the sale and therefore the purpose of said statute was accomplished. The only evidence as to that is found in the transcript as follows:

> "Mr. Schwab: Mr. Sapiro, I want to ask you if it is not a fact that you have known that the corporation was in existence, known that Joseph Herspring individually transferred to the corporation all this property at the time of the meeting in San Francisco, at which you were not present, at which Mr. Downey was present—
> "Mr. Sapiro: All I know—
> "Mr. Schwab: That the Pear Growers' Association had known of this situation all during this time.
> "Mr. Sapiro: I cannot say it is a fact.
> "Mr. Schwab: I will have to produce Mr. Downey, then.
> "Mr. Schwab: Q. Is not that the fact, Mr. Herspring? A. That is a fact."

It is apparent that Mr. Herspring's statement is a mere conclusion but, at any rate, the matter is entirely immaterial.

[2] The purpose of the statute and the terms of the statute are two distinct considerations. The main reason for requiring an immediate delivery and a continuous change of possession may be to give notice to creditors, but the fact that one who is a creditor at the time of the attempted transfer may otherwise have notice of such transfer does not make it valid as to him when there is no such delivery and change of possession. In the case of one becoming a creditor after such notice the consideration might have some bearing upon the question of estoppel or of good faith, but it is of no significance herein.

Respondent claims that the judgment should be affirmed upon two other grounds, but we see no necessity for discussing them.

The judgment is affirmed.

ANDRESON CO. v. LOS ANGELES COUNTY.
(Civ. 3735.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Dec. 9, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 6, 1922.)

Taxation ⚷709(3)—Amount to represent tax which might have been chargeable against property for years after date of tax deed to state may be included in computing redemption charges.

Under Pol. Code, § 3817, providing for redemption of land sold to state for delinquent taxes and not disposed of by state by payment, in addition to other amounts, of "unpaid taxes of every description assessed against the property for each year since the sale; or, if not so assessed, then upon the value of the property as assessed in the year nearest the time of such redemption," and in view of sections 3771 et seq., 3785, 3813, 3817, and 3897, an amount to represent a tax which might have been chargeable against the property for the years subsequent to the date of the deed to the state may be included in computing redemption charges.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Action by the Andreson Company, a corporation, against the County of Los Angeles. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. D. Laughlin and George W. Crouch, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

A. J. Hill, Co. Counsel, and Gordon Boller, Deputy Co. Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. This action was brought by the plaintiff to recover money which it alleged had been paid to the county of Los Angeles on account of redemption charges affecting a tax sale made against the property of plaintiff. A general demurrer interposed to the complaint was sustained and judgment followed in favor of the defendant, from which judgment plaintiff has appealed.

The single question is presented as to whether, in computing redemption charges against a property owner, any amount to represent a tax which might have been chargeable against the property for the years subsequent to the date of the deed to the state may be included. Section 3817, Political Code, requires a redemptioner, in addition to other amounts, to pay—

> "unpaid taxes of every description assessed against the property for each year since the sale; or, if not so assessed, then upon the value of the property as assessed in the year nearest the time of such redemption, with interest from the first day of July following each of said years, respectively at the same rate, to the time of redemption."

After property has been sold to the state agreeable to the provisions of section 3771 et seq., Political Code, the redemption period commences to run, and, if at the expiration of five years from the date of sale no redemption is made, it is provided that a deed shall be made to the state. Section 3785. Upon such a deed being made, the state may proceed to sell the property to a private purchaser and may, at such sale, convey the whole fee. However, until the state is divested of title in such manner the original owner may still redeem by paying the required sums of money specified in section 3817. During the period of five years succeeding the date of sale, and until the state has conveyed to it the legal title, the land is to be assessed. Section 3813, Political Code, provides that the land "shall be assessed each subsequent year for taxes until a deed is made to the state therefor in the same manner as if it had not been so purchased." Hence it appears that, after the state obtains title to the land, subject only to the privilege given the original owner to redeem, the property is not to be assessed.

Appellant argues that in the statement of tax charges to be paid upon redemption, which we have quoted, it is not the intention of the Legislature to require the redeeming owner to pay any amount in lieu of taxes except for the years subsequent to the date of the sale and prior to the issuance of a deed to the state. It is argued that the use of the word "taxes" refers to the taxes provided to be assessed for years prior to the date of the deed and that the next phrase in the statute, "if not so assessed," refers to those same years wherever there may be an omission to assess. Reference is made to other conditions affecting lands of special character, which we do not think add to the force of the argument, and we do not agree with appellant that the statute should be construed according to its view. The provisions of section 3817 furnish the only measure for computation of the charges which the redemptioner must pay, whether he redeem before or after deed has passed to the state. In our opinion, it was the intention of the legislators to require of a redeeming owner, as a condition that title to his property be restored to him, that he pay an amount to be computed as indicated to represent a tax charge for each year during which he has been in default. During the running of the five years subsequent to the date of sale the amount is ascertained easily by reference to the assessment list which is required to be made. When title has been passed to the state by deed there is good reason for the provision that there shall be no further assessment made by the state or its agencies against its own property. Section 3817 provides a mode by which charges in lieu of taxes assessed may be computed for the year subsequent to the date of the deed. The property owner who has allowed his property to be sold to the state and has allowed the period of five years fixed for redemption to pass, and a deed to be made, possesses no longer any rights in that property, except such as the statute may permit him to exercise. And it is undoubtedly competent for the Legislature to fix the precise terms upon which the owner may be entitled to have his property restored to him. No valid objection can be urged against such a statute because those terms may be onerous, or the penalties required to be paid be large in amount. Even though such objections were valid, they could not be urged against the statute here considered, which only designs to exact from the redemptioner an amount equivalent to the taxes which he would have paid had he not allowed delinquent sale to be made and his title thus divested, with interest.

The argument is also used that it could not have been the intention of the Legislature to require the making of these payments, because there is exacted less from a purchaser who bids at a sale of the property where the state proposes to dispose of the same after receiving its deed. For reasons which have already been indicated, we think there is no ground for comparing the requirement of the redemptioner with that which is imposed upon an individual purchasing at a state sale. It is true that such a proposed purchaser is not required to bid an amount sufficient to cover any equivalent of taxes not assessed subsequent to the date of the state's deed. He is, however, required to bid not less than the amount of all charges, penalties, and taxes assessed up to the date of the deed to the state, and other expenses subsequently accruing. Section 3897, Pol. Code. The provisions expressed in that section determine merely the minimum amount which the state is authorized to accept in exchange for the property. It may accept a lesser amount only if the board of supervisors determines that the value of the property is not great enough to cover the charges enumerated. Under appellant's argument the property owner might, after any number of years had elapsed subsequent to the date of the deed to the state (assuming that the state had not disposed of its title in the meantime), effect a redemption of his property and escape making payment of any amount as an equivalent of taxes which would have been assessed against him had he not defaulted and tax sale proceedings intervened. We think that the statute does not admit of the construction contended for.

The judgment is affirmed.

PACIFIC GAS & ELECTRIC CO. v. DEVLIN et al. (S. F. 9824.)

1. Waters and water courses 🔑183(5)—Matters to be considered by Railroad Commission in fixing value of water system taken over by city.

In a proceeding before the Railroad Commission by a city to take over a water plant, under Public Utilities Act, § 47, as amended by St. 1917, p. 261, the water company is entitled to a finding for the just value of its plant as of the date of the filing of the application by the city, which was the actual or fair market value in its then condition, and such commission must consider every element of the plant actually required for the distribution of water to the city on such date, and which entered into the cost of its construction, and also resort to reasonable and recognized measures of value to each constituent element of value.

2. Constitutional law 🔑280—Eminent domain 🔑69—Waters and water courses 🔑182—Municipality taking over water plant without proper appraisal unconstitutional.

If any constituent element of value was omitted in appraising a water plant to be taken over by a city, or any illegitimate measure of value was applied, to that extent the water company would be deprived of its property without compensation or due process of law.

3. Waters and water courses 🔑183(5)—Presumed that items were not ignored by Railroad Commission in determining value of water system taken over by city.

On certiorari to review an order of the Railroad Commission, in a hearing under Public Utilities Act, § 47, as amended by St. 1917, p. 261, on application by city desiring to take over a water system, it will be presumed that the commission, in making a finding as to value in a lump sum, considered every proper item, although the amount determined as the value equaled the estimate of its engineer which ignored certain necessary items, and that it reached the same result by incorporating valuations at different prices, and on other elements of the system gathered from the estimates of other engineers, the general finding of the commission not being open to attack for insufficiency, if supported by any reasonable construction of the evidence.

4. Waters and water courses 🔑183(5)—Railroad Commission may accept report of own engineer as to value of water system taken over by city.

In a proceeding by a city to acquire a water system, the Railroad Commission, on a hearing under Public Utilities Act, § 47, as amended by St. 1917, p. 261, can call a witness, even against the will of the owner of the utility, on the subject of the value of the property, and may accept as true the report of its own engineer, unless he has omitted some material element of valuation, or introduced some erroneous measure of appraisement.

5. Waters and water courses 🔑183(5)—Burden on water company to show affirmative error in decision of Railroad Commission, valuing property taken over by city.

On certiorari by water company to review a decision of the Railroad Commission in a hearing under Public Utilities Act, § 47, as amended by St. 1917, p. 261, fixing the value of a water system taken over by a city, it is not enough that the record does not affirmatively show that certain items of property were properly accounted for, but the water company must affirmatively and satisfactorily show that such items were not included.

6. Waters and water courses 🔑183(5)—Report of engineer, considered as evidence in fixing value of water system, need not use uniform classification of Railroad Commission.

Estimate and report of engineer of the Railroad Commission in a hearing under Public Utilities Act, § 47, as amended by St. 1917, p. 261, to determine the value of a water system taken over by a city, need not comply with a rule of the commission as established in its "Uniform Classification of Accounts for Water Corporation," in order to be considered as evidence by the commission, as it is privileged to get out of the estimates whatever he may have put into them, under whatever classification he may have used.

7. Waters and water courses 🔑183(5)—"Straight-line method" and "sinking-fund method," in estimating deterioration, distinguished.

The "straight-line method" in estimating deterioration in a plant consists in calculating from examination and experience in like constructions the total life period of the constituent parts of the plant, and then deducting from their value that proportion of decrease represented by the ratio of the years which it has been in use in relation to the entire life period, while the "sinking-fund method" consists in charging for depreciation an annual sum, which, with compounding interest thereon, will at the termination of the estimated life of the investment replace the original cost, and if cut off at any given period the accumulation will represent the depreciated value to that date.

8. Waters and water courses 🔑183(5)—No error in using straight-line method in estimating deterioration.

In a hearing before the Railroad Commission under Public Utilities Act, § 47, as amended by St. 1917, p. 261, to determine the value of a water system taken over by a city, held, that it could not be said that the commission erred in using the straight-line method, and not the sinking-fund method, in estimating deterioration.

9. Waters and water courses 🔑183(5)—Error of Railroad Commission in not allowing for going concern value held not shown.

In a proceeding by a city to acquire a water system, a finding of value of the system by the Railroad Commission in a hearing pursuant to Public Utilities Act, § 47, as amended by St. 1917, p. 261, held not shown to be erroneous, in that the city made no allowance for going concern value.

Application by the Pacific Gas & Electric Company for certiorari to review an order of Frank R. Devlin and others, as members of and constituting the Railroad Commission. Order affirmed.

Charles P. Cutten and R. W. Du Val, both of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Hugh Gordon, of Los Angeles, and Wm. W. Clary, of San Francisco, for respondents.

F. P. Tuttle, of Oakland, and F. P. Tuttle, Jr., of Auburn, for city of Auburn.

SLOANE, J. This is a proceeding to review a ruling of the Railroad Commission of the state of California, fixing the amount of compensation to be paid to the petitioner, Pacific Gas & Electric Company, by the city of Auburn, a municipal corporation, in Placer county, Cal., for a water plant consisting of reservoir and distributing system, owned and operated in said city by the petitioner.

The hearing before the Railroad Commission was had pursuant to the provisions of section 47 of the Public Utilities Act (St. 1915, p. 139, as amended by St. 1917, p. 261). The only questions raised are as to whether or not the commission in arriving at its valuation of the water property regularly pursued its authority under the act, and granted to the petitioner its constitutional right to just compensation.

The decision complained of followed a hearing on the application of the city of Auburn filed on the 10th of May, 1918. After hearings the commission on September 27, 1920, announced and filed its opinion, findings of fact, and decision in which it determined the "just compensation to be paid by the city of Auburn to Pacific Gas & Electric Company for its public utility water system supplying water to consumers in said city * * * in the sum of $52,000." It is recited in the opinion that the valuation was reached upon hearings had at which all interested parties were given an opportunity to appear and be heard and in which appraisals were filed by engineers representing the city of Auburn, the Pacific Gas & Electric Company, and the Railroad Commission. It is further stated in the opinion as follows:

> "Two appraisals were filed by the engineers for the commission; one based upon prices of labor and material prevailing during the five-year period from 1913 to 1917, inclusive; the second appraisal being based upon prices prevailing during a six-month construction period ending May 10, 1918, the date of the filing of the application. Thus the principles heretofore established have been adhered to; i. e., the date of the valuation is as of the date of the filing of the application, and prices of labor and material prevailing over a reasonable construction period prior to the date of the appraisal have been used in estimating unit costs. All factors relating to the condition of the properties in question were taken into consideration in arriving at an estimate of reproduction cost less depreciation.
> "Inasmuch as it was stipulated at the hearing in this matter that the Commission might add to its findings of value the value of any additions, betterments and improvements of the system which were made a part of the system subsequent to May 10, 1918, the date as of which the valuation was submitted, in accordance therewith the net expenditures of the company for betterments and improvements during the period May 10, 1918, to April 30, 1920, are included in the findings herein."

Upon an application for rehearing demanded by the petitioner on the alleged ground, among others, that contrary to the requirements of subdivision 4 of section 47 of the act, the valuation was fixed as of the date April 30, 1920, instead of May 10, 1918, the date of the filing of the original application of the city of Auburn, and without the taking of further testimony, the commission on March 31, 1921, made its amended findings and order, in which it fixed the valuation of the plant as of May 10, 1918, at the same figure as in the original order, namely, $52,000. The amended decision contains the following recital:

> "Inasmuch as technical objection has been made to this course of procedure, it appears that a finding of just compensation should be made as of May 10, 1918, the date of filing of the original application, and after a careful consideration of all of the elements pertinent to a final conclusion herein, and all of the items going to make up the value of the properties sought to be acquired by the city of Auburn in this proceeding, including all matters presented in the application for rehearing, it appears that the just compensation to be paid by city of Auburn to Pacific Gas & Electric Company for said properties is the sum of $52,000, and that the application for rehearing should be denied."

We do not understand that petitioner is relying upon the objection that the commission exceeded its jurisdiction in amending its decision, but rests upon the contention that in the matter of allowing compensation the commission did not "regularly pursue its authority," or protect the petitioner in its constitutional guaranties, by fixing a "just compensation." It is not questioned that both parties to the proceeding before the commission were allowed full scope in the introduction of evidence, and no objections are made as to either the introduction or exclusion of evidence.

Petitioner's case is presented under the following heads:

> "(1) The commission found that the estimated reproduction cost new of the Auburn City Reservoir, on May 10, 1918, amounted to the sum of $10,822 (Commission Ex. No. 2, p. 8), whereas the evidence shows the reproduction cost new to be $11,131.75.
> "(2) The commission failed and refused to find or allow any value or compensation for 68 fire hydrant connections, in the face of uncontradicted evidence of a reproduction cost of said property of $367.36.

"(3) The commission failed and refused to find or allow any value, or compensation, for the preliminary and organization expenses, in the face of uncontradicted evidence of a cost or value of $5,150.

"(4) The commission adopted and employed the theoretical 'straight line method' of depreciation in determining the depreciated value of petitioner's depreciable property in the face of undisputed evidence that a depreciated value arrived at in this manner bore no relationship to the actual depreciated value of the physical properties, nor the amount of depreciation that had actually accrued.

"(5) The commission found that the depreciated value of petitioner's entire physical properties and lands, as of May 10, 1918, amounted to $51,063 in the face of undisputed evidence that the depreciated value of said properties and lands determined from a consideration of the actual physical condition of the properties, as evidenced by inspection, and the use of the tables adopted by the Railroad Commission for the identical properties, was the sum of $75,736.

"(6) The commission failed and refused to find or allow any value in excess of the sum of $937 for petitioner's business or going concern in the face of evidence presented by petitioner of a special value, in addition to the value of the tangible properties, of $12,500 and in the face of evidence presented by the city of Auburn of a going concern value of $3,000."

[1, 2] It may be at once conceded that petitioner in this proceeding before the Railroad Commission was entitled to a finding for the just value of its water plant as of the date of the filing of the application by the city of Auburn, and that a just value was the actual or fair market value of the property in its then condition; that to arrive at such valuation it was the duty of the Railroad Commission to take into account every element of the plant which was actually used and reasonably required for the storage and distribution of water to the city of Auburn and its inhabitants, on May 10, 1918, and which entered into and remained a part of the cost of its construction; and also to resort to and apply reasonable and recognized measures of value to each constituent element going to make up such water system. And it follows that, if in such appraisement any constituent element of value was omitted, or any illegitimate measure of value applied, to that extent petitioner would be deprived of his property without compensation, or due process of law, and by a process in excess of the jurisdiction of the Railroad Commission.

Returning to petitioner's specifications, it may be said generally that there is nothing in the record to show that the commission did not regularly pursue its authority, or that its decision was not supported by the evidence.

The only finding provided for on such a hearing, as declared in subdivision 4 of section 47 of the act, is that—

> "When the proceeding has been submitted, the commission shall make and file its written finding fixing, in a single sum, the just compensation to be paid by the political subdivision for said lands, property and rights, or said part or portion thereof: provided, that if the commission finds that severance damages should be paid, the just compensation for such damages shall be found and stated separately."

There was no finding for severance damages, and it does not appear that any was demanded. The commission made its findings in a single sum to include the valuation of the entire plant. It is not disputed that competent evidence covering every element of value claimed by petitioner was introduced and argued before the commission. Its finding was in a lump sum for $52,000. How can it be said that any constituent element going to make up the market value of the property was left out of the appraisement or improperly measured? The record shows and the opinion of the commission recites that:

> "The city's appraisal was based upon prices of labor and material prevailing during the six-year period from 1911 to 1916, inclusive. The appraisal presented by the Pacific Gas & Electric Company was based upon prices of labor and material prevailing on May 10, 1918, the date of filing the application herein. The Engineering Department of the Railroad Commission made extensive field investigation of the water system in question, and based its appraisals upon the data thus secured and from an inspection of the company's records."

The various engineers testified fully in support of their separate estimates. There was considerable variance in these estimates. That of the engineer for the city of Auburn aggregated a present value of $28,838, that of the engineer for the commission aggregated $51,063, and that of petitioner's engineer aggregated the sum of $86,236. Each estimate was made on a basis of the cost of reproduction, less the accrued depreciation. Between the valuations testified to under the lowest and highest estimates there was room to include every item claimed by petitioner within the valuation of $52,000 adopted by the commission.

Petitioner, however, contends that the commission adopted in toto the estimates of its own engineer, which aggregated $51,063, and that such estimates entirely omitted the item of preliminary organization and administration expenses incident to constructing such a water system, and but partially covered outlays in the production of the plant.

[3] If the record discloses that the commission acted solely on the data contained in the schedule of its engineer, and that this failed to incorporate some of the elements of proper valuation disclosed by other competent evidence, the decision of the commission should be set aside. It does not follow, however, from the fact that the total valuation found by the commission is closely identified with the estimate of its engineer, that the commission followed in detail the schedule of items and values set out in such estimate. It may have reached the same result by incorporating valuations at different prices, and on other elements of the system, gathered from the estimates of the other engineers. Union Hollywood Water Co. v. City of Los Angeles, 195 Pac. 55. The law will presume that such was the fact, rather than indulge the inference that matters presented and supported by competent evidence were ignored.

It may be true that the analysis of the items and figures of the report of the commission's engineer would be persuasive evidence in support of petitioner's contention on a trial, but they are not sufficient to impeach a judgment. This general finding of the commission is like the general verdict of a jury, not open to attack for insufficiency if supported by any reasonable construction of the evidence. It is doubly fortified in this respect, as the Public Utilities Act in the section authorizing the procedure here under review expressly provides that—

> "The finding of the commission [as to just compensation] shall be final and shall not be subject to modification, alteration, reversal or review by any court of this state."

This is subject, of course, to the qualification that the commission must have regularly pursued its authority, and have acted upon competent evidence, and as corollary to this, that it has not ignored or failed to consider any competent evidence; but any ground of attack upon the regularity of its proceedings must be clearly established. If the decision is regular on the face of the record it will be supported by every presumption that follows a judgment of a court of record. Clemmons v. R. R. Commission, 173 Cal. 254, 159 Pac. 713; Marin Water Co. v. R. R. Commission, 171 Cal. 706, 154 Pac. 864, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 114; Pac. Telephone & Telegraph Co. v. Eshleman, 166 Cal. 640, 137 Pac. 1119, 50 L. R. A. (N. S.) 652, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 822. "An appellate court will not interfere with the report of commissioners [in the assessment of damages to correct the amounts reported] except in case of gross error showing prejudice, corruption, or plain mistake." Shoemaker v. U. S., 147 U. S. 282, 13 Sup. Ct. 361, 37 L. Ed. 170.

[4] Even if, however, as petitioner claims, the commission adopted and followed the estimates and evidence of its own engineer, its decision is not necessarily open to attack on that account. The commission engineer was a competent witness, he had made a special investigation of the water system under consideration, and the Public Utilities Act makes provision that upon such hearing "evidence may be presented by the political subdivision, by each owner as claimant named in the petition, and by the commission," and the commission has authority to call a witness at its own instance and even against the will of the owner of the utility, on the subject of the value of the property. Marin Water & Power Co. v. R. R. Commission, supra. Unless, then, its engineer omitted some material element of valuation or introduced some erroneous measure of appraisement into his report and testimony, the Railroad Commission had a right to accept such evidence as the basis of its finding, to the exclusion of other evidence that it may have considered less satisfactory.

Petitioner claims, first, that, in appraising the reproduction cost of the Auburn city reservoir, the estimate of $10,822 of the commission's engineer was but tentative, whereas other undisputed evidence fixed the reproduction cost at $11,131.75. The variance in these valuations arose from a difference in the estimates of the yardage of excavation under the embankments of the reservoir, or stripping of the surface soil, in preparing a foundation for the embankments.

No actual inspection or measurement could be made. The estimates of all the witnesses were largely a matter of deduction and opinion. Mr. Givan, the engineer of the city of Auburn, testified that after as complete an investigation as he could make he could find no evidence of any such stripping excavation, and gave reasons why he thought it was not there. Mr. Ryan, the engineer for petitioner, estimated the excavation at 3,350 cubic yards, allowing 15 feet of stripping under the embankments. Mr. Faude, the commission's engineer, estimated 3,200 cubic yards, with an allowance of 8 feet of stripping. He testified that on account of the other engineers not being able to agree on yardage of reservoir he adopted 3,200 cubic yards as tentative, that he did not do this altogether as adopting the medium between the other estimates, but that he made some computations, not accepting the quantities of either side. If the commission had adopted the conclusion reached by Mr. Givan and made no allowance at all for the stripping excavation, we do not see how its finding could be impeached.

The next specification by petitioner is the alleged failure to include in the valuation 68 fire-hydrant connections of the value of $367.67. This item was included in Engineer Ryan's estimates, but not in those of either Engineer Givan or Engineer Faude, at least not specifically. There are two elements of uncertainty as to the legitimacy of this claim. One is that there was some ground for inference that the city had previously paid for these connections when the hydrants were installed, the hydrants having been paid for by the city; the other is the contention of respondent that allowance of the amount due, if any, on this item, may have been included as an allowance for contingencies in Engineer Faude's estimate for overhead costs.

[5] In any event, it does not sufficiently appear that petitioner has in this particular been denied any just compensation. It is not enough that the record does not affirmatively show that this item is properly accounted for. It must, in order to avoid the decision, be affirmatively and satisfactorily shown that it is not included.

It is conceded that if the petitioner corporation owns these hydrant connections it is entitled to have their value computed in the commission's valuation, irrespective of who paid for them.

A more important contention of petitioner is that under Engineer Faude's estimate no allowance was made for preliminary and organization expenses, which appear upon Engineer Ryan's estimate as supported by the evidence, in the sum of $5,150. It is conceded by respondents that the reasonable cost of such preliminary work of preparing for the construction of such a water system is a proper charge in estimating its reconstruction value. No specific allowance is made for this cost in the report of Engineer Faude for the commission. Such report, however, contains an estimate under the caption of overhead expense, for administration, engineering, interest, and incidentals. If there is room for reasonable allowance on this claim for preliminary expenses in this overhead estimate—and there appears to be—it will be presumed in support of the finding of the commission that it was so included.

[6] Petitioner argues that such a method of classification is contrary to the rule of the commission as established in its "Uniform Classification of Accounts for Water Corporation," and quotes from such classification that organization charges shall be charged to "intangible capital." It must be remembered, however, that this estimate and report of the engineer is not a finding of the commission, but evidence that was before it, and in construing his report it was privileged to get out of his estimates whatever he may have put into them under whatever classification he may have used. It is claimed by respondents that it is customary practice to include preliminary organization costs as overhead expenses in such estimates as this, citing Des Moines Gas Co. v. Des Moines, 238 U. S. 153, 35 Sup. Ct. 811, 59 L. Ed. 1244, where the master in chancery who heard the case says that time and money expended in the promotion of the enterprise, the organization of the company, legal expenses, preparing plans and specifications, etc., are properly termed "overhead charges."

[7, 8] The most urgent objection to the valuation of property arrived at in this proceeding is on the alleged ground that the commission resorted to an unfair and unauthorized method of fixing the amount of depreciation in the value of this water system. As has been stated, the value as of the date of May 10, 1918, was reached by all of the engineers by estimating the cost of reproduction of the plant and deducting from the amount the deterioration in value suffered during the life of the system up to such date. Engineers Faude and Givan, in their estimates, used what is known as the straight-line method, while Engineer Ryan, for the petitioner, used what is known as the sinking fund method in estimating deterioration. The straight-line method consists in calculating from examination and experience in like constructions the total life period of the constituent parts of the plant, and then deducting from their value that proportion of decrease represented by the ratio of the years it has been in use in relation to the entire life period. For example, if the estimated life is 50 years and 25 years of that time has elapsed, it is assumed that the value has depreciated 50 per cent. The sinking fund method is more complicated and consists, as we understand it, in charging for depreciation an annual sum which with compounding interest thereon will at the termination of the estimated life of the investment replace the original cost, and if cut off at any given period the accumulation will represent the depreciated value to that date.

It is not important, however, in this instance to determine just how the results are attained, as it seems to be conceded that the amount that would be allowed for depreciation in the present case is less by the sinking fund than by the straight-line method, and it is claimed that the commission has erroneously followed the straight-line method, in its appraisement under consideration, to petitioner's prejudice.

Assuming that the Railroad Commission reached its conclusions by the straight-line method, which assumption rests in turn upon the claim that the commission followed the method of its own engineer rather than that of petitioner's engineer in this respect, which is not clear from the record, was it an error in the exercise of its jurisdiction? The law has not settled the question, and the expert witnesses seem to disagree. Two of the engineers used the straight-line method, and supported their actions by their expert opinion that the method was proper and fair. Counsel for petitioner cites instances from other investigations of public utility values where the commission adopted the sinking fund method, and quote from an opinion of Commissioner Thelen, in the matter of the application of the City of Palo Alto, etc., 11 C. R. C. R. 209, which was a proceeding under section 47 of the Public Utilities Act, as follows:

> "I have been much impressed by the gas company's argument that in view of the fact that in a rate case the depreciation annuity in this state must be estimated on the sinking fund basis (section 49, Public Utilities Act; Town of Antioch v. Pacific Gas & Electric Company, vol. 5, Opinion and Orders of the Railroad Commission of California, pp. 19, 39, 40), the same basis should be applied, in depreciating the property, in an eminent domain proceeding. While not intending to lay down any rule which must be uniformly followed hereafter by this commission, I have given due weight to the gas company's contention on this point."

It will be noticed that the learned commissioner does not attempt to announce any rule of law or established method of engineering computation as governing this method of determining depreciated value, and it is not apparent whether the use of one or the other of these recognized methods should be governed by physical conditions of the public utility which the evidence in the particular case might develop.

It is obvious that this matter of depreciation, particularly in a property which is mostly underground and not open to careful inspection, must be largely a matter of estimate and speculation, based upon common observation and experience under similar conditions. It is a matter of approximation at the best, and to the lay mind it would appear that the straight-line method, based upon the proportionate part of the estimated life of the system which has expired rather than the sinking fund method or any of its modifications, is the appropriate basis for fixing depreciation for the purpose of determining present value of the utility.

A distinction may be drawn and has been frequently recognized between a rate-paying appraisement of a public utility and an appraisement of value to determine its worth in condemnation proceedings, in the application of one or the other of these methods of fixing the depreciation. In rate fixing the end sought is a reasonable return to the public utility for its use in the public service. Such reasonable return logically should be upon a basis that will pay a certain profit and replace the property at the end of its life. The sinking fund method is commonly used in such connection. In condemnation proceedings a different end is sought. Past costs or future replacements are only pertinent as a means to the end of determining present value in such proceedings.

If the actual physical condition could be determined by actual test and inspection, that, of course, would give the most satisfactory results; but, in the absence of such direct appraisement, the natural method would seem to be to ascertain from the life tables of such utilities and from such examination as can be made the prospective life of the commodity, and apportion the depreciation according to its age. The following California public utility cases are cited as upholding the straight-line method: Southern California Edison Co. Case, 11 C. R. C. D. 83; Marin Water & Power Company v. Railroad Comn., 6 C. R. C. D. 507, 520; Northern California Power Co. Case, 17 C. R. C. D. 98. Respondents also quote from the case of National Telephone Company, Ltd., v. Postmaster General, 16 A. T. & T. Co. Com. L. 491, Jan. 13, 1913; 2 Whitten's Valuation of Public Service Corporations, page 1112, as follows:

> "Two methods of depreciation have been put before us, and two different ways of regarding the life of the plant. The two methods have been described as the sinking fund method, which has been put forward by the company, and the straight-line method, which has been put forward by the Postmaster General.
> "The sinking fund method is based upon the effect of compound interest. * * * This seems to me to be purely a revenue question, and to have nothing to do directly with the value of the plant as between a vendor and a vendee. It was admitted by the very eminent witnesses called for the company upon this point that this method had never in their experience been applied as between a buyer and a seller. I admit this method will give you a perfectly correct arithmetical result, but it does not take into consideration those matters which properly affect the mind of a buyer. * * * I come to the conclusion, therefore, that the Postmaster General's method of depreciation, which is the ordinary straight-line method, is that which should be applied. In this method the value is reduced in the ratio which the age bears to the life of the plant."

[9] As to the final objection discussed by petitioner, the alleged failure of the commission to follow the evidence as to going concern value, it is conceded that some allowance was made on this claim. As has been said of all other segregated items, we find nothing in the record to determine what portion of the $52,000 appraisement was allotted to this claim under the general finding of the commission. Engineer Faude did not make any allowance for going concern value in his estimate, and under petitioner's theory that the $52,000 total allowed in the findings was made up of the items specified by Mr. Faude aggregating $51,063, and an additional amount of $937 thrown in for good measure, it is assumed, that the going concern value, if any, was confined to all or part of this latter amount. Conceding this to be the fact, the commission must necessarily have considered the matter, and reached a conclusion thereon. It cannot be said that there was no evidence to sustain this allowance, even if confined to the amount conceded.

It is true that Mr. Ryan, for the petitioner, estimated the going concern value at $13,500, and Mr. Givan estimated it at $3,000, but Mr. Faude made no allowance for this item, and stated in his testimony: "My investigations did not convince me there was very much going concern value there." It seems to have been conceded that the plant had not been on a profitable basis, and Mr. Ryan, in explaining his views in that particular, stated that he felt "that the company should not be at this time barred from any hope of ever realizing any going concern value by condemnation proceedings," and that "the effect of condemnation would be to deprive the company of the expectation of ever realizing anything from the money expended."

Going concern value is speculative enough when based upon past achievements, but when it depends upon future developments it becomes largely conjectural. The city of Auburn is a small town with no great realization in growth of population in the past, nor expectation for the future. Its water distribution must be more or less of fixed quantity with no great hope of expansion. Even if the commission fixed the going concern value of this plant within the $967 allowance, we cannot say that it "has not regularly pursued its authority" in this respect.

All of this discussion of the items of valuation covered by the general finding of the commission has been predicated upon the assumption that the commission accepted and followed the estimate of Engineer Faude as to the elements of valuation placed upon the concomitant parts of the plant. As already suggested, the only foundation for such a conclusion is the fact that the appraisement of the commission adopts approximately the same valuation as is reached by the aggregate of the estimates of separate elements of the system by the engineer. In support of this theory counsel for petitioner produce in their brief a memorandum prepared by Mr. Faude, which they state was handed to them subsequent to the original decision, by one of the commissioners, and which it is asserted shows in detail the manner in which the finding of the sum of $52,000 was reached. This memorandum adds nothing to the explanation of the commission's appraisement which was not already obvious, namely, that the commission added a certain sum to Mr. Faude's totals of $51,353, which, as the report states, was then "rounded off to $52,000," as a "reasonable value for sale purposes, including going concern value and all intangibles as of April 30, 1920." This was by the amended decision adopted as the value as of the date May 10, 1918. As to how the various elements of value were considered and distributed by the commission to make up this total does not appear. Even accepting this report as part of the record.

It may be properly assumed in support of the decision of the Railroad Commission, which is entitled to every presumption in its favor, that without accepting the appraisements in detail of each item of cost and depreciation of its own engineer, the commission may have concluded in the light of all the evidence that he had reached in the aggregate a fair valuation for the entire plant, and, as the report quoted by petitioner says, by adding a few hundred dollars rounded it to $52,000 as the just value of the entire system.

The order and decision of the Railroad Commission is affirmed.

MEMORANDUM DECISIONS

Ex parte DEL BONO. (Cr. 596.) (District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 29, 1921.) Application by Victor Del Bono for a writ of habeas corpus, prayed to be directed to the Sheriff of Madera County to secure release of petitioner from custody under a charge of murder. Writ denied. Joseph Barcroft, of Madera, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. The petitioner was arrested on a charge of murder, and at the conclusion of his preliminary examination the magistrate before whom such examination was had made an order holding him to answer and committing him to the custody of the sheriff. This proceeding is prosecuted on the ground that the evidence taken at the preliminary examination does not show reasonable or probable cause for holding the defendant to answer the charge in the superior court. In view of the trial to be had in the superior court, it is thought proper not to discuss the evidence. A careful examination of all the evidence taken at the preliminary examination satisfactorily shows that there is reasonable and probable cause for holding the defendant to answer. The petition for the writ is denied.

FRAZIER v. DAVID et al. (L. A. 6937.)

1. Bills and notes 🔑527(1) — Evidence held not to show payment.

In action on a renewal note, evidence including the fact that defendants for several years after its execution paid interest on the note held to support finding that the note had not been paid.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1047(3)—Refusal to strike out answer as conclusion held harmless.

Where a portion of witness' answer, objected to as a conclusion, if it was a conclusion, was the only one that could be reached, and was a repetition of what the witness had already testified to, refusal to strike it out was harmless.

3. Trial 🔑89 — Failure to strike out testimony as not best evidence held not error.

In action on note, where defendants claimed the note was settled and paid by a transaction in which another larger note was settled and paid, and on cross-examination of plaintiff's witness it developed that at the time of settlement the witness prepared some sort of instrument in writing, but it was not made to appear what was the nature of the writing, whether it embodied the terms of the agreement or was signed by the parties, nor that the witness had testified to the contents of the writing, it was not error to deny defendants' motion to strike out all of the witness' testimony pertaining to the settlement as not being the best evidence.

4. Appeal and error 🔑761 — Points urged without citation of authority not considered.

Where the only argument in appellants' brief in support of the contention that a certain ruling was erroneous was a reference to the incident, followed by the assertion that "it required no citation of authorities to establish the error," the point would not be considered.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; T. N. Harvey, Judge.

Action by W. W. Frazier against V. W. David and another. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Kaye, Siemon & Abel, of Bakersfield, for appellants.

J. W. Wiley and R. B. Lambert, both of Bakersfield, for respondent.

WASTE, J. The plaintiff brought this action to recover on a promissory note for the sum of $1,337.10 executed in renewal of one about to become barred by the statute of limitations. He recovered judgment for the amount of the note, unpaid interest and costs, and the defendants have appealed.

The original transaction between these parties grew out of the purchase of a tract of land belonging to the Kern County Land Company by the defendant V. W. David. Roland Greene held a contract of purchase of the land, which he had assigned to the plaintiff as security for the payment of a promissory note for the sum of $1,600. Greene sold his interest in the contract and in the land and in certain personal property to V. W. David for the sum of $6,000. That sum was agreed to be paid in several items, one of which was a promissory note for $1,300, executed by the defendant to plaintiff, and another a promissory note for $1,600, also executed to the plaintiff by V. W. David and Roland Greene. The note for $1,300 not being paid, and the statute of limitations being about to run against its collection, the defendants executed the note here sued upon, and delivered it to the plaintiff. There was at that time some contention on the part of the defendants that the old note had been paid, and the renewal note was executed with the understanding and agreement between the parties that it was subject to any defense which might be asserted by the defendants to the original obligation. In due time the plaintiff brought this action to enforce payment. The only question in the case was whether or not the note had been paid. There was a very decided conflict in the evidence on that point, and the lower court found that the obligation had not been discharged. It entered judgment for the plaintiff accordingly.

[1] We find no reason for disturbing the judgment of the lower court. There is testimony in the record, including evidence of the fact that for several years after its execution the defendants regularly paid the interest on the renewal note, which sufficiently supports the decision below. The record of the examination of the witnesses is not as clear as it might be, but the findings are full and explicit, and appear to correctly disclose the nature of the whole transaction between the parties.

[2] The appellants complain of certain rulings of the trial court relating to the admission of evidence. The objections are more technical than effective. The one most urgently stressed concerns the testimony of the witness J. W. Wiley, a witness for the plaintiff. V. W. David and Roland Greene secured a discharge from the $1,600 note held by the plaintiff by the execution of certain quitclaim deeds. The defendants claimed that the $1,300 note here in suit was settled and paid by the same transaction. Mr. Wiley, the attorney who arranged the details of the settlement, was called as a witness by the plaintiff, and testified as to what took place in his office. On cross-examination by appellants' counsel he was asked if "both these men" (Mr. David and Mr. Greene) were in his office at the same time. His answer was:

> "If I testify they were together and reached an agreement with them, I wouldn't be positive about that, but I know that I went into the matter with each of them, and the only thing to be settled was that they were giving these quitclaim deeds in consideration of the $1,600 note of which Mr. Frazier took the assignment."

Appellants' counsel asked that the answer be stricken out on the ground that it was the statement of a conclusion of the witness. The motion was denied. Appellants assign the ruling of the court as prejudical error, arguing that the "conclusion" of the witness "that the only thing to be settled" by the giving of the quitclaim deeds was the $1,600 note is the only evidence in the record to the effect that the $1,300 was not paid, and that consequently it must follow that the trial court decided the case in favor of the respondent on this answer alone. We do not think it is necessary to discuss the question whether or not the portion of the answer objected to was or was not the statement of a conclusion. If a conclusion, it was the only one that could be reached, and the fact remains that it was a repetition of what the witness had already testified to, and no conceivable harm could have resulted to appellants by the refusal of the court to strike it out. People v. Hatch, 163 Cal. 368–378, 125 Pac. 907. Laying the answer aside from all consideration, the evidence in the case supports the finding and conclusion of the lower court.

[3, 4] On the cross-examination of the witness Wiley, it developed that at the time of the settlement arrived at between the plaintiff, V. W. David and Roland Greene, Mr. Wiley prepared some sort of an instrument in writing. Counsel for appellants thereupon moved to strike out all of Wiley's testimony pertaining to the subject of the settlement as not being the best evidence. The motion was denied. It was not made to appear then or now what was the nature of the writing, whether it embodied the terms of the agreement or was signed by the parties. Neither does it appear that the witness had testified to the contents of the writing. On the face of the record the ruling of the trial court was correct. Furthermore, the only argument in appellants' brief in support of the contention that the ruling was erroneous is a reference to the incident followed by the assertion "it requires no citation of authorities to establish the error." Points thus made will not be considered.

The judgment is affirmed.

GOSLINER v. BRIONES et al. (S. F. 9031.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 14, 1921. Modified Jan. 13, 1922.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑501(5)—Bill of exceptions must specify wherein evidence failed to sustain findings.

Where the bill of exceptions does not specify wherein the evidence failed to sustain the findings the contention that the findings were not supported by the evidence cannot be considered.

2. Fixtures 🔑35(3)—Whether buildings permanently affixed to soil question of fact.

Civ. Code, §§ 658, 660, 663, relating to real and personal property are concerned more with ultimate than probative facts, and whether a building is permanently resting on the soil, so as to be deemed "affixed to the land" is a question of fact.

3. Fixtures 🔑4—Intention of parties criterion whether property permanently attached to land.

The intent of the parties is a controlling criterion in ascertaining whether property is permanently attached to land or retains its identity as personalty.

4. Fixtures 🔑35(2)—Licensee, erecting structures on another's land, consent presumed that structures remain property of licensee.

Where structures are erected on land by a licensee, consent on the part of the landowner that the structures remain the property of the licensee will be implied, in the absence of facts showing a different intention.

5. Licenses 🔑49—Erection of house on another's land held by license.

In an action for destruction of plaintiff's house and windmill erected on defendant's land, plaintiff's possession of the land from 1862 to 1916, and the erection of buildings in 1906, which remained on the land till 1915, with other facts found, held to justify the finding that plaintiff's possession was as a licensee, and not as a trespasser.

6. Venue 🔑5(5)—Action for destruction of personalty on another's land, not within Code, regulating situs of real actions.

An action for the destruction of a house and windmill erected on another's land was based on the destruction of personal property, and was not within Code Civ. Proc. § 392, subd. 1, relating to actions for the recovery of real property, etc., being tried in the county in which the subject of the action is situated.

7. Judgment 🔑590(4) — Determining ownership of improvements in suit to quiet title not defense to action for destroying plaintiff's buildings on defendant's land prior to suit.

Action for the destruction of plaintiff's house and windmill on defendant's land in 1916 was not barred by judgment, in a suit to quiet title begun in 1917, that defendants were the owners of the land, "together with the improvements thereon;" the building having been destroyed prior to the suit.

8. Torts 🔑22—Rule as to tort-feasors stated.

In actions ex delicto, all persons concerned in the commission of the tort may be joined as defendants, or either sued severally.

9. Master and servant 🔑313—Liability for tort joint.

Where an employer and an employee have participated in a tortious act against a third person, such as the destruction of his building, they may be jointly sued.

10. Damages 🔑105—Measure for destruction of plaintiff's buildings on defendant's land stated.

In an action for destruction of plaintiff's buildings erected on defendant's land, the measure of damages is the value of the buildings, less the cost of removal to another site.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; W. N. Thomas, Judge.

Action by Edward S. Gosliner against Frank Briones and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed as modified.

George H. Harlan, of San Rafael, for appellants.

Arnold C. Lackenbach, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LENNON, J. [1] Plaintiff, Edward S. Gosliner, instituted the present action against defendants, Frank Briones, William Latter, and Belle Latter, for the purpose of recovering damages for the destruction of a certain dwelling house and windmill alleged to have belonged to said plaintiff. Judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $2,500, the reasonable value of the demolished structures, and defendants appeal, relying upon a record consisting of the judgment-roll and a bill of exceptions. Since the bill of exceptions contains nothing which even purports to specify wherein the evidence fails to sustain any of the findings, the contention that the findings are not supported by the evidence cannot be considered. Carter v. Canty, 181 Cal. 749, 752, 186 Pac. 346.

Summarizing the findings, then, we have the following facts before us on this appeal: In the year 1860 Charles A. Lauff sold to Pablo Briones an acre of land in Marin county, Cal.; the deed being recorded at the time of the sale. Upon the death of Pablo Briones this land passed to his wife, Rafaela Briones, who, on January 25, 1915, deeded it to her son-in-law, defendant William Latter. In 1862, shortly after the sale of the land to Briones, Charles Lauff re-entered the said acre of land, and from that year until May, 1916, it remained in the open, notorious, and continuous possession of the said Charles Lauff and various members of his family. In 1906 plaintiff, Gosliner, the son-in-law of Charles Lauff, erected upon this land a five-room dwelling house and a large windmill. Neither of these buildings were firmly imbedded in the soil; both were built upon heavy redwood mudsills, placed upon the surface of the ground. Charles Lauff and his children consented to the erection of the buildings, and it was agreed between them and the plaintiff that the buildings were not to remain permanently upon the land, but were to be left there only for a temporary period, until plaintiff was in a position to remove them to a nearby parcel of land which he owned. In the year 1915 defendant William Latter for the first time asserted his ownership in the aforesaid acre of land. A dispute concerning the title to the dwelling house and windmill ensued, and ultimately, in September, 1916, defendants, without previous notice to plaintiff, entered the property and totally demolished and razed the said buildings. The trial court held that the buildings were personalty and the property of the plaintiff, and accordingly adjudged defendants liable for damages for their destruction.

[2, 3] Vital error was committed, defendants contend, in holding that the buildings did not pass as real property to the owner of the land upon which they rested, but continued to be personalty and remained the property of the person by whom they were erected.

> "Real or immovable property consists of: 1. Land; 2. That which is affixed to land; 3. That which is incidental or appurtenant to land; 4. That which is immovable by law." Civ. Code, § 658.
> "Every kind of property that is not real is personal." Civ. Code, § 663.

Consequently the buildings in question were personalty unless they were "affixed to the land," for, obviously, only in that sense can they be brought within the above classification of real property.

> "A thing is deemed to be affixed to land when it is attached to it by roots, as in the case of trees, vines, or shrubs; or imbedded in it, as in the case of walls; or permanently resting upon it, as in the case of buildings; or permanently attached to what is thus permanent, as by means of cement, plaster, nails, bolts, or screws." Civ. Code, § 660.

This section of the Code is simply a rule for general guidance, concerning itself more with ultimate than with probative facts. Whether or not in any case a building is "permanently resting upon" the soil, so as to be deemed "affixed to the land" within the meaning of the section, remains a question of fact to be determined upon the evidence of that case. Pennybecker v. McDougal, 48 Cal. 160; Miller v. Waddingham, 91 Cal. 377, 27 Pac. 750, 13 L. R. A. 680.

As a general rule the intent of the parties is a controlling criterion in ascertaining whether property is permanently attached to the land or retains its identity as personalty; the character of the annexation to the land or other realty and the use made of the property are important considerations, but in most cases are subsidiarily employed for the purpose of testing the intention of the parties. Hendy v. Dinkerhoff, 57 Cal. 3, 40 Am. Rep. 107; Lavenson v. Standard Soap Co., 80 Cal. 245, 22 Pac. 184, 13 Am. St. Rep. 147; Jordan v. Myres, 126 Cal. 565, 58 Pac. 1061; Western, etc., Tel. Co. v. Modesto Irr. Co., 149 Cal. 662, 665, 87 Pac. 190, 9 Ann. Cas. 1190; Dutton v. Ensley, 21 Ind. App. 46, 51 N. E. 380, 69 Am. St. Rep. 340. In the present case the trial court found that the buildings were not imbedded in the soil, but were constructed on mudsills placed upon the surface of the ground and that the plaintiff had no intention of permitting the buildings to remain on the land, but placed them there pursuant to an understanding that they should be removed therefrom. From these circumstances surrounding the erection of the buildings the trial court concluded that plaintiff never intended that his buildings should permanently rest upon the defendants' land, and this determination cannot be disturbed. Miller v. Waddingham, supra.

Defendants claim, however, that the intent of the plaintiff in placing the buildings upon the land is of no importance in the instant case, for the reason that there is no finding that the owners of the land agreed that they should remain personal property. It is claimed that the rule applies that improvements placed upon land by a stranger without an agreement permitting their removal follow the tenure of the soil on which they are erected. Civ. Code, § 1013; Collins v. Bartlett, 44 Cal. 371; McKiernan v. Hesse, 51 Cal. 594; Prescott & A. C. Ry. Co. v. Rees, 3 Ariz. 317, 28 Pac. 1134; Crest v. Jack, 3 Watts (Pa.) 238, 27 Am. Dec. 353. But in the cases last cited there is no clear showing that the person placing the improvements upon the land intended that they should continue separate and distinct from the realty; they are, for the most part, instances where a person has caused personal property to be annexed to real property of another without the latter's consent, with the intent that it should be permanently attached thereto but under a mistaken belief as to the ownership of the real property. In the present case there was, it is true, a mistaken belief concerning the ownership of the land, but, in addition to that, there was an intent that in any event the buildings should not remain upon or become a part of the realty, and therefore, in view of this intent, it is doubtful whether, even under the rule relied upon by defendants, the buildings would be deemed to have become affixed to the land so as to pass to the owner of the soil.

[4] It is, however, unnecessary to decide that question, for the facts of this case bring it within a well-settled exception to the above-mentioned rule. Whatever the rights of a trespasser or entire stranger may be, the rule is that, where structures are erected upon land by a person who occupies the land with the permission or license of the owner, but who has no estate in the land, that is to say, by a mere licensee, consent on the part of the owner of the land that the structures shall remain the property of the person erecting them will be implied in the absence of any other facts or circumstances tending to show a different intention. Bank v. Stanton, 55 Minn. 211, 56 N. W. 821, 43 Am. St. Rep. 491; Joplin Supply Co. v. West, 149 Mo. App. 78, 130 S. W. 156, 161; Fischer v. Johnson, 106 Iowa, 181, 76 N. W. 658. There is no finding that the owner of the land granted Lauff or the plaintiff express permission to occupy the land, but a direct authorization is not essential to establish an occupancy by virtue of permission or acquiescence of the owner; a license may result from circumstances, as, for instance, where a person has continued in possession for such a length of time and under such circumstances that objection might well have been expected had there been no assent. Fischer v. Johnson, supra; McCann v. Thilemann, 36 Misc. Rep. 145, 72 N. Y. Supp. 1076.

[5] The trial court found that Charles Lauff and members of his family had been in open, notorious, and continuous possession of the land from 1862 until 1916, and that the buildings erected by plaintiff remained on the property without objection from 1906 until 1915. These findings, when considered in connection with the other facts found, are tantamount to a finding that Charles Lauff and his family were licensees, and not mere trespassers, and since the findings do not show any facts or circumstances revealing a different intent upon the part of the owner of the land, the court below was correct in holding that the buildings did not become affixed to the land irrespective of plaintiff's intention that they should remain separate.

[6] Our determination of this point in effect disposes of the defendant's objection to the overruling of a demurrer to the complaint for lack of jurisdiction. The present action was brought in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco which defendants claim was without jurisdiction to try the case by reason of the fact that the land upon which the buildings were erected is situated in Marin county and that the present action involves the right to the use of that land. Section 5 of article 6 of the Constitution of California provides that "all actions for the recovery of the possession of, quieting the title to, or for the enforcement of liens upon real estate, shall be commenced in the county in which the real estate, or any part thereof, affected by such action or actions is situated," and section 392 of subdivision 1 of the Code of Civil Procedure requires that actions "for the recovery of real property, or of an estate or interest therein, or for the determination in any form, of such right or interest, and for injuries to real property," shall be tried in the county in which the subject of the action, or some part thereof, is situated. The present action, however, is based upon plaintiff's right to the buildings as personal property, and it was solely upon that theory that he recovered judgment. The complaint practically alleged all title and interest in the land to be in defendant William Latter. It is true that there were allegations of facts tending to show that plaintiff was in the position of a licensee in erecting the buildings, but a mere licensee is but one remove from a trespasser and possesses no estate or interest in the land itself. Norfolk, etc., Ry. Co. v. Denny's Adm'r, 106 Va. 383, 56 S. E. 321; Brown v. Boston & M. R. R., 73 N. H. 568, 64 Atl. 194, 199; Fischer v. Johnson, supra. It was, therefore, not improper to bring and try the action in the city and county of San Francisco, where two of the defendants resided. Code Civ. Proc. § 395.

[7] It appears from the findings that in 1917 Charles Lauff and his children instituted an action against defendants William and Belle Latter and others for the purpose of quieting title to the acre of land upon which the buildings here in controversy were erected, "together with the improvements thereon." The judgment in that action, which is set forth in the findings in the present case, decrees that William and Belle Latter are the owners of the said land, "together with the improvements thereon." Defendants contend that plaintiff claims through Charles Lauff, and that he is therefore bound by the judgment against the said Lauff and his children and in favor of the said defendants. Assuming that plaintiff does claim through Lauff and his family, he is not prevented from suing for the value of the buildings he erected because of the judgment against Lauff. The findings of the present case disclose that the two buildings in controversy were totally destroyed in September, 1916, prior to the suit to quiet title. It is, therefore, evident that the words "improvements thereon," in the judgment in the suit to quiet title, do not refer to the two buildings erected by plaintiff, which were not in existence at the time of that suit.

[8, 9] The fact that defendant Frank Briones was an employee of defendants William and Belle Latter in removing the house and windmill does not relieve him from liability for his acts. The court found that defendant Briones joined with the other defendants in demolishing the buildings, with full knowledge that they belonged to and were the personal property of the plaintiff. In the prosecution of actions for causes ex delicto all persons concerned in the commission of the tort may be joined as defendants, or either or any of them may be sued severally, and where an employer and an employee have participated in a tortious act against a third person, they may be jointly sued for damages. Rogers v. Ponet, 21 Cal. App. 577, 581, 132 Pac. 851.

[10] In one particular, however, error prejudicial to defendants was committed, namely, in a ruling respecting evidence concerning the amount of damages sustained by the plaintiff. The trial court found:

> "That the reasonable value of said dwelling house at the time it was demolished by said defendants was the sum of twenty-two hundred and fifty ($2,250) dollars; that the reasonable value of the said windmill at the time it was demolished by said defendants was the sum of two hundred and fifty ($250) dollars"

—and rendered judgment against defendants in the sum of $2,500. The bill of exceptions shows that counsel for defendants made a formal offer to prove that it would have cost the sum of $1,000 to move said buildings from the acre of land upon which they were built to the land owned by plaintiff, Gosliner; but the trial court refused to permit the introduction of this evidence, and sustained plaintiff's objection thereto, upon the ground that it was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial. The following evidence as to the value of the buildings is contained in the bill of exceptions:

> Plaintiff testified: "I paid for all of the work and all of the materials. The entire cost of the house and windmill to me was about $2,500."
> A carpenter who worked on the house stated: "The value of this particular house was about $2,500."

Assuming that it cost $2,500 to build the house and windmill, nevertheless plaintiff had no right to maintain them on the premises where they were located. The agreement under which he built required him to remove the structures from the land on which they were erected to his own lots, a mile away. The difference between the cost of erecting similar buildings upon his own lots and the amount it would have cost to remove the old buildings from defendant's land to his own lots, assuming the buildings to be equally valuable on both pieces of land, would represent the measure of the damages sustained by plaintiff as a result of the destruction. If the cost of construction is $2,500, and the cost of removal would have been $1,000, then plaintiff should not have been allowed more than $1,500 damages. If the plaintiff had undertaken to establish the market value of the house as personal property subject to removal, evidence of the cost of removing the house to a particular lot would have been immaterial. But where he sought to establish the value of the house merely by proof of the cost of construction, or its value where located, it was proper to show the cost of removal of the house to the lot to which the plaintiff claimed he intended to remove it. Pennybecker v. McDougal, 48 Cal. 160, 164.

It is clear that the finding of the court that the destruction of the buildings damaged plaintiff to the extent of $2,500 cannot be sustained, in view of the showing in the record that the court refused to take into consideration the fact that the utilization of the buildings by plaintiff would have necessitated an expenditure by him of $1,000. Defendants were entitled to introduce evidence upon the question of the cost of removing the buildings for the purpose of mitigating damages, and since the fact appears affirmatively in the bill of exceptions that the court made a ruling excluding material and competent evidence on this question, the judgment must be reversed.

The judgment is reversed.

We concur: SHAW, C. J.; SHURTLEFF, J.; WILBUR, J.; SLOANE, J.

Modification of Judgment.

PER CURIAM. The judgment of $2,500 as damages for the destruction of a certain dwelling house and windmill belonging to the plaintiff having heretofore been reversed because of the erroneous ruling of the trial court refusing to permit the defendants to show in evidence, in diminution of damages, that it would have cost the plaintiff the sum of $1,000 to move the said buildings from the land upon which they were situated; and the plaintiff having, on the 20th day of September, 1921, filed with his petition for a modification of the judgment a remission of the said sum of $1,000, and an agreement that the judgment be modified by striking therefrom the sum of $1,000, and, as so modified, stand affirmed—it is therefore ordered that the judgment of the superior court be modified, by striking therefrom the sum of $1,000, and, as so modified, that it stand affirmed, the plaintiff, however, to have his costs on appeal.

55 Cal. App. 681

NELSON v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. (Civ. 2402.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 16, 1921.)

1. Master and servant 🔑405(4)—Evidence of compensable disability held insufficient.

In proceedings under Workmen's Compensation Act for compensation for disability consisting of abscesses on employee's knees caused by streptococcus infection, where the only expert witness sworn for him testified that injuries by a fall were not contributing causes of the abscesses, the Industrial Accident Commission's conclusion that the evidence was insufficient to show that the disability was proximately caused by such fall was justified.

2. Master and servant 🔑414—Compensation claimant required to produce own witnesses.

While the Industrial Accident Commission can summon witnesses of its own motion, this is only done where the Commission finds the parties unable or unwilling to produce testimony necessary to a decision; and where a party claiming compensation has full opportunity to produce his own witnesses, he cannot complain because the Commission did not relieve him from the burden of producing them.

3. Master and servant 🔑414—Rehearing for absence of witnesses as to compensable disability held properly denied.

In proceedings under Workmen's Compensation Act, in which employer denied that employee's injuries caused the disability complained of, the Industrial Accident Commission's denial of petition for rehearing for absence of witnesses was proper where the materiality of their testimony was not shown, and none of them could qualify as expert witnesses.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 831) by Charles Nelson, for compensation for injuries, opposed by the Yosemite Lumber Company, employer, and the Manufacturers' Indemnity Exchange, insurer. Claim for compensation denied by the Industrial Accident Commission, and petitioner brings certiorari to review the Commission's order. Order affirmed.

Henry F. Price, of Merced, for petitioner.

A. E. Graupner and Warren H. Pillsbury, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J. This is an application to review the decision of the Industrial Accident Commission denying the petitioner's claim for compensation for disability alleged to have been caused by two accidents to his knees arising out of and in the course of his employment by the Yosemite Lumber Company.

The petition alleges:

"1. That the Commission acted without and in excess of its powers; (2) that the order and decision was unreasonable; (3) that the findings of fact do not support the order, decision and award under review."

The Commission found:

"That * * * applicant fell from a pile of lumber while in the course of his employment, but the evidence is insufficient to establish as a fact that the disability complained of was proximately caused by said fall."

[1] Dr. H. Jalmer Kyleberg, a contract surgeon for the Yosemite Lumber Company, who gave applicant professional treatment for the injuries resulting from the alleged accidents, was sworn as a witness for the applicant, and testified that the alleged disability consisted of abscesses on both knees caused by streptococcus infection; that the accidents alleged were slight, and, in the opinion of the witness, were not contributing causes of the abscesses. No other expert witness testified. The abscesses developed about three weeks after the last accident, the applicant having been engaged in his usual employment in the meantime. The application for compensation was not contested in the sense in which the word "contest" is usually understood. R. C. Dracey, manager of the lumber company, and who represented the defendants at the hearing, being called as a witness for the petitioner, stated:

"I think there is no disposition on the part of the company to avoid any issue raised by the man, or meet any condition that the man is entitled to."

Neither party was represented by an attorney. The referee conducted the examination in a manner eminently fair to both parties, and the conclusion reached is the only one which could reasonably be drawn from the evidence.

[2, 3] Attorneys for the Industrial Accident Commission fairly state the facts and the law bearing upon the further contentions of petitioner as follows:

"Two hearings were held in the case, of which petitioner concedes he had notice and full opportunity to present all the testimony he desired to offer. He does not complain that any testimony offered by him was ruled out, that he was misled by erroneous advice into omitting to secure necessary testimony, or that any reasonable request for continuance for the purpose of producing such testimony was refused. His only complaint is that the Commission did not itself subpœna and produce the witnesses named by him. Obviously this is not a valid ground. While the Industrial Accident Commission, as pointed out by petitioner, can summon witnesses of its own motion, the fee to be paid by the state, it is not required to do so, and very seldom does so. The state has not appropriated sufficient funds to permit this to be done in routine cases. This is only done where the Commission itself finds the parties unable or unwilling to produce testimony necessary to the decision of the case, and the Commission deems the testimony of such witnesses to be vitally necessary to the decision. As in all other civil actions, the burden is primarily upon each party to produce his own witnesses to establish his case, and where the party has full opportunity to produce his own witnesses he cannot complain because the Commission did not relieve him from the burden.

"Furthermore, respondent Commission found and determined in its order denying petition for rehearing, that such testimony, if received, would not be sufficient to affect the decision. It will be noted that petitioner has at no time indicated what these witnesses would testify to if called. The burden is upon petitioner to show the materiality of their testimony, which petitioner has failed to do. And, judging from the facts as shown by the record, it seems impossible to see any materiality to their testimony.

"It will be noted from the Commission's findings and award that decision was in favor of applicant as to the occurrence of the injuries alleged by petitioner, and as to the fact that such injuries occurred in the course of and arose out of his employment. Further testimony on behalf of petitioner was therefore unnecessary to establish these contentions. The point upon which compensation was denied was that petitioner had failed to show that his injuries were the cause of the later abscesses in his knees. Neither of the witnesses whom petitioner wished produced could testify upon this point, as this is purely a medical question, and neither of the witnesses could qualify as physicians or expert witnesses."

The decision of the Commission is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Siskiyou County; James F. Lodge, Judge.

Action by P. W. Bush against the Weed Lumber Company. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Collier & McNamara, of Yreka, for appellant.

Taylor & Tebbe, of Yreka, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The appeal is from a judgment of nonsuit. The nature of the action may be seen from the following allegations of the complaint:

"That on and prior to the 9th day of June, 1919, plaintiff was employed by said Weed Lumber Company to bore a well for said company on its premises near camp 3, at Morrison, in the county of Siskiyou, state of California; that on said 9th day of June, 1919, while plaintiff was employed as aforesaid, his said well-boring outfit broke down, and, while waiting for same to be repaired, plaintiff, at the solicitation of C. W. Murphy, general superintendent for said Weed Lumber Company, and further induced by a reward offered by said Weed Lumber Company to any one finding water for the supply of said company's camp, went in search of a certain spring of water reputed to be above said camp 3, and after making said search, while returning to said camp, where he was staying, plaintiff necessarily passed along said company's railroad track and by a crew of men employed by said company unloading logs from flat cars by means of a certain mechanical contrivance called a 'merry crane'; that when plaintiff was opposite the said crane the foreman of said crane requested plaintiff to hand him a block of wood, which plaintiff did, and thereupon plaintiff withdrew a distance of 30 or 40 feet in the rear of said crane to await transportation back to camp, and, while waiting and watching said crane in operation, the said crane, owing to its careless and negligent operation by defendant's said employees, and owing to the gross negligence and carelessness of said employees in not causing same to be anchored down, and owing to the negligent and careless manner in which said company's railroad track was constructed and maintained, on which said track said crane was standing, the said crane, without fault on the part of this plaintiff, toppled over backwards and inflicted on plaintiff the injuries hereinafter set forth and described."

[1-4] There is no controversy as to the principles that must govern in the determination of a motion for nonsuit. It admits the truth of the evidence produced, and every legitimate inference of fact that may be legitimately drawn therefrom (Estate of Daly, 15 Cal. App. 329, 114 Pac. 787); the court cannot go beyond the limits of the motion in rendering its decision (Daley v. Russ, 86 Cal. 114, 24 Pac. 867); it is the duty of the court, if there be any doubt, to let the case go to the jury (Mitchell v. Brown, 18 Cal. App. 117, 122 Pac. 426), and the evidence should be most strongly interpreted against the defendant (Hoff v. Los Angeles, etc., Co., 158 Cal. 596, 112 Pac. 53).

No contention is made that the plaintiff was not seriously injured or that there was no evidence that it was due to the faulty construction of the "crane," but the claim of respondent is that the defendant owed the plaintiff no duty to protect him, and therefore there was no actionable negligence on the part of respondent. It is declared that the case is governed by the decisions of the Supreme Court in Schmidt v. Bauer, 80 Cal. 565, 22 Pac. 256, 5 L. R. A. 580, Kennedy v. Chase, 119 Cal. 637, 52 Pac. 33, 63 Am. St. Rep. 153, and Grundel v. Union Iron Works, 141 Cal. 564, 75 Pac. 184, in pursuance of the doctrine that—

> "The duty of a master to furnish his servant with a reasonably safe place in which to work is limited to the premises where the employee is required to be for the purposes of his employment, and does not extend to his protection while upon private excursions outside those limits."

The vital question is whether the case falls necessarily within the principle of those decisions, or is there any ground for holding that defendant did owe plaintiff the legal duty of exercising ordinary care for his protection?

Plaintiff testified:

> That he had been employed to dig a well for defendant, and, while upon the latter's premises, "about the 7th day of June I was telling Mr. Murphy I had been down to Charlie Phelps', and he was telling me that himself and Frank Mills had found water coming down of the gulch at the foot of Mt. Shasta, and Mr. Murphy told me, while I was waiting for the tools, to go and hunt for it, and I also told him that Mr. Hall that was scaling lumber there told me, he says he had found some water seeping out of the 'whaleback' there, and Mr. Murphy told me to go to the barn and get a horse and go on horseback, and I told him it hurt me to ride horseback, that I would go on the train, and I would go as far as I could on the train; then I would go on foot the balance of the way. And on the 7th, that was the day I went up around the foot of Mt. Shasta, up to the snow line, and I couldn't find no water; everything was dry below the snow and I came back; and the next day I was kind of tired and didn't go out, and on the 9th I went out on the train again to the foot of 'whaleback' and walked around there hunting water."

[5] He further testified that Mr. Murphy told him that if he could find a spring that would supply the camp with water there would be $100 in it for him, and that there was posted on the premises a sign or notice that a reward of $100 would be paid by the company to any one who would find a spring from which water could be piped to the camp. The offer through the notice or through Mr. Murphy did not, of course, bind respondent to pay anything to plaintiff unless he found the water, but it was a clear invitation to go upon the premises for the purpose of searching for such a spring. It could not be found without a search, and the search could not be made without going upon the premises. Plaintiff was therefore undertaking a mission in pursuance of the request and invitation of defendant, and while engaged in that task he was entitled to the legal protection of ordinary care on the part of respondent. Meyers v. Syndicate Heat & Power Co., 47 Wash. 48, 91 Pac. 549; Bennett v. Louisville & N. R. R. Co., 102 U. S. 577, 26 L. Ed. 235; Roseberry v. Niehaus & Co., 166 Cal. 481, 137 Pac. 232.

[6] The question then arises whether plaintiff, when injured, was acting within the limits and while in the pursuit of this search for water. In its consideration there would be, manifestly, no difference whether he was going or returning if he was not making an "excursion" beyond the limits of the purpose for which he was invited upon the premises.

After stating that he had gone to the foot of "whaleback mountain," and hunted there for water, he started to return and came down to where they were working with the crane; that in accordance with the request of one of the workmen he handed him a chunk of wood to block a log; that he then walked to the side of the track and sat down on a stump, "and they were working the crane that way (indicating), and I looked up and see the crane kind of dip that way a little, and I got up and came back over this side, right opposite from where they was working back of the crane, and sat down straddle of a log about 30 or 40 feet from the crane, and so I sat there maybe about 5 minutes—maybe ten"—when he looked at his watch and started to put it back in his pocket, and "I looked up and the crane was coming right for me, and I jumped off and run; and I throwed my eyes up and I see that the crane was coupled to the two cars. I thought that the coupling would hold and it would throw the crane around this way, but it didn't; it just lifted it right off, the top did, and it came right over this way (indicating), and came down this way, and hit me and knocked me down and laid across me here." When asked what he was doing there, he said he sat down to rest.

> "I was very tired. I had been walking in loose sand and gravel about thirty hours. I had asked them about the train, and I was going to rest for a few minutes. The train wasn't there and I was going to hike down to camp."

The record shows furthermore the following:

> "Q. As I understand it, when you came out in the morning, you got off the crane, where the crane was spotted and walked over to 'whaleback'? A. Yes; I got off the engine and walked over to 'whaleback.'
> "Q. When you returned, you returned by the same way—in other words, by the crane, and then to go on down to the camp? A. Yes.
> "Q. Was that the nearest and most direct route? A. It would be pretty near a straight line from where I was, straight through to the camp."

We fail to see any difference in principle between the facts herein and those in the Roseberry Case, supra. Therein the plaintiff was sent by his employers, Poetsch & Peterson, to the premises of defendant to see that everything properly appertaining to a boiler, which had been purchased by them, should be brought away. As stated by the Supreme Court:

> "The boiler was loaded upon a truck at the rear of a gangway opening on Brannan street. Mr. Niehaus had left plaintiff, and later plaintiff started to depart from the premises, but stopped to converse with a friend. He then went to the office to say good-bye to Mr. Niehaus, but, not finding him, turned in the door to leave when he saw the loaded truck starting out by the gangway leading to Brannan street. He waited for the truck to pass, and then walked behind the men who were following it. Before he reached the open gate a pile of lumber fell upon him, broke his leg, and inflicted other serious injuries."

The Supreme Court held that it was proper to submit to the jury the question as to the negligence of the defendant as well as the contributory negligence of the plaintiff.

[6] Respondent urges that the distinguishing feature of that case is that therein the plaintiff was an "invitee," and therefore the defendant owed him the duty of ordinary care. But it is difficult to discern any difference in principle between the implied invitation in that case for the owner to come and get his boiler and the express invitation in this case for plaintiff to come upon the premises to seek for water. In neither case was the plaintiff a trespasser or mere licensee, and, as we understand it, the legal obligation was the same in both instances. In each, also, the plaintiff was returning after having gone upon the premises for a certain definite purpose, and was not departing from the course that might be considered direct and opportune. The only difference is that herein the plaintiff sat down 30 or 40 feet from the dangerous instrumentality, while therein the plaintiff was walking past the lumber when it fell. His sitting down near the crane might present a question of contributory negligence, but in view of his explanation of the circumstances surrounding the affair, it was a matter to be submitted to the determination of the jury.

In the Schmidt Case, supra, cited by respondent, the plaintiff entered the private residence of the defendant without an invitation, and was injured by falling into a cellar. It was held that, since he was not invited nor allured into said building, he was thereby the mere licensee of the owner, and for that reason the latter owed him no duty, "and he went there subject to all the risks attending his going."

In Kennedy v. Chase, supra, "the servant made a private excursion upon the deck of the vessel, upon his own account and for his own convenience, to place his coat upon a main hatchway, unnecessarily remote from the place of his employment," and it was in view of such circumstance that the Supreme Court held that the employer was not liable. In other words, the employee, when injured, was beyond the limits of the place where he was required to be for the purpose of his employment. The employee was manifestly acting outside the scope of his employment, since he was on a part of the vessel where he was neither required nor invited to go. If herein the plaintiff on his return had departed from the direct route to visit the crane on his own account, and thus had been injured, the Kennedy Case might be in point.

So in Grundel v. Union Iron Works, supra, the deceased was not employed by the defendant, nor was he invited to go upon the vessel. He was either a trespasser or a mere licensee, and hence the defendant owed him no duty to keep its gangplank in safe condition.

In Means v. Southern California Ry. Co., 144 Cal. 473, 77 Pac. 1001, 1 Ann. Cas. 206, not cited by either party, many authorities are collated which distinguished between the case of one invited upon the premises and a trespasser or mere licensee. Of course, it is true, as therein pointed out, that in case of a licensee the landowner is liable for intentional or wanton injury, but not for the lack of ordinary care. The court assumed, though, that the rule is well settled that such care must be exercised toward one who is invited to the premises, and we understand that the legal proposition is not disputed by respondent.

It is probably unnecessary to state that the situation would be different if the case had been submitted upon the evidence introduced and the jury had rendered a verdict for the defendant, but, as we view it, the trial court erred in refusing to submit the issues to the determination of the jury.

The judgment is reversed.

MATHEWS v. MATHEWS. (Civ. 4022.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2. California. Dec. 15. 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 9, 1922.)

1. Divorce 🔑245(1)—Defendant's stipulation for "permanent alimony" of $30 per month did not prevent modification reducing amount.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 137, 139, stipulation of defendant husband for decree of $30 per month against him, "as and for permanent alimony" for plaintiff, did not prevent modification of the decree reducing the amount.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Permanent Alimony.]

2. Divorce 🔑245(1)—Modifying alimony discretionary.

The modification of a decree as to alimony because of changed circumstances rests in the discretion of the trial court, under Civ. Code, § 139.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Action by Ada E. Mathews against William H. Mathews. From an order modifying interlocutory decree of divorce as to payment of alimony, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

H. W. Glensor, and Glensor, Cleve & Van Dine, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Ross & Ross, of Redwood City, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. [1] This is an appeal from a special order made after final judgment modifying the provisions of an interlocutory decree of divorce respecting the payment of alimony. The case was before the first division of this court on a former appeal. Mathews v. Mathews, 193 Pac. 586. The order there under consideration modified the interlocutory decree on the ground that the final decree did not contain any direction as to the payment of alimony. The court held that this ground was not sufficient to warrant the modification of the decree, and the order was therefore reversed. A new motion was thereafter made on the ground that the financial circumstances and conditions of both plaintiff and defendant had materially changed since the entry of the interlocutory decree, and that it was not necessary or equitable for the defendant to be required to continue to pay to plaintiff the alimony awarded in the interlocutory decree.

Prior to the trial of the action the parties stipulated that the sum of $30 a month "as and for permanent alimony" might be awarded to plaintiff by the court. The interlocutory decree does not show that the stipulation was before the court or that it was considered by it, but does recite that proofs were taken of the matters alleged in the complaint, and makes the same award as and for permanent alimony as is mentioned in the stipulation. The complaint alleged that $30 per month was "a reasonable sum as and for alimony for the support and maintenance of plaintiff."

There was nothing in the complaint to apprise defendant of the fact that plaintiff was seeking something else than the ordinary alimony authorized by sections 137 and 139 of the Civil Code. When the stipulation was drawn waiving counsel fees and suit money and fixing the amount to be allowed as "permanent" alimony, the defendant was justified in assuming that such alimony was subject to the power of the court to modify as conferred by section 139.

The words "permanent alimony" as used in the stipulation and in the interlocutory decree refer to the alimony awarded after suit under section 139, as distinguished from the suit money awarded during the pendency of the action and usually termed "temporary alimony." The section of the Code must be read into the decree, and as the stipulation is not different from the decree it cannot mean more than that the trial court was authorized to award plaintiff $30 a month as permanent alimony on the completion of the trial, but that such award was subject to the power of the court to modify as provided in that section.

The grounds of the motion to modify the decree were that the financial circumstances of both parties had materially changed and that it was not necessary or equitable to require defendant to continue to pay the alimony to plaintiff. The showing was that plaintiff was in a much better position financially than defendant and was in receipt of a very much larger income than he.

[2] The modification of a decree in respect to the award of alimony is a matter which rests in the sound discretion of the trial court. The original award under section 139, Civil Code, is to be made with "regard to the circumstances of the parties respectively." When the circumstances change the court may in its discretion modify the award. The notice of motion assigned a legal ground for the modification of the decree, and the showing was sufficient to support the order.

The order is affirmed.

CHILBERG v. CROSS LAND CO.

(Civ. 3557.)

1. Corporations 🔑82—Agreement in certificate of corporation to purchasers of stock held invalid.

Where purchasers of stock at par from corporation dealing in land received certificates aggregating the same amount, wherein the corporation agreed to set aside a certain part of the proceeds of sales of land of the corporation in payment of the certificates without interest, the promise to refund was void under Civ. Code, § 309, providing that dividends may be made only from surplus profits arising from the business.

2. Corporations 🔑566(5)—Rights of creditors superior to stockholders under refund agreement.

Rights of creditors of a corporation dealing in land were superior to any rights obtained by stockholders under an agreement of the corporation to refund the amount paid for the stock without interest out of the proceeds of sales of land.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Action by Andrew Chilberg against the Cross Land Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Jas. W. Bell, of Los Angeles (Wm. A. Gilmore, of Seattle, Wash., of counsel), for appellant.

Benjamin E. Page, Arthur C. Hurt, Eugene D. Williams, Horace S. Wilson and Constan Jensen, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WORKS, J. Plaintiff, an assignee, brought suit against defendant to recover the sum of $10,000. His predecessor in interest had bought shares of the capital stock of defendant, paying therefor the amount mentioned, at par, and there were issued to him by defendant at the same time certain obligations or certificates aggregating the same amount. These papers, each entitled "Refunding Certificate," were in the following form:

"The Cross Land Company, a corporation organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of California, certify [hereby?] certifies and agrees:

"That Eugene Chilberg has paid into the treasury of said corporation the sum of $1,000.00, for the purpose of carrying out the present project of said corporation, to subdivide and sell in small tracts, a portion of the rancho La Puente; that as a partial consideration for said money so paid, ten shares of the fully paid up capital stock of said corporation have been issued to said Eugene Chilberg.

"As a further consideration for the payment of said money, the Cross Land Company hereby agrees that it will refund said $1,000.00, so paid, to Eugene Chilberg, his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, without interest, in the following manner to wit:

"Thirty-three and one-third per cent. (33⅓%) of all the moneys received by said corporation from the sale of two thousand sixty-six acres, more or less, of said rancho La Puente, more particularly described in a certain deed from Purcell, Gray & Gale, Incorporated, to said Cross Land Company, except that portion of said land to be conveyed to a water company for the purpose of placing water upon said land, shall be placed in a separate fund by said corporation for the purpose of refunding said above amount and other sums due to subscribers of stock holding like certificates. All certificate holders shall be paid from said funds in proportion to the amount set forth in their respective certificates, and said payments shall be made on the 1st day of July, 1912, and every six months thereafter.

"Said Cross Land Company agrees that it will not issue certificates to subscribers of stock in an amount in excess of one hundred fifty-five thousand dollars ($155,000.00) and that during the existence of this certificate and until the full amount thereof has been fully refunded that it will not cause any dividends to be declared or paid upon the capital stock of said corporation.

"No payments shall be made on this certificate unless the same is presented for the proper indorsement of the same on the back thereof, and when fully paid the same shall be canceled and surrendered to the Cross Land Company."

By his action plaintiff sought to recover as upon a breach by defendant of its alleged obligation to "refund" as expressed in the certificates. Defendant had judgment and plaintiff appeals.

[1, 2] It is contended by respondent that the agreement to refund is void under the terms of the Civil Code (section 309), to the effect that—

> "The directors of corporations must not make dividends, except from the surplus profits arising from the business thereof; * * * nor must they divide, withdraw, or pay to the stockholders, or any of them, any part of the capital stock, except as hereinafter provided, nor reduce or increase the capital stock, except as herein specially provided."

The trial court determined that the refunding certificates were violative of the provisions of the section, and we do not see how the same conclusion is to be avoided by us. There is no claim made by appellant that the real property mentioned in the certificates represents "surplus profits arising from the business" of respondent, even if we should be so hardy as to attempt to view them as an effort to declare dividends. In fact, appellant, directing our attention to a certain finding of the trial court, says that the lands "were at all times the gross assets of the defendant corporation." It is not contended that any sections of the Civil Code, other than section 309, make provision for such a payment as is contemplated by the refunding certificates. Appellant was clearly a stockholder of respondent, and not a lender of money to it. This much appears from the face of the certificates; and appellant himself, placing that construction upon the transaction, alleges in his complaint that his assignor "purchased of the defendant 100 shares of its capital stock and paid therefor the sum of $10,000 and in consideration therefor the defendant issued to" the assignor "10 refunding certificates." It is equally apparent that the certificates contemplated the payment to appellant of proceeds to arise from a disposition of a part of the corporate capital stock. These circumstances are to be viewed in connection with the further fact that from a time prior to the commencement of the action respondent has been badly if not overwhelmingly indebted. In such a situation appellant's certificates are to be considered from the standpoint of their effect upon the rights of creditors, whose claims are surely superior to his, even if it be admitted that he holds obligations of any validity whatever. Schulte v. Boulevard Gardens Co., 164 Cal. 464, 129 Pac. 582, 44 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1156, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 1013. The view of the trial court that the refunding clause of the certificates was unenforceable was undoubtedly correct. In addition to the section of the Code, and as illustrating the conditions under which it has a proper application, we cite, out of the many cases on the subject, the following: Kohl v. Lilienthal, 81 Cal. 378, 20 Pac. 401, 22 Pac. 689, 6 L. R. A. 520; Tapscott v. Mexican Colorado R. L. Co., 153 Cal. 664, 96 Pac. 271; Hedges v. Frink, 174 Cal. 552, 163 Pac. 884; Talcott Land Co. v. Hershiser (Sup.) 195 Pac. 653.

Appellant, contending for the validity of the obligations, advances a variety of arguments, but their invalidity, when they are placed beside section 309, is so palpable to us that it does not appear worth while to discuss the specific arguments presented.

In view of the conclusion we have reached on the merits of the question presented, we do not find it necessary to pass upon the contention, made by respondent and sustained by the trial court, that appellant's alleged cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations.

Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. ELDER. (Cr. 803.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Dec. 14, 1921. Rehearing Denied Jan. 13, 1922. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 9, 1922.)

1. Criminal law 🔑406(1), 516—"Admission" distinguished from "confession."

An admission is distinguished from a confession by the fact that the term "admission" relates to matters of fact that do not involve a criminal intent, and a confession is an acknowledgment of guilt.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Admission; Confession.]

2. Criminal law 🔑516—Statements of accused held admission of guilty conduct involving criminal intent.

Evidence of defendant's statements held admission of guilty conduct involving criminal intent, and hence a confession.

3. Criminal law 🔑406(1), 516—Statement of facts in excuse or not involving guilty intent are admissions, not confessions.

When the statement of guilty conduct is such that it does not involve a guilty intent, or where it constitutes facts amounting to justification or excuse for defendant's acts, it is admission rather than confession.

4. Criminal law 🔑531(4), 736(2)—Defendant can show that confession was not voluntary; whether defendant possessed his faculties when making confession a jury question.

Where on a trial for murder a witness testified that accused had made a confession freely and voluntarily, it was accused's right to call witnesses to show that he was coerced and unable to make a dependable statement, but where no request was made to do so the court properly admitted the evidence, and whether later evidence justified the conclusion that accused was not in possession of his faculties when he made the statements was for the jury in weighing the evidence.

5. Criminal law 🔑1173(2)—Failure to inform jury they should pass on question as to whether confession voluntary not prejudicial error.

In prosecution for murder held that defendant was not prejudiced by court's failure to inform the jury that it might pass upon the question as to whether the confession was voluntarily made.

6. Criminal law 🔑1186(4) — Refusal of instruction on weight to be given statements of victim held not reversible error.

In view of Const. art. 6, § 4½, where evidence of what accused's victim stated in his presence showing possible motive without response from accused was admitted, the refusal of an instruction that such statements were not evidence of facts related held not reversible error.

7. Homicide 🔑294(1) — Instruction on irresistible impulse as defense held justified.

In a prosecution for murder, where defendant made no defense that he did the shooting under the influence of an irresistible impulse, an instruction relating to irresistible impulse as a defense was not improper in view of testimony of state's witness that defendant said he "lost his head and lost complete control of himself."

8. Criminal law 🔑938(4)—No error in denying new trial for newly discovered evidence within knowledge of witness testifying at trial.

Where evidence could have been brought out by a witness who testified at trial, there was no error in overruling motion for new trial based on the ground of newly discovered evidence.

9. Homicide 🔑250—Testimony of eyewitness held to support verdict of murder.

In prosecution for homicide, where the evidence was conflicting if the jury believed the testimony of an eyewitness, it was ample to support a verdict of murder.

10. Criminal law 🔑1159(3)—Verdict on conflicting evidence not disturbed.

When the testimony is conflicting, the verdict will not be disturbed on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

James Elder was convicted of murder, and he appeals. Affirmed.

J. J. McMahon, Fred J. Spring, and C. W. Byrer, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CRAIG, J. This is an appeal taken from the judgment and sentence of life imprisonment, based upon the jury's verdict and from an order denying a motion for a new trial. The motion was made upon all of the statutory grounds. The defendant was convicted of murder in the first degree; he having been found guilty of the homicide of his wife. It appears without conflict that on the 22d day of September, 1920, he shot her with a 32-caliber revolver. She died 12 days later as a result of the wounds thus inflicted. The defendant saw his wife and one Clemmons standing under a tree in front of his residence. Defendant walked up to them and said, "Well, Ida, this is the Christian life you are leading." Mrs. Elder exclaimed, "My God! Jim Elder, my husband!" Defendant stepped back and fired at least two shots from his revolver. Ida M. Elder, the deceased, received two bullets. Upon the trial, these facts were not disputed by the defendant, but he claimed that before he shot, Clemmons had reached toward his pocket, and that the homicide was the result of the defendant's effort to lawfully defend himself and the accidental shooting of Mrs. Elder by reason of her having suddenly come forward as the shots were being fired. The jury, by its verdict, found against these contentions. The entire circumstances surrounding the homicide were before them, and, without here detailing them, it is sufficient to say that the record shows that there was ample evidence contradicting the defendant's version of the shooting to sustain the verdict of the jury.

The principal contention of the appellant has to do with the admission of an alleged confession, and instructions refused by the court on that subject.

[1, 2] The people insist that the evidence admitted of what the defendant is alleged to have said, and which appellants aver amounts to a confession, was in fact, only an admission. In this, we think they are mistaken. "An admission is distinguished from a confession by the fact that the term 'admission,' in criminal matters, relates to matters of fact that do not involve a criminal intent, and a confession is an acknowledgment of guilt." Wharton's Crim. Ev. § 622a.

Appellant does not indicate what part of the statement attributed to the defendant as a confession is regarded as objectionable; however, the salient points of it as related by Officer Taylor are:

> "Well it is a long story. We have been married over 20 years. In Pennsylvania I had lots of trouble with my wife. We had separated there, and I divided up my property with her, and gave her half of what I had."

Defendant is alleged to have said further that his wife was continually nagging at him, and about five weeks prior to September 22d she had left him and was running around with married men; that on the night of the shooting he saw her come out of the house and start talking to Clemmons. They were standing in the parking under a tree. He (Elder) went towards them, and when he got to them his wife turned around and shouted, "Murder!" Taylor testified:

> "He said he lost his head and complete control of himself, and so I asked him how many times he shot at her, and he said he thought twice. * * * He said he was very sorry for what had happened, and hoped his wife would get well."

[3] Some other but immaterial statements were contained in Taylor's version of the confession, but nothing is alleged to have been said by Elder that could be regarded as in the slightest degree a justification or excuse. This statement is an admission of guilty conduct which involves criminal intent. If the defendant had made this statement as a witness at the trial, no other evidence would have been necessary to have sustained the verdict which the jury returned. The specific intent to kill would have been presumed from the guilty conduct admitted by him. People v. Fowler, 178 Cal. 665, 174 Pac. 892, cited by respondent is not in point. There the defendant expressly negatived the idea that his conduct was accompanied by a criminal intent by declaring that he had acted in self-defense and by a further statement of facts which if true would have supported that plea. When the statement of guilty conduct is such that it does not involve a criminal intent, or where it constitutes facts amounting to justification or excuse for the defendant's acts, it is an admission rather than a confession. Such are the following cases cited by respondent: People v. Weston, 169 Cal. 393, 146 Pac. 871; People v. Fowler, 178 Cal. 657, 174 Pac. 892; People v. Wilkins, 158 Cal. 530, 111 Pac. 612; People v. Le Roy, 65 Cal. 613, 4 Pac. 649.

[4] However, the usual formal foundation was laid for the admission of the confession. Officer Taylor was the witness who related it. Before doing so he stated that it was given freely and voluntarily, without any promise of immunity or hope of reward having been offered or any violence having been used upon the defendant to induce him to make a statement. But appellant insists that Elder was in such a condition when he made the confession and had been so mistreated before then that what he said cannot be regarded as having been uttered freely and voluntarily.

The greater part of the occurrences which appellant claims transpired had not been testified to by any witness when the objections to the confession were overruled by the court and the confession admitted in evidence. It was the right of counsel to have offered evidence by calling the defendant or other witnesses to show that he had been coerced or was otherwise unable to make a voluntary or dependable statement, but no request was made to do this. The court could only rule upon defendant's objection in the light of the evidence as then contained in the record. The confession was said to have been made at about 11 o'clock on the 23d of September. The only violence which defendant had received as related by any witness who had testified was on the evening of the 22d of September at about 8 o'clock p. m. This happened at the time the officers arrested him. Officer Taylor testified that defendant resisted arrest, and that in the fight which occurred in subduing him, Elder had received a number of bruises and wounds, and had lost his glasses. Dr. Schiffbauer, the assistant police surgeon, had testified that at about 8 o'clock on the 22d of September he had dressed appellant's wounds; that the nose was broken, and there were three or four superficial scalp wounds. Both this witness and Officer Taylor had declared that Elder was not dazed. Officer Taylor had testified that before making the statement contained in the confession defendant had been taken to the receiving hospital three times to see his wife; that he had walked unassisted; that on these trips he made no statements, but did not say that he did not want to talk. In this state of the record we think the court properly overruled the objection to the question in response to which the confession was related. But if the evidence justified the conclusion that the defendant was not in full possession of his faculties when he made the statement in question, this did not result in its being inadmissible, but would be a matter to be considered by the jury in connection with their duty to weigh the evidence. People v. Miller, 135 Cal. 69, 67 Pac. 12.

[5] The defendant requested the following instruction:

> "In this case the prosecution was allowed to introduce as testimony in the case certain alleged statements of the defendant which the prosecution claims to be a confession of guilt on the part of the defendant. Before permitting this testimony to be introduced, the court required preliminary proof to establish the fact that such alleged statement or confession on the part of the defendant was voluntary, and was not made under threats or violence or because of promises or other improper inducements. The defendant has offered testimony to establish the fact that such alleged statement or confession was not voluntary, and was therefore not admissible as testimony in this case.
> "You are instructed that the action on the part of the court in admitting such alleged statement or confession into evidence does not bind you to accept the court's conclusion, and that the question as to whether such alleged confession or statement, if made, was voluntary or not is for you to decide. If you conclude that it was not made voluntarily, then you have the right to, and it is your duty to, disregard the same altogether. In other words, you have the right to reconsider the question as to whether the same was voluntary or not, and in this connection are the judges of the value and effect of evidence, and of the credibility of the witnesses, as the same pertains to such alleged statement or alleged confession."

This the court refused to give. Undoubtedly the offered instruction contains a correct statement of the law to the effect that if there is a substantial conflict in the evidence the jury may reconsider the question as to whether or not the confession was voluntarily made. That matter is primarily for the court, for the purpose of determining the admissibility of the statement. Nevertheless, the jury should be instructed that it is still within its province to pass upon the matter and finally decide as to whether or not the confession was voluntarily made. People v. Fowler, 178 Cal. 657, 174 Pac. 892. The defendant's version of the treatment he had received did not show that any statement he made to Officer Taylor at 11 o'clock on the 23d of September was other than a voluntary one. He claimed that he did not remember making the statement related by Taylor. Defendant testified that—

> He was throwing cold water on his head to ease the pain, and an officer told him not to do that; that Officer Taylor and the witness got to talking, and that "Mr. Taylor said to me 'I am your friend, Jim,' and we got to talking about my home, and I was inferring about leaving the room unlocked, and that is about all the conversation that I can recall."

It is true that defendant alleged that on the night of the 22d and the one previous to the day he is said to have made the confession he had been struck by officers. This he said happened first in the fight with Officer Johnson, when the arrest was made; again he said other officers struck him in the jaw at the jail. He was taken to the hospital, where his wife was, but he does not say that he objected to going. He asserts that he was cross-examined before being taken to the hospital the first time. Further than this he does not claim that he was cross-examined, nor that his talk with Officer Taylor was forced or involuntary. The record does not support appellant's assertion that defendant had been "constantly surrounded" by officers. It appears that he had been left alone from about 2 o'clock of the 22d to shortly before 11 o'clock of the following day. Nor does the record show that "the sweating process was renewed the next morning." According to defendant he had received superficial scalp wounds and a broken nose. There is no evidence to indicate that he was not mentally clear or that any confession he may have made was in any way induced by the rough treatment received the night before. In the instant case, therefore, we cannot say that the defendant was prejudiced by the failure of the court to inform the jury that it might pass upon the question as to whether or not the confession was voluntarily made.

It will not be necessary to consider another instruction offered as defendant's No. 17, which was modified so as to strike out a sentence which involves the same principle of law as the one we have last discussed.

[6] A further instruction offered by the defendant was also refused. It reads:

> "Testimony has been introduced in this case as to certain statements made by Ida Elder in the presence of the defendant, while at the receiving hospital after the shooting occurred. You are instructed that such statements are not in themselves evidence of any fact narrated in such statement, and are admissible only for the purpose of showing that the defendant acquiesced in such statement either by express assent, or by silence, or by such conduct as fairly implied assent."

The witness Officer Taylor testified that the defendant was brought into the room at the receiving hospital, where his wife was lying on a cot, and in answer to questions that she there stated, among other things, in the presence of Elder:

> "He is my husband, James Elder. He shot me as I fell down," and "I do not remember anything else." "He wanted me to sign a quitclaim deed to some property, and I did not want to do it, and did not"

—and that Elder made no response. The instruction in question was an accurate and true statement of the law as applied to the circumstances in this part of the instant case. People v. Mallon, 103 Cal. 513, 37 Pac. 512. This error would require reversal if the refusal to give the instruction could reasonably be regarded as having affected the substantial rights of the defendant. Appellant insists that the reference to Mrs. Elder's refusal to sign the deed provided a motive otherwise lacking in the people's case, but proof of motive is not essential to a conviction. People v. Weston, 169 Cal. 393, 146 Pac. 871. Again no stronger motive could be required than that which might be inferred from the circumstances, established without contradiction, of the defendant finding his wife in company with Clemmons. With proper regard to the provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, the error here under consideration does not warrant this court in ordering a reversal.

[7] The court gave the following instruction:

> "The law does not recognize the plea of irresistible impulse as a defense to crime, but responsibility depends upon the question whether or not the accused was conscious of and knew the nature of the act committed, at the time of its commission, and whether it was wrong, and if he did thus know and appreciate the nature of the act committed, at the time of its commission and whether it was wrong, and if he did thus know and appreciate the nature of his act, then he did the act at his peril, and the plea of irresistible impulse will not avail him."

It is not claimed that the law is otherwise than as stated, but the ground upon which it is urged that error was committed in giving it is that the defendant did not plead or offer testimony to establish that he did the shooting under the influence of an irresistible impulse. Referring to defendant's version of what took place at the shooting, one witness referring to Elder, testified, "He said he lost his head and lost complete control of himself." We think this was sufficient to justify the giving of the instruction concerning which complaint is made. It is not material that this testimony was given by a witness called by the people. Unless informed as to the law the jury may have concluded that the defendant, if unable to control himself, should not be held legally responsible. The instruction does not assert or assume that the defendant had attempted to base a claim of innocence upon the proposition that he had been compelled to shoot by an irresistible impulse. It merely states an abstract principle of law which, as such, is clearly correct.

We now proceed to the assignment of error in regard to the testimony of the witness Dr. A. F. Wagner. It is the contention of appellant that the memorandum made by the doctor at the time of the performance by him of an autopsy upon the body of Ida M. Elder was read to the jury. However, the record fails to substantiate this claim, but instead indicates that the notes were used merely to refresh the memory of the witness. The question which called for the answer embodying the testimony to which objection is made was:

> "Q. State to the jury, refreshing your memory from your notes, if you desire to do so, the findings of your autopsy."

[8] The motion for a new trial was based upon the ground of newly discovered evidence. That which it is said was discovered after the trial is the alleged fact Clemmons, the man who was with Mrs. Elder as the time of the homicide, received one of the bullets. Clemmons was a witness at the trial. He was called by the people and cross-examined at length by defendant's counsel. Ample opportunity was afforded defendant to have learned that Clemmons was shot. The record does not show that any question was asked in response to which he should have stated that fact. No attempt is made to point out such a question or to call our attention to evidence by which defendant may have been mislead or given the idea that the witness was not shot. He did testify that he was shot two or three times. No questions were asked as to what the third shot struck or in which direction it was fired. Under these circumstances we cannot say that the trial court erred in refusing the motion for a new trial. This is a matter which is always largely in its discretion. People v. Sullivan, 3 Cal. App. 502, 86 Pac. 834.

[9] The last ground relied upon for reversal is that the verdict was not supported by the evidence. If the witness Clemmons' version of the tragedy was believed by the jury there can be no doubt but that the evidence was ample to support the verdict. He testified in substance that while Mrs. Elder and the witness were standing about four feet apart on the sidewalk the defendant, without the slightest warning, appeared and fired two or three shots, the first one of which struck the deceased. As she fell she said "Why, Jim Elder." These were the only words spoken. "It was like rain from a clear sky."

[10] Of course, the defendant gave evidence, contradicted, however, by Clemmons, which, if believed, would show that he shot in self-defense, but it needs no citation of authority to establish that where the testimony is conflicting the verdict of the jury will not be disturbed.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: FINLAYSON, P. J.; WORKS, J.

55 Cal. App. 603

SOMMER et ux. v. MARTIN et al.
(Civ. 4044.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 13, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 9, 1922.)

1. Negligence ⟹119(6) — Defendant must prove contributory negligence.

Contributory negligence must be pleaded and proved by the defendants, unless it appears from the testimony given in the plaintiffs' case.

2. Municipal corporations ⟹706(7)—Evidence held not to show as matter of law that pedestrian failed to look before stepping into street.

In an action for injuries to a woman who was struck by an automobile while preparing to enter a street car, evidence that the woman did not look in either direction after she stepped into the street, but without showing that she failed to look before stepping from the curb, does not show, as a matter of law, contributory negligence.

3. Municipal corporations ⟹706(7)—Evidence held not to show contributory negligence as matter of law in stepping back against automobile.

Evidence that plaintiff, who was intending to board a street car, stepped to one side to permit a passenger to alight from the street car and was struck by defendant's automobile, does not show, as a matter of law, that she was contributorily negligent for stepping back against the automobile.

4. Appeal and error 🔑1004(2)—Verdict supported by testimony of plaintiff, though contradicted, not set aside as excessive.

Where the testimony on behalf of the plaintiff as to the severity of her injuries, the pain she suffered, and the expenditures caused thereby was sufficient to warrant the verdict, it will not be set aside as excessive, though such testimony was contradicted by the evidence on behalf of defendant.

5. Evidence 🔑471(17)—Question whether defendant could have done anything to avoid accident calls for conclusion.

In an action for injuries to a pedestrian struck by an automobile, a question asked the defendant driver whether there was anything he could have done that he did not do to avoid the accident was objectionable as calling for a conclusion.

6. Evidence 🔑492—Boy held qualified to testify as to speed of automobile.

A 14 year old boy who testified he had driven an automobile for a year and a half, that there was no speedometer on his car, but that he had driven other cars that had such appliances and had watched the speedometer to gauge his speed, and could estimate from his experience the speed of the automobile which struck plaintiff, was properly permitted to testify as to the speed.

7. Trial 🔑191(7)—Instruction in language of motor vehicle act held not to assume plaintiff was entering a street car.

An instruction following closely the rule stated in Motor Vehicle Act, § 12, was not objectionable as assuming that plaintiff was in the act of entering a street car, since it could be equally claimed that it assumed that she was leaving the street car or was a pedestrian in the street.

8. Appeal and error 🔑171(1)—Defendants' stipulation that ordinance could be read in evidence precludes objection to competency on appeal.

Where the parties stipulated at the trial that a city ordinance regulating the operation of motor vehicles could be considered as in evidence, and that either party might read therefrom any sections desired, and that the ordinance restricted the speed of automobiles to 20 miles an hour at the place of the accident, the defendant, having tried the case below on the theory that the ordinance was in effect, cannot seek reversal of the judgment on the ground that the ordinance has been superseded by the state law.

9. Negligence 🔑139(1) — Instruction using "only" in definition objectionable.

A requested instruction purporting to define ordinary care was of doubtful soundness, where it used in such definition the word "only," which tended to belittle the duty resting on defendant.

10. Trial 🔑260(1)—Requested instruction already covered need not be given.

It was not error to refuse a requested instruction, even if it was correct, where the subject-matter thereof had been fully covered by another instruction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

Action by Henry Sommer and wife against J. A. Martin and others to recover damages for personal injuries to the wife. Judgment for the plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Mattison B. Jones, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

E. S. Williams, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiffs, as husband and wife, commenced an action against the defendants to recover damages for injuries sustained by being struck by an automobile which one of the defendants was driving. The defendants answered, and a trial was had by the court sitting with a jury. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs; the defendants moved for a new trial; the motion was denied on condition that the plaintiffs would remit $1,000, which they did, and from the judgment as modified the defendants have appealed, bringing up the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions.

1. The first point made by the appellants in their brief is that the plaintiff wife was guilty of contributory negligence. Under this attack the appellants claim that Mrs. Sommer, immediately preceding the accident, stepped into the street without looking to her right or to her left. She testified in answer to certain questions as follows:

"Q. You went out—as you went out toward the street car there was an automobile or more to your left? A. I don't remember that.

"Q. Would you say there was not? A. I would not say because I don't remember."

In another place she testified as follows:

"Q. You say you went out into the roadbed with a view of getting this car and at that time you had not seen the automobile? A. No, sir.

"Q. You did not see it at all, but the first you knew was the gush of wind and the bump? A. Yes, sir. The car was stopped at the time. I do not know how long it had been stopped."

The defendant J. A. Martin testified:

"Q. When did you first see Mrs. Sommer? A. When she first emerged from in front of an automobile standing at the curb approximately opposite the telegraph pole indicated on the drawing. * * *

"Q. What did she do after emerging from behind the automobile? A. She ran or was in haste to hail this street car. She ran out there with her hand up like this, looking at the car, never stopping to look right or left."

Mrs. Hallie Barker, one of the defendants' witnesses testified:

"Q. How close was she to the car when you first passed her? A. She was coming to it; she was about middle way; just came in front of this automobile. She was still out in front of it in the street. * * * She was coming across in front of this car when I first seen her. I didn't see her leave the sidewalk at all."

Mrs. Nettie Sheoff, a witness called by the defendants, testified:

"As the car was slowing down, I saw through the open door, through the open door of the car, the back part of the car, a lady standing there, and as the car passed her she stepped back; I don't know what for; I thought she was going back to the sidewalk. Just at that instant when the car had passed and she was about the steps, I saw an automobile, and she hit the fender of the auto."

Mr. Overpeck, a witness called by the defendants, testified that he was employed in Ralph's grocery store. That store was located directly back of the plaintiff. The witness was, at the time of the accident, dressing a window of the store. He was facing the back of the plaintiff. Referring to the plaintiff, he testified:

"She left the curb and went out with her hand in the air. I think it was her right hand. She held her hand up to the height of her face. At that time she was looking directly at the electric car. I did not see her look to the right or left."

[1, 2] The plea of contributory negligence is an element that must be pleaded and proved by the defendants, unless the evidence appears from the testimony given in the plaintiff's case. The foregoing testimony shows to some extent what the plaintiff did while she was out in the street, but it does not show what she did before leaving the sidewalk in reference to looking up or down the street. We cannot say that, as a matter of law, respondent was guilty of contributory negligence, that is, that all the facts plainly and inevitably point to such negligence, leaving no room for argument or doubt. Mann v. Scott, 180 Cal. 550, 552, 182 Pac. 281.

[3] Regarding this same plea, the appellants contend that when the plaintiff was at the side of the electric car, and at the time that the defendant J. A. Martin drove his automobile alongside of the car, the plaintiff stepped back one step and collided with the automobile. On this same subject the plaintiff testified:

"When the street car came along I was standing in the street. I went out into the street before it came along to be there to get it. The car came to a stop. When it came to a stop I was right at the steps. A lady got off and I stepped aside to let her off. When she started to get off I was just a little ahead of the rear steps of the car. I was too close to her to let her off. I stepped aside so she could get down. All the rest I remember is just a big gush of wind and a bump."

From the foregoing testimony we are not inclined to hold that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence.

2. We are not clear that the appellants are contending that the evidence was not sufficient to show that the defendant J. A. Martin was guilty of negligence. If such is their contention, it will suffice to state that on that element of the case the most that can be said is that the evidence was conflicting. There was an abundance of testimony which, if the jury believed it, would readily support a verdict in favor of the plaintiff.

[4] 3. The appellants contend that the verdict was excessive, but, under the facts shown by the record we are not at liberty to so hold. According to the testimony of the plaintiff and her witnesses, she was knocked down in the street and was, by the defendant J. A. Martin, or others, picked up, put in an automobile, conveyed to her home, and at that place she was lifted from one place to another and was compelled to be, and was, undressed by other persons. She was in such terrible pain and agony that she could not bear to have anybody touch her. She was hit and bruised on her body, on her left arm, and the whole of her left side. Both ankles were skinned and strained; she was hit all over. From one bed she was removed to another in a sheet because she could not stand to be touched. She remained in bed from a month to six weeks, and then went down to have some X-rays taken; at that time she was carried to the machine and into the office and back to the machine; after that she became worse; and she returned to her bed and remained there another month or six weeks. During the first month or six weeks the pain was terrible and it continued night and day—there was no let-up to it; during the first month or six weeks she did not sleep at all; she experienced pain all the time for at least a year and a half; it was that long before she could move her arm. She further testified that Dr. Abbott worked with her left arm until he got it into place. Before the accident the plaintiff did all her own work, including laundry, cooking, sweeping, and cleaning, but since the accident she has never been able to do this work. At the time of the trial she was able to do her cooking and a little work. She paid Dr. Abbott $75; for the first 23 weeks she was compelled to employ help at $3.20 for each week, and then for 28 weeks she was compelled to employ help to the extent of $2.60 for each week. She paid another doctor $29 and she paid $19.50 for medicines, etc. Her daughter, who had been employed at $18 a week, was compelled to remain at home to care for her mother for a period of nine weeks. As to many of the foregoing matters, it is but fair to the appellants to state, there is evidence tending to refute the seriousness of the pains and injuries which the plaintiff claims to have suffered. But, if the jury believed the story as told by the plaintiff, its verdict was not excessive.

[5] 4. When the defendant J. A. Martin was on the stand as a witness his counsel asked him:

> "Q. Was there anything you could have done that you did not do to avoid the accident?"

Counsel for the plaintiff objected to the question as calling for the conclusion of the witness. The objection was sustained. There was no error in the ruling.

[6] 5. Ralph Kelly was called as a witness by the plaintiffs. At the time of the accident he was about 14 years of age. He testified that he had driven an automobile for about a year and a half. There was no speedometer on his car, but he had driven other cars that had such an appliance attached. He said he had watched speedometers to gauge his speed. He was asked the question:

> "And from that experience can you make an estimate as to how fast that automobile which struck the woman was traveling at the time that it struck her?"

Counsel for the defendants objected to the question on the ground that no foundation was laid. The court overruled the objection, and in so ruling the court did not commit an error. 22 C. J. 567, § 676. The witness answered the question that the automobile was traveling between 20 and 25 miles per hour.

[7] 6. The court gave an instruction to the jury that follows very closely the rule stated in the motor vehicle act approved May 10, 1915. Stats. 1915, c. 188, § 12. The appellants attack the instruction on the ground that it assumes that the plaintiff was in the act of entering a street car at the time of the collision. The attack is wholly without merit. It could equally be claimed that the instruction assumed that she was leaving the street car, or that she was neither entering nor leaving, but was a pedestrian in the street.

[8] 7. During the trial the plaintiffs introduced the traffic ordinance of the city of Los Angeles in effect on November 14, 1917. The defendants made no objections, but stipulated that the whole ordinance should be deemed in evidence and that either party might read such sections thereof as they desired. Counsel for the plaintiff read from the ordinance:

> "It shall be unlawful for the driver of any vehicle, upon overtaking any street car or interurban railway car which is stopped for the purpose of discharging or taking on any passengers, to fail, neglect, or refuse to stop such vehicle at least ten feet in the rear of such street car or interurban railway car and to keep such vehicle standing where so stopped until such passengers or intending passengers have safely alighted from or boarded said street or interurban railway car or until such street or interurban railway car shall have started."

It was also stipulated that paragraph 80 of said ordinance provided that speed limit of vehicles on Vermont avenue at the place the accident occurred, that is to say, along and upon Vermont avenue in the neighborhood of Thirty-fifth place, was 20 miles per hour, and that said traffic ordinance prohibited a speed in excess of 20 miles an hour on that part of Vermont avenue. Thereafter, on the request of the plaintiffs, the court gave two instructions based on the provisions of said ordinance. At no time was the attention of the lower court called to the question as to whether the state statute or the ordinance of Los Angeles was controlling. Since the instant case was tried in the lower court the Supreme Court has decided the case entitled Ex parte Daniels, 183 Cal. 636, 192 Pac. 442. The appellants at this time seek to apply to the instant case the doctrine announced in the Daniels Case. By reason of the foregoing facts, we think that they are not at this time entitled to make that contention. In the trial court both parties proceeded on the theory that the traffic ordinance of the city of Los Angeles was applicable to the trial of certain features of this case. The defendants did not raise the question in the lower court: they are not therefore entitled to raise the question in this court.

> "Besides, it is due to the judge, in furtherance of justice, that his attention should be called to the legal principle which is claimed to be violated by the admission or rejection of the evidence. In the hurry of the trial many things may be, and are, overlooked which would readily have been rectified had attention been called to them. The law casts upon the party the duty of looking after his legal rights, and of calling the judge's attention to any infringement of them. If any other rule were to obtain, the party would, in most cases, be careful to be silent as to his objections until it would be too late to obviate them, and the result would be that few judgments would stand the test of an appeal." Hayne, New Trial and Appeal, vol. 1, § 103.

In the case of Horace F. Wood Transfer Co. v. Shelton, 180 Ind. 273, 279, 101 N. E. 718, 720, the court said:

> "In attacking instructions Nos. 7, 9, 13 and 14 given by the court on its own motion, appellant seeks to question the validity of an ordinance of the city of Indianapolis providing a speed limit for automobiles within a certain prescribed territory in said city. During the progress of the trial the attorney for appellees read in evidence the ordinance in question and asked 'There is no question about the validity and force of this?' To which one of the attorneys for appellant replied: 'Oh, no.' Later it was suggested that a subsequent attack might be made on the ordinance in case of appeal, to which the attorney stated: 'That is an immaterial point. We will let it go just the way it is.' It is a familiar rule that a party is restricted on appeal to the theory adopted at the trial and 'when a theory is thus adopted, and acted upon below, with the concurrence of both parties, a judgment ought not be reversed because the court instructs the jury in accordance with it.' Carver v. Carver (1884) 97 Ind. 497, 516. See, also, Graham v. Nowlin (1876) 54 Ind. 389."

The case last cited dealt with a municipal ordinance. However, the rule seems to be general with reference to the law applicable to the case on trial. 3 C. J. 723, § 619.

[9, 10] 8. The defendants requested, and the trial court refused to give, two instructions; the appellants assign each refusal as error. The first proposed instruction purported to define ordinary care. The instruction was of doubtful soundness because of the use of the word "only." That word tended to belittle the duty resting on the defendant J. A. Martin. But, whether the instruction was correct or incorrect, the subject-matter was fully covered by an instruction which appears in the transcript (folios 371 and 372). The other instruction picked out a portion of the evidence and purported to be an instruction on the subject of contributory negligence. The court had covered that subject fully by giving the instructions which it did give and which are set forth in the transcript (folios 392–394, 430, 431).

An examination of the record shows that the trial court committed no error whatsoever.

The judgment is affirmed.

CUDDY v. O'BRIEN et al. (Civ. 4038.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 1, 1921. Rehearing Denied Dec. 23, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 30, 1922.)

1. Quieting title 🔑44(1) — Lease of spring held not so uncertain as to be void, and burden was on plaintiff to offer evidence in avoidance.

A lease of a spring on land with right to develop and maintain a pipe line held not so uncertain as to be void, and assignee of lessee in action by lessor to quiet title was entitled to rest after proving the execution of the lease, and thereby cast the burden upon the plaintiff to offer evidence upon any defense in avoidance.

2. Quieting title 🔑44(2)—Testimony as to defendant's failure to pay rent held inadmissible in action to quiet title.

In action to quiet title, where defendant set up a lease of a spring with right to maintain pipes, and there was no attempt to show nonpayment of rent, or any rent, resulting in a forfeiture of the rights of the defendant under the lease, court did not err in sustaining an objection to question as to whether defendant paid the rent for a certain month.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; T. N. Harvey, Judge.

Action by J. D. Cuddy against Thomas O'Brien and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

E. F. Brittan and Kaye & Siemon, all of Bakersfield, for appellant.

E. J. Emmons, of Bakersfield, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendants to obtain a judgment quieting his title to certain lands in Kern county. The defendants had judgment, and the plaintiff has appealed therefrom, bringing up the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions.

The plaintiff's complaint was in the ordinary form of a complaint to quiet title, and described the lands as being:

The "southeast quarter of southeast quarter of section 28, township 9 north, range 19 west, S. B. B. & M. north half of northeast quarter of section 33, township 9 north, range 19 west, S. B. B. & M."

The defendants Thomas O'Brien and N. C. Farnum appeared by their attorney and filed an answer, admitting that the defendant O'Brien claimed an interest and pleaded that the defendant O'Brien claimed such interest under and by virtue of a written instrument as follows:

"This indenture made this 12th day of April, 1917, between J. D. Cuddy, of Kern county, Cal., the party of the first part, and N. C. Farnum, of Alameda county, Cal., the party of the second part, witnesseth:

"That for and in consideration of $10 in hand paid, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, the first party does by these presents lease and demise unto the said second party or his assigns, for the term of 50 years, at an annual rental of $10, payable in advance on the 1st day of May of each year, and other valuable considerations, that certain spring located on the northerly half of section 33, township 9 north, range 19 west, S. B. B. & M., Kern county, Cal., including a right of way across the above-described land, 8 feet wide, for the passing of conveyances, and a pipe line for the conveyance of water from a spring situate near the center of the north half of said section 33 to the easterly line thereof, with the right to improve the said spring by trying to produce more water, also the right to fence said springs, inclosing 50 feet square of land with a suitable fence, and improve the spring by building a dam, and covering the spring in any manner he may desire, and also to dig a trench on above-mentioned right of way, from said spring to the easterly line of said above-described section 33 to a depth of 2 feet to receive the water pipe above mentioned. The party of the second part agrees to lay a small iron pipe from above-described spring in a northeasterly direction to furnish water to the cattle of the first party. It is further agreed by and between the parties to this lease that should the above-mentioned spring fail from any cause to furnish the amount of water required by second party or his assigns, the first party hereby grants to second party or his assigns the right to develop two other springs belonging to first party to use the water as developed under the same conditions, rights, and privileges, as agreed on for first-mentioned spring; spring No. 2 is situate northerly of 1, and is said to be in N. E. ¼ of N. E. ¼ of section 33, T. 9 north, R. 19 west, S. B. B. & M.; spring 3 is situated to the northerly from spring No. 2, and is said to be located on the S. E. ¼ of section 28, T. 9 N., R. 19 west, S. B. B. & M. The party of the second part agrees to furnish enough water for the party of the first part to water cattle if the springs will supply same for both.

"In witness whereof, the said parties to these presents have hereunto set their hands and seals, the day and year first above written.

"J. D. Cuddy. [Seal.]
"Florence Louise Cuddy. [Seal.]
"N. C. Farnum. [Seal.]

"Signed, sealed, and delivered in the presence of witness: L. L. Bateman."

It was also alleged in the answer that, subsequent to its execution, said instrument was assigned to Thomas O'Brien, and he is now the owner and holder thereof. Thereafter, and in due time, the plaintiff filed an affidavit denying the due execution of said instrument by the lessor. The court, in finding 2, found the existence of said instrument, setting the same forth in hæc verba. In its judgment the court again set forth the said instrument.

[1] On the trial of the case, without introducing any evidence, the plaintiff rested because the allegations of his complaint were not denied. Thereupon the defendants produced from their possession the said written instrument and called witnesses to prove the due execution of the same. The plaintiff cross-examined such witnesses with reference to the due execution of the instrument. After the defendants had rested, the plaintiff called witnesses to rebut the due execution of the instrument and did not tender any other issue. The gravamen of the complaint of the plaintiff on this appeal is to the effect that said written instrument is uncertain, and that the findings and judgment do not tend to clarify the uncertainties therein contained. The written instrument is not so uncertain as to be void. To sustain this proposition we do not deem it necessary to do more than to refer to said instrument. The plaintiff contends that the written instrument, if enforceable at all, required parol evidence to explain its terms and to fix its application. Conceding, without deciding, that that proposition is correct, when the plaintiff follows with the next contention that the duty to offer such evidence rested on the defendants, we think that the plaintiff is in error. In this behalf plaintiff claims that the doctrine declared in Moore v. Copp, 119 Cal. 429, 51 Pac. 630, covers this case. The defendants do not dispute that contention. Following the doctrine as stated in that case, the plaintiff in the instant case was entitled to rest his case in chief without introducing any evidence. Furthermore, the defendants were entitled to prove the due execution of the indenture of lease, and to introduce the same, and thereupon to rest. Still following the doctrine in Moore v. Copp, the plaintiff was entitled, in rebuttal, to offer evidence upon any defense in avoidance; or, as stated in Wolf v. Gall, 176 Cal. 787, 790, 169 Pac. 1017, 1018:

> "It is abundantly settled that under issues framed as here, the plaintiffs could, as their attorney represented to the court, overcome the effect of the deed and so destroy its validity upon either equitable or legal ground. Moore v. Copp, 119 Cal. 436, 51 Pac. 630; Johnson v. Taylor, 150 Cal. 201, 119 Am. St. Rep. 181, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 818, 88 Pac. 903; Hermosa Beach Land, etc., Co. v. Law Credit Co., 175 Cal. 493, 166 Pac. 22."

However, the plaintiff did not see fit to introduce evidence (1) showing that spring No. 1 was not located on the north half of the northeast quarter of section 33, or (2) as to the exact amount of water that would be used by the appellant or the exact amount that was to be used by the lessee, or (3) that the lands described in the lease were different from the lands described in the complaint, or (4) as to the exact boundaries of the right of way referred to in said lease, or as to whether a right of way was already marked on the ground, or (5) that the leasehold described had been terminated, forfeited, or lost. During the trial, it appeared incidentally that before the said written instrument was reduced to writing the lessee and the lessor held long conversations regarding the terms of the lease, but the plaintiff made no attempt whatsoever to clarify any of the terms of the instrument in question. In this behalf, it is of importance to note that during the proceedings in the trial court every person who was present and heard the preliminary conversations, and every person who was familiar with any fact that would have tended to clarify the language of the lease, was present in the courtroom and was called as a witness with reference to some matters, but such persons were not questioned by the plaintiff on any matters which would have tended to clarify those subjects he now claims are obscure. Under these circumstances the plaintiff may not be heard to complain because the trial court did not make findings on issues which should have been tendered by the plaintiff if the plaintiff wanted a finding thereon.

[2] There was no error in the ruling of the trial court sustaining an objection to the question as to whether the respondent O'Brien paid any rent for the month of May, 1918. It was not an action for debt, neither was it an action on a contract, and there was no attempt to show that the nonpayment of a month's rent, or any rent, had resulted in a forfeiture of all the rights of the lessee under the indenture of lease.

We find no error in the record. The judgment is affirmed.

EDWARDS v. WILSON. (Civ. 3576.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Dec. 21, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 16, 1922.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑501(5)—Bill of exceptions must specify errors to be considered.

Where the bill of exceptions makes no specification of error or of insufficiency of evidence to support the findings, the record will not permit the court to consider these matters.

2. Appeal and error 🔑672—Whether findings support judgment may be determined by examining judgment roll.

Whether the findings support the judgment may be determined by an examination of the judgment roll.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

Action by C. L. Edwards against John Floyd Wilson. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Joseph Musgrove, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Arnold Praeger and William A. Sumner, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. [1] The greater part of the appellant's brief is devoted to a consideration of the evidence and an attempt to point out wherein the evidence is insufficient to sustain the findings. As the bill of exceptions makes no specifications of error or of insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings, the record will not permit this court to consider these matters.

[2] The third ground urged is that the findings do not support the judgment. This, of course, may be determined by an examination of the judgment roll. Appellant has pointed out but one particular in which it is claimed that reversible error was committed as shown by the judgment roll alone. Finding 1, in referring to the status of the ownership of the property to be exchanged by Nelson used this language: "A certain other piece of real estate. * * * Being purchased by and to be owned by defendant John F. Nelson." It is asserted that this is inconsistent with that part of the judgment which directs that the acceptance be reformed to read: "This agreement witnesseth: That John F. Nelson is the owner of the second piece of property," etc. To recite in the judgment and "have the legal effect of the words." The acceptance thus worded represented that Nelson owned the property. This went beyond the contract providing for the payment of a commission on "procuring the acceptance by John F. Nelson to trade the property being purchased by and to be owned by defendant John F. Nelson." Nothing in the judgment roll shows that Nelson did not own the property. If he did appellant was not prejudiced by the fact that the contract between the real estate agent and defendant recited that it was only then being purchased by him.

The judgment is affirmed.

BALCOM v. F. A. SHIPLEY CO. et al. (Civ. 4032.)

1. Witnesses 🔑275(8)—Cross-examination of defendant's agent examined by plaintiff held proper.

In an action against warehouse for conversion of beans, where plaintiff placed officer of defendant corporation on stand and had him identify warehouse receipts and caused him to testify that none of the beans were delivered to plaintiff, but that they were delivered to plaintiff's selling agent, it was proper on cross-examination for defendant to show that certain tickets were not originals, and that all of the beans had been delivered to plaintiff's agent.

2. Trial 🔑49—Ruling on objection to hearsay held correct.

Where witness testified that another had told him certain facts and opposing counsel objected to the testimony as hearsay, a ruling of the court that what was told to witness would be simply hearsay, and that witness should refrain from telling what he did not know himself, was correct and as exact as the occasion permitted.

3. Appeal and error 🔑1047(1)—No prejudice in failing to limit evidence.

Where plaintiff's attorney testified as witness and defendant asked him questions concerning his contract of employment which provided for a contingent fee, and contract was produced and offered in evidence, and plaintiff's attorney objected to the introduction for any purpose other than to show his interest as it might affect his testimony, there was no prejudicial error in court's failure to limit the testimony, where there was nothing in the instrument pertinent for or against either of the parties litigant, except as showing interest of the witness.

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

4. Trial 🔑79, 90—Neither renewal of objection nor motion to strike necessary on repeating question.

When an objection to evidence has been overruled, it is not necessary for the party objecting to renew his objection when the question is repeated and answered by the witness, or to move to strike out the answer.

5. Appeal and error 🔑237(2)—Motion to strike out evidence objected to unnecessary.

Where objection is made to question and overruled and question is then answered by the witness, it is not necessary to a review on appeal that a motion be made to strike out the answer.

6. Trial 🔑412—Re-examination of witness not a waiver of objections to questions propounded by opponent on cross-examination.

Re-examination by plaintiff of witness on subjects on which he was questioned on cross-examination by the defendant over the objection of the plaintiff is not waiver of all objections made on the relevancy of the cross-examination.

Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; Merle J. Rogers, Judge.

Action by Miles Balcom against the F. A. Shipley Company and another. Judgment for defendants, and the plaintiff appeals. Affirmed in the District Court of Appeal, and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

Earl E. Moss, of Los Angeles, for appellant.
Chas. F. Blackstock, of Oxnard, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff brought an action against the defendants which sounds in conversion. The case was tried before the trial court sitting with a jury. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the defendants, and from the judgment entered thereon the plaintiff has appealed under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure. As we have stated, the plaintiff's complaint is in the ordinary form of an action for conversion. It charges the defendants with having converted 61,395 pounds of beans and 1,445 pounds of split beans. The defendants answered, denying all of the material allegations of the complaint. It may be stated at this point for the purpose of greatly clarifying the record that the plaintiff claimed the full weights stated in all of the warehouse receipts issued to him, whereas the defendants claimed that during the delivery season the plaintiff was not satisfied with the weight tags, requested the defendants to weigh the plaintiff's beans on two different scales, that the beans were so weighed, and that warehouse receipts in some instances were issued at one set of scales for a certain lot of beans, and when the same beans were weighed at the other set of scales another warehouse receipt was issued for the very same lot, and in this way six warehouse receipts thereafter known as "weights for comparison" were issued by the warehouse, notwithstanding that the warehouse did not receive the goods.

When the plaintiff commenced to introduce his case, he called F. A. Shipley, an officer of each of the defendant corporations. After the witness had been examined he was cross-examined. The appellant in his brief states:

> "His direct examination having been confined solely to an identification of receipts and documents, and the signatures thereon, the witness was then permitted to enter into a long explanation of his side of the case, which was made up of hearsay testimony from many sources."

In making the above statement the appellant is in error in the statement of the facts. Taking up these two matters in the order stated, we will address ourselves first to the charge that the cross-examination was not confined within proper bounds. Before we can determine the proper bounds of the cross-examination, it becomes necessary to ascertain what had been the direct examination. We will not attempt to state the whole of the direct examination, but it is sufficient to say that during the direct examination the witness Shipley was by the attorney for the appellant caused to testify that the appellant's beans—

> "were delivered to what is known as the Growers' Warehouse, and a portion was put in what is known as the Citrus Warehouse, a warehouse which I had leased to take care of the beans for which I did not have room in the Growers' Warehouse. These warehouses are operated by the Shipley Company. As those beans came into the warehouse, a scale ticket showing the weights, amount, of beans received from Mr. Balcom, was issued by the warehouse. The paper, Plaintiff's Exhibit 1, which you show me, I know what it is. It is a scale ticket representing the weights of beans. It was issued by Mr. Sheppard. He is foreman of my warehouse—that is the warehouse of the F. A. Shipley Company—which was operated by the company in the year 1918. That is one of the tickets isused from the warehouse by Mr. Sheppard, and he, as foreman of the warehouse, was authorized to issue those tickets and authorized to receive the beans and put them in the warehouse. * * * This paper you show me, Plaintiff's Exhibit 6, is a weight ticket of the Growers' Warehouse Company issued by that company and represents the receipt of a load of beans. * * * The word 'gross' on Plaintiff's Exhibit 29, would indicate on the weight ticket the weight of the entire load, consisting of the beans and the wagon; the word 'tare' indicates the weight of the wagon after the beans have been unloaded; and the word 'net' indicates the weight of the beans themselves."

In connection with the foregoing testimony, the witness was caused to identify the writing on and the authenticity of 35 warehouse receipts which were given numbers as Plaintiff's Exhibits 1 to 35, inclusive. On further direct examination the witness was caused to testify as follows:

> "The beans of the 1918 crop of beans that were placed in these warehouses in October and November, 1918, were not to my knowledge returned to Mr. Balcom. None of them were to my knowledge delivered to any one except upon the order of the Lima Bean Association, as the selling agent of Mr. Balcom. The beans mentioned in the several reports that I have identified as having been made to the Lima Bean Growers' Association were delivered on the order of that association; they were delivered to them or to their order."

After those proceedings were had, the cross-examination commenced:

> "Mr. Blackstock: Did you deliver to Mr. Balcom or to the Lima Bean Growers' Association on his behalf, all of the beans that Mr. Balcom stored with you in 1918?
> "Mr. Selby: Object to that question on the ground that it calls for the conclusion of the witness.
> "The Court: The objection will be overruled. A. We delivered them all to the Lima Bean Growers' Association."

There was no error in the ruling. The appellant had immediately before in the direct examination asked the witness to whom the beans were delivered. As the cross-examination proceeded the witness testified:

> "All of these tickets here are not original weight tickets. Six of them are not. I can identify those that are not originals. I have picked them out. I can identify them by their exhibit number. The exhibit numbers are 12, 13, 6, 7, 14, and 11.
> "Mr. Blackstock: Now, will you explain how these six tickets happened to be issued at all?
> "Mr. Moss: If the court please, it is not proper cross-examination, and we object to it as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial; it is a part of their defense.
> "The Court: The objection is overruled."

There was no answer to the question, and immediately thereafter Mr. Blackstock propounded the same question, and there was no objection made, and the witness proceeded in part as follows:

> "They were issued due to the fact that Mr. Balcom telephoned in a request that we have the beans, some of his beans, weighed—"

And that answer was never completed. Immediately following the above proceedings the following occurred:

> "Mr. Blackstock: You say these tickets are not originals? A. They are not.
> "Mr. Moss: Now, if the court please, we desire to object to that question and the testimon as given, and move to strike out all the testimony of this witness heretofore given tending to contradict these receipts, upon the ground that his testimony is incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and upon the further ground that under the law this witness is not permitted nor is the defendant permitted to contradict the receipt.
> "The Court: The motion to strike is denied, and the objection is overruled.
> "Mr. Moss: I suppose for the sake of the record it may be stipulated that we object to all testimony offered by the defense tending to contradict the receipts.
> "The Court: Very well; it will be so understood. (At this time it may be well to interpose that, although the appellant made the last objection in the trial court, on argument in this court Mr. Moss frankly stated that he did not make the same contention at this time.)
> "The Court: If there is any further point or any other objection as to competency, or relevancy, or materiality, you may raise it, but, so far as this particular point is concerned, you may present it."

[1] Now as to the bounds of cross-examination being transcended, we think it is clear: (1) That the subject-matter of the cross-examination was the same as the subject of the direct examination; (2) that, if appellant would raise such a question in this court, he must have interposed in the lower court his objection to the very question that was answered, and ask for a ruling thereon, and in the instant case that was not done; (3) after an answer was made to which an objection had been made and the objection overruled, appellant's attorney should have moved to strike the answer out, which he did not do in the instant case; and (4) after the cross-examination was closed and on redirect examination the attorney for the appellant proceeded to examine the witness exhaustively on the very subjects to which theretofore he had strenuously objected.

We will turn now to the subject of hearsay, and examine the record as to how the record stands in that behalf:

> "Mr. Blackstock: Now, will you explain how these six tickets happened to be issued at all?
> "Mr. Moss: We make the further objection, if the court please, we state it is well known to Mr. Blackstock, as to ourselves, that this witness has no personal knowledge of those facts.
> "The Court: The court does not know; the objection will be overruled.
> "Mr. Blackstock: Go ahead and explain the exhibit; read the question, Mr. Reporter. (Question read by reporter.)
> "Mr. Moss: If the court please, for the purpose of laying the foundation, may I ask the question— (Discussion.)
> "The Court: The objection will be overruled. The ruling may stand. Answer the question, if you know."

At this point it will be noted that the discussion by counsel, or some other cause, had apparently taken from the trial court's mind the nature of the request which counsel was attempting to make, and counsel, observing the fact, or not observing the fact, did not call to the court's mind the fact that he was making a request to ask a question of the witness, and that he was not making an objection until he had laid the foundation. Immediately thereafter the record continued as follows:

> "The Witness: What is the question?
> "Mr. Blackstock: Explain how these tickets happened to be issued at all.
> "A. They were issued due to the fact that Mr. Balcom telephoned in and requested that we have the beans, some of his beans, weighed—
> "Mr. Moss: The question of you, Mr. Shipley—
> "Mr. Blackstock: Let him answer the question.
> "The Court: He can testify to what he knows as a matter of fact.
> "Mr. Blackstock: I withdraw the question."

Thus it appears that after all of the discussion and wrangling, etc., the question was not answered at all. Closely following, however, and it may be conceded as part of the proceeding, the reporter read the question:

> "Just explain, Mr. Shipley, how you know those tickets are not originals.
> "A. Mr. Balcom telephoned into our office at the time he stored, or I will say shortly thereafter, and stated—
> "Mr. Moss: Is that over our objection, if the court please, as to the knowledge of the witness?
> "The Court: Well, I cautioned the witness to testify to what he had personal knowledge of, Mr. Moss; if this telephone message was received by you or in your presence, you can testify to it. A. It was not, your honor."

Thus again the record shows much ado about nothing.

> "Mr. Blackstock: Regardless of that telephone conversation, you say these tickets are duplicates. State how you know they are duplicates. (The witness here delineates methods of bookkeeping, weighing, etc., as practiced in his warehouses, and then proceeded:) I was told by Miss House (and I have tickets and can identify them), that Mr. Balcom had telephoned in and requested that we have the beans, some of his beans, weighed on both scales, both on the large scales and the small scales, as comparison weights.
> "Mr. Moss: We object to that hearsay testimony as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial.
> "The Court: I take it what some one told Mr. Shipley would be simply hearsay. Just refrain from telling what you do not know yourself, Mr. Shipley."

[2] The ruling was correct and as exact as the occasion permitted. Furthermore, when the cross-examination was ended and the redirect examination was commenced, the third question propounded was:

> "Mr. Selby: You have stated that you know the tickets marked Plaintiff's Exhibits 6, 7, 11, 12, 13, and 14 are tickets that were issued for loads that had been previously weighed, and other tickets issued for the same loads? A. Yes, sir.
> "Q. Did you know that at the time it happened? A. I did not."

And in reply to the appellant's questions the witness gave the following hearsay testimony:

> "I learned the fact along in the summer of 1919, seven or eight months after the delivery of the beans. I got the information by calling my employees together, and Miss House telling me. What I am testifying to is from what Miss House told me and the evidence that was shown me. * * * Ticket 5 was posted, was brought over from the Citrus Warehouse, having been weighed by Mr. Sheppard, and given to Miss House, and that ticket was posted and the duplicate representing that load were not posted on the same day. Miss House absolutely knew they were duplicates. She knew it because these beans came into the Growers' Warehouse and were weighed on the large scales and the tractor or teams hauling around and went to the Citrus Warehouse. I absolutely know she knew this and she knew those tickets were all the same load. I know it because it is as plain as can be. All I have to go by is that Miss House and Mr. House told me these were duplicates. * * * On the 29th of October there was an entry of 217 sacks weighing 20,730 pounds. They were not weighed twice. They appear to be the same beans as are covered by Plaintiff's Exhibits 24 and 25. * * * I did not make the entries upon the warehouse ledger. I was not present when any of the entries were made other than being in the same office."

After eliciting these facts, the appellant made no motion to strike. Before leaving the subject of hearsay, which, as above shown, came from Miss House and Mr. House, it is proper to state that both of those individuals appeared in court and were examined and cross-examined in extenso, and that any of the testimony that crept into the record as hearsay, without regard to whether it was objected to or was not objected to, was given anew by the witness who was altogether competent to testify on the subject.

[3] The plaintiff had employed Mr. Moss under a written contract to present the plaintiff's case. That contract provided that Mr. Moss would be compensated by a contingent fee. During the trial Mr. Moss took the stand as a witness. To show his interest in the case the respondent asked him questions concerning that contract. The contract was produced and was offered in evidence.

> "Mr. Moss: We object to the introduction for any purpose other than to show my interest in the case as it might affect my testimony as a witness."

The court did not then limit the testimony and did not thereafter limit the testimony.

It might well have done so. However, we cannot appreciate that the omission was prejudicial error. There was not one word in the instrument that was possibly pertinent for or against either of the parties litigant, except as showing a weakness in the testimony of Mr. Moss, one of the witnesses produced by the appellant.

We have read the record from cover to cover, and it is patent that the case was fully and fairly tried, and determined on its merits. The respondents produced substantial testimony to the effect that the said tickets known as "weights for comparison" were such and nothing more. If the jury believed that testimony, and its verdict indicates that it did, then the judgment should stand.

The judgment is affirmed.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. The petition for a hearing of this cause in the Supreme Court is denied.

[4] In the course of the opinion it is said that, where the appellant objects to a question on the ground that it was not cross-examination, and his objection was overruled, and the question thereupon repeated and answered, the appellant must again object to the question as repeated, and that, if he does not repeat his objection, he cannot have the ruling reviewed on appeal. We think this is erroneous. When an objection has been overruled, it is not necessary for the party objecting to renew his objection when the question is repeated and answered by the witness.

[5] It is also said that, where an objection was made and overruled, and the question is then answered by the witness, the ruling cannot be reviewed on appeal unless a motion was also made and overruled to strike out the answer. We do not think this is the law.

[6] Nor do we understand that, if the appellant's attorney re-examines the witness on subjects upon which he was questioned on the cross-examination by the respondent over the objection of the appellant, he thereby waives all objections made by him on the relevancy of the cross-examination. These statements in the opinion we think were erroneous, but they were not necessary to the decision.

WHEAT et al. v. BIG PINES LIME & TRANSPORTATION CO. et al. (EVERETT, Intervener). (Civ. 4051.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 15, 1921.)

Corporations 🔑590(5)—Owners of secured bonds of corporation consolidated with another held not entitled to assert equitable lien on property included in a deed of trust by new corporation.

Pursuant to agreement a corporation conveyed its property subject to a deed of trust securing bonds to a corporation organized to consolidate it with another, and the latter likewise conveyed property subject to a mortgage thereon, and the new corporation executed a deed of trust on all the property conveyed to it to secure bonds to be used in part to take care of its obligations as agreed, but the bonds were never issued because of a refusal of bondholders to exchange bonds of the old corporation therefor. Thereafter the old corporations were dissolved by operations of law. Part of the property conveyed by the old corporation subject to the deed of trust was sold to satisfy a judgment against the new corporation, and held by the grantee subject to the lien of such deed. The mortgaged property was regularly sold and conveyed on foreclosure pursuant to law, and the sheriff's grantee, the mortgagee, conveyed the same to a bondholder secured by the deed of trust first referred to. Held, that the owners of the bonds of the old corporation were not entitled to assert an equitable lien on all the property included in the new corporation's deed of trust because of its agreement to issue its bonds secured thereby and exchange their bonds therefor, since the security which they accepted in purchasing their bonds and their legal rights remained the same, so that there was no reason why they should avail themselves of their legal remedy, and as to the mortgaged property their rights, if any, were barred, either in the foreclosure proceeding or in a subsequent suit to quiet title thereto, and, as to the purchase thereof by a bondholder claimed as a redemption inuring to the benefit of all the bondholders, the equity of redemption was not asserted, and the sale to the mortgagee became final, and the property hers absolutely, before her sale to such bondholder.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Wellborn, Judge.

Action by W. H. Wheat and another against the Big Pines Lime & Transportation Company and others, in which John Potter and another filed a cross-complaint, and E. E. Everett intervened. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs, cross-plaintiffs, and intervener appeal. Affirmed.

John O. Bender, of Los Angeles, for appellants Wheat, Satterlee, and Everett.

Thomas H. McKee, of Pasadena, for appellants Potter.

Leonard B. Slosson, Robert Mitchell, Fred W. Morrison, and Benno M. Brink, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. In this action there is an appeal by the plaintiffs and by the cross-plaintiffs, John and Cora M. Potter, from a judgment denying them equitable relief. The appeals were taken upon the judgment roll, consisting of about 600 pages of transcript, and the contention of the appellants is that the findings of fact do not support the conclusions of law.

We have carefully read the transcript and the findings, and they reveal facts so exceedingly complex and parties so numerous that we deem it expedient and necessary in the interest of clarity to set out herein only such portions of the findings as are necessary for an understanding of the main features of the controversy.

On the 1st day of March, 1912, the Lone Pine Utilities Company, a corporation, hereinafter called the Utilities Company, issued its bonds in the sum of $100,000, payable 20 years after said date. All of said bonds were issued and are outstanding and are the bonds referred to herein as belonging to plaintiffs and some of the defendants. To secure the payment of said bonds, said corporation executed a deed of trust to the Los Angeles Abstract & Trust Company, as trustee, conveying to said trustee all property it then owned or might thereafter acquire.

Thereafter it acquired certain properties described in plaintiffs' third amended complaint, which properties are hereinafter referred to as the lime claims and rights of way. Said trust deed was duly recorded. Subsequently the Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank was substituted as trustee in the place and stead of the former trustee, and said bank is now the duly appointed, qualified, and acting trustee under said deed of trust.

The interest payments on said bonds are represented by coupons thereto attached, and it is provided in each of said bonds that said coupons must be presented for payment at the office of the trustee, and that, in case of default in the payment of any of said coupons when due for a period of three months after presentation at the office of the trustee, the principal of said bonds may become due and payable with the effect and subject to the conditions provided in the deed of trust securing said bonds. Said deed of trust provides that the principal of said bonds shall not become due and payable after such default in payment of interest coupons unless the holders of at least 51 per cent. of the total amount of said bonds outstanding shall make a declaration to that effect to the trustee and shall request the trustee to begin foreclosure proceedings accordingly. No such declaration and no such request has ever been made to said trustee, and the principal of said bonds or of any of them has not become due or payable and is not now due or payable. Said interest coupons which have become due and payable have not been presented to the trustee for payment, and no default has been declared in the payment of said coupons. Said deed of trust is still in full force and effect as to all of its terms and conditions, and said issue of bonds is still secured by the property referred to hereinbefore.

On the 20th day of August, 1914, said Utilities Company granted and transferred said properties to defendant Big Pines Lime & Transportation Company, subject to said deed of trust, and the deed of conveyance was accepted by said grantee and contained the following recital:

> "Subject to a trust deed given by the Lone Pine Utilities Company, a corporation, to the Los Angeles Abstract & Trust Company, a corporation, to secure a bond issue of $100,000. * * *"

Said conveyance was duly recorded.

On the 27th day of May, 1917, defendant Rickershauser obtained a judgment against said Big Pines Lime & Transportation Company in the superior court of Los Angeles county for the sum of $9,760.60, and thereafter an execution was duly issued upon said judgment, and on April 19, 1918, in satisfaction of said judgment, the sheriff sold to said Rickershauser, at public sale, as provided by law, all of the right, title, and interest of said transportation company in and to said lime claims. Thereafter, on April 21, 1919, said sheriff executed and delivered to said Rickershauser a deed conveying to him said property in fee. Thereafter, on April 28, 1919, said Rickershauser sold and conveyed said property to defendant Sheepshead Lime Company, a corporation. This conveyance was duly recorded, and said last-named corporation now holds said property subject to the lien of the deed of trust securing said issue of bonds.

All of the parties to this action, and who are the owners of said bonds, have a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy at law pursuant to the provisions of said deed of trust, and can have said property sold at public auction at any time to satisfy their claims alleged in said complaint by complying with said provisions. Said parties have not complied with said provisions and have taken no steps to secure relief thereunder.

Upon the foregoing facts no possible question could arise as to appellants' right to recover in this action; there would absolutely be no such right. However, the appellants contend that a different legal situation arises by reason of the existence of the following facts found by the court:

On August 15, 1914, the Lone Pine Mill & Lumber Company, a corporation, hereinafter called the Lumber Company, was the owner in fee simple of the property known and designated as the "Big Pines," which property is particularly described in said third amended complaint. On said date and long prior thereto said property was subject to a mortgage executed by one M. C. Rodgers to secure the payment of one promissory note for $5,000, dated March 1, 1911. Said mortgage was duly recorded. On August 15, 1914, said corporation transferred said property subject to said mortgage, by grant deed, to said Big Pines Lime & Transportation Company. Said grant deed contains the following recital:

> "Subject to a mortgage executed by M. C. Rodgers, a single woman, to secure one note for five thousand dollars dated March 1, 1911, payable on or before two years after date, with interest at 10 per cent. per annum, payable quarterly, in favor of A. R. Lendner."

On September 14, 1915, one Melissa H. L. Ford was the owner of said promissory note and the mortgage securing the same. Said mortgage was not paid, and on September 14, 1915, said Ford instituted an action in the superior court of the state of California in and for the county of Los Angeles to foreclose said mortgage, said action being entitled Melissa H. L. Ford, plaintiff, v. M. C. Rodgers et al., Defendants, and numbered B–29194. At the time said action was filed a notice of pendency of said action was duly recorded in the office of the county recorder of said county, and all persons holding conveyances from or under the mortgagor or having a lien thereon at the time of the institution of said action, and which appeared of record at said time, where made parties to the action and were duly served with summons therein. Thereafter a decree of foreclosure and an order of sale were duly made, and said property sold by the sheriff and purchased by said Ford, the plaintiff in said action, on or about December 20, 1915. Said property was not redeemed within the time required by law, and on the 21st day of December 1916, the sheriff issued a deed conveying said property to said Ford.

On or about February 13, 1917, said Ford entered into a contract with defendant Robert Mitchell to sell and convey to him said property, and thereafter said Ford conveyed to said Mitchell all her right, title, and interest in and to said property and the deed conveying said property was duly recorded on February 1, 1918.

Now, in this piece of property so conveyed to Mitchell, and which we shall call the "Big Pines property," the appellants claim an interest by reason of the following facts:

During the month of June, 1914, said Lumber Company and said Utilities Company, by and with the consent of their stockholders, bondholders, and creditors, entered into an agreement to merge and consolidate their interests, and, to carry out the purposes of said agreement, they organized and incorporated said Big Pines Lime & Transportation Company with a capital stock of $1,000,000, divided into 1,000,000 shares of the par value of $1 each. It was agreed, as part of said merger, that the Transportation Company would issue a new series of bonds in the sum of $250,000 and use the same for the general purposes of the corporation and to take care of its obligations. Thereupon the old corporations transferred their properties to the new corporation, as hereinbefore set forth, and, in consideration therefor, the Transportation Company agreed to issue to the Lumber Company 100,000 shares of its capital stock, to deliver to it $40,000 worth of the new bonds proposed to be issued, and to pay its creditors out of the proceeds of the new bond issue. To the Utilities Company the Transportation Company agreed to issue 508,150 shares of its capital stock, to pay its creditors out of the proceeds of the new bond issue, and to issue to the holders of the bonds issued by said corporation on March 1, 1912, and in exchange therefor bonds of the new issue to the amount of $100,000. The Transportation Company did issue to the Lumber Company 100,000 shares of its capital stock and to the Utilities Company 508,150 shares of its capital stock. The Transportation Company also issued and delivered to the stockholders of the Lumber Company certificates evidencing their respective rights to the $40,000 worth of bonds whenever the same should be issued. Thereafter the old corporations were dissolved by operation of law, having failed to pay the state license tax for the year 1915.

To secure said proposed issue of bonds, the Transportation Company executed a trust deed to the Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank covering all of the properties transferred to it by the Lumber Company and the Utilities Company. Said trust deed bears date of September 1, 1914, and was duly recorded. Said deed recited that it was given to secure an issue of bonds, which bonds were to be used in promoting any of the lawful purposes or objects for which the corporation was organized, among which are: The development of power plants, power systems, and numerous other enterprises more or less related thereto; also for the marketing of real property acquired by the company and the construction of a hotel, places of amusement, halls, dwelling houses, and other improvements deemed advisable by the board of directors; also for the payment of the indebtedness formerly existing against the Lone Pine Mill & Lumber Company and the Lone Pine Utilities Company, including the bonded indebtedness of said last-named company, not exceeding $100,000. It was intended that said trust deed was to be a first lien upon property conveyed to the Transportation Company, but some of the bondholders of the Utility Company refused to exchange their old bonds for the new bonds and so release the prior lien created by the trust deed of March, 1912, given by the Utilities Company. For that reason it became impossible to carry out the plan of the corporation, and the new bonds were never issued, and the intention to issue said bonds was abandoned. The trust deed of September 1, 1914, given by the Transportation Company to secure a proposed bond issue, was therefore given without consideration, no bonds having been issued, and it is of no force and effect.

It is the contention of the appellants, however, that, regardless of the fact that they have acquired no legal rights under the trust deed given by the Transportation Company, nevertheless, as bondholders of the Utilities Company, an equitable lien is created in their favor upon all of the property mentioned in said trust deed of the Transportation Company because of the fact that the Transportation Company agreed to issue its bonds and execute its trust deed to secure the same and to exchange appellants' bonds for the new bonds, and because the Transportation Company accepted the transfer of the property of the Utilities Company upon these conditions.

We shall not deal with the question of what equities might have been presented had the appellants parted with anything of value in reliance upon this agreement, or had they lost any right or advantage of any kind, or were in a position where they were unable to enforce their claims by a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy at law. Such a question is not presented here. For the appellants have, as security for their bonds, precisely the same property which they always had and precisely the same security which they accepted in purchasing their bonds. They never gave up any of their legal rights under the trust deed securing these bonds and there is no reason why they should not avail themselves of their plain, speedy and adequate legal remedy. Under such circumstances they show no basis for equitable interference.

The property sought to be bound by an equitable lien consists of the "Lime property," upon which appellants have, admittedly, a first lien under the trust deed of 1912, and another piece of property, the "Big Pines property," upon which a lien prior to any possible right of appellant has already been foreclosed and the property sold thereunder and all equities of redemption foreclosed. As to the "Big Pines property," the rights of the appellants, if any they had, were barred either in the foreclosure proceeding or in the subsequent action to quiet title to this land.

There is no merit in the claim of cross-plaintiffs, John and Cora M. Potter, that the defendant Mitchell's purchase of the "Big Pines property" was in reality an assertion of his equity of redemption as a bondholder having an equitable lien upon the property, and that such redemption inured to the benefit of all the bondholders of the Utilities Company. If by any process of reasoning these bondholders did have any equity of redemption in this property, such equity was never asserted by any of them. The sale of the property to the mortgagee became final, and the property became hers absolutely, free from all equities, some time before she sold it to Mitchell.

There are no other matters requiring discussion, and the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

ROTTMAN v. ROTTMAN. (Civ. 3531.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Dec. 13, 1921.)

1. Equity 🔑87(2)—Action brought within period of limitation not barred by laches unless delay has injured defendant.

As the statute of limitations is applicable to both legal and equitable actions, there can be no laches in delaying the bringing of an action if it is brought within the period of limitations, unless there are some facts or circumstances attending the delay which have operated to the injury of the defendant.

2. Equity 🔑84—Doctrine of laches not strictly applied between near relatives.

The doctrine of laches is not strictly applied between near relatives, particularly where relationship is so near and confidential as that between husband and wife.

3. Cancellation of instruments 🔑34(1)—Wife not barred by laches from suing to set aside postnuptial contracts in absence of showing that delay prejudiced husband.

Wife's action against husband to set aside postnuptial contracts relating to property rights brought within period of limitation held not barred by laches because of delay of almost three years, in absence of showing that husband was prejudiced by the delay.

4. Cancellation of instruments 🔑34(1)—Wife who made postnuptial contracts under threats not barred by laches from suing to set aside contracts three years after.

Wife, having entered into postnuptial contracts making settlement of property rights for the purpose of securing to herself a continuance of the marriage relation, which husband had threatened to deny her if she refused to make contracts, was not barred by laches from suing to set aside contracts almost three years thereafter.

5. Cancellation of instruments 🔑37(7)—Complaint to set aside postnuptial contracts held to show contracts procured by undue influence of husband.

Wife's complaint in action to set aside postnuptial contracts, alleging that husband induced wife to make contracts by statement that his father and uncle would not give him any peace until property matters had been arranged with his wife as provided for in such contract, and that he would not be the husband to the wife that he should and desired to be unless she signed the contract, and that she was influenced to sign the contract by reason of her love for and confidence in, and by reason of the undue influence exercised by husband over her, held to show contract procured by undue influence of husband.

6. Husband and wife 🔑34—Evidence held to sustain finding that wife in making postnuptial contracts was ignorant of respective rights of herself and husband.

In wife's action to set aside postnuptial contracts relating to property rights, evidence held to sustain finding that wife in making contracts was ignorant of the respective rights of herself and husband.

7. Appeal and error 🔑1071(1)—Finding that no consideration passed to wife for postnuptial contract held harmless where no substantial consideration passed.

Court's finding in action to set aside postnuptial contracts that no consideration passed to wife, if technically erroneous in that there was some consideration, was harmless, since the disparity between what wife received and what she parted with under the contracts was so great as to warrant finding that no substantial consideration passed to her.

8. Husband and wife 🔑30—Husband cannot by undue influence induce wife to part with property rights for nominal consideration.

A husband may not by the undue pressure of illegitimate argument or persuasion induce a wife by postnuptial contract to part for a nominal consideration with valuable rights which were hers under the marriage covenant.

9. Husband and wife 🔑34—Finding that husband procured postnuptial contracts to effect release from obligation to support wife and children sustained.

In wife's action to set aside postnuptial contracts, finding that husband procured the contracts in order to effect his escape from any obligation to support his wife held proper in view of provision of contract releasing husband from the obligation to support the wife.

10. Appeal and error 🔑1071(3)—Finding that husband procured postnuptial contracts to release him from supporting any children that might be born held harmless in view of the unjust character of contracts.

In wife's action to set aside postnuptial contracts whereby husband worth $50,000 made cash payment of $5 and $500 to wife, quitclaimed any interest in property that admittedly belonged to the wife and released wife from liability to support him in consideration of wife's release of any interest in husband's property, and of any obligation on part of husband to support her, or to pay alimony or provide separate maintenance, finding that husband procured agreement to effect a release of his obligation to support any children that might be born held harmless, though not warranted by evidence, in view of the palpably unjust and unfair character of the contracts.

11. Appeal and error 🔑1071(1)—Finding as to wife's property in action to cancel postnuptial contracts held harmless where other finding would not have affected unfair character of contract.

In wife's action to set aside postnuptial contracts in which wife released husband, worth $50,000, from the obligation to support and maintain her for no substantial consideration, finding that wife was worth $5,000 at time of execution of contracts held harmless, even though finding should have given her worth at such time as $16,000, as alleged by answer, since court's conclusion of the unfairness of contract would not have been affected by finding that wife was worth $16,000 instead of $5,000.

12. Husband and wife 🔑30 — Postnuptial agreement whereby wife released husband from obligation to support wife without providing for separation held void.

Under Civ. Code, § 159, postnuptial contracts whereby wife released husband from the obligation to support her or to pay alimony in the event of a divorce and to provide separate maintenance, but which made no provision for separation, held void as against public policy.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; E. A. Luce, Judge.

Action by Ula May Rottman against Sam E. Rottman. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Dan V. Noland and Meserve & Meserve, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Robert M. Pease, of Los Angeles, and Conkling & Brown, of El Centro, for respondent.

WORKS, J. The parties to this action are husband and wife. A little less than a year and a half after their marriage, they, as opposing contracting parties, entered into two written agreements, the rescission of which is the purpose of the present litigation. While there were two contracts between the parties, executed some weeks apart, they in effect really constitute but one obligation, as the second was but an amplification of the first. The earlier of the agreements—and we shall henceforth refer to them, respectively, as the first contract and the second contract—was executed on June 11, 1915. Its terms are introduced by the recital that the parties are husband and wife, that they are desirous of settling all rights of property between them and all monetary obligations of each to the other under their marital relation. Following this premise it is agreed that all property standing in the husband's name is his separate estate, and not community property; that all property standing in the name of the wife is her separate property; that the husband, upon the execution of the agreement, will pay to the wife the sum of $5, the receipt of which is acknowledged; that, in consideration of such payment, the wife grants to the husband all right, title, or interest which she may have in all property, real or personal, theretofore acquired during coverture and as the common property of the parties; that, further, in consideration of such payment and of the release by the husband to the wife "hereinafter contained," the wife releases the husband "from any obligation of whatsoever kind or nature, either present, past or future, to in any way contribute to the support or maintenance" of the wife, and that the wife "will not at any time apply to any court or take any proceedings against" the husband "wherein or whereby she shall seek to recover" from the husband "any moneys for her support or maintenance, or for temporary or permanent alimony, attorney's fees, or costs in any action which may be hereafter commenced by either" the husband or the wife; that the agreement shall be a receipt to the husband "because of any liability, present or future," by him to the wife; that the husband releases the wife "from any similar obligation" to him; that the parties "mutually agree, one with the other that any property which may hereafter be acquired by either of the parties hereto shall be deemed and held to be the property of the party so acquiring the same," and the taking of title by the party so acquiring shall be deemed conclusive evidence that the property acquired is the separate property of the party so taking title; and that each party releases, remises, and quitclaims unto the other all right, title, or interest in all real and personal property which the other may hereafter so acquire. The second contract is dated June 26, 1915, but it was not executed until July 12. This agreement opens with a recital stating the fact that the first contract was executed between the parties; that it was recorded on the date of its execution, the book and page of the record being given; that the parties have been advised to describe with more particularity certain of the properties referred to in the first contract; and that they have agreed that neither should incur any bills against the other, in consideration of which the husband has agreed to pay to the wife an additional $500. It is then, following this introduction, agreed that the parties do jointly and severally ratify and confirm the first contract, each stating "that he and she respectively have fully considered said contract, and has been fully advised as to all of its contents and the legal force and effect thereof"; that the husband, at the time of the execution of the agreement, has paid to the wife "an additional" sum of $500, the receipt of which by her is acknowledged; that each of the parties will not incur any bill or obligation against the other unless express written authority so to do is first given, the wife "particularly obligating herself" not to incur any bills or obligations against the husband without such authority; that the wife (in paragraph 4 of the contract), in addition to the general grant, release, and conveyance contained in the first contract, "does hereby grant, quitclaim, and convey" to the husband, "in particular, all and every right which he [sic] has or may claim to have" in certain described property; that the wife agrees "that said hereinabove particularly described property, as well as all and every other piece of property standing in the name" of the husband, is his separate property and estate"; that the husband (in paragraph 5 of the contract) in addition to the general grant, release, and conveyance contained in the first contract, "does hereby grant, quitclaim, and convey" to the wife, "in particular, all and every right which he has or may claim to have" in certain described property; and that the husband agrees "that said hereinabove particularly described property, as well as all and every other piece of property standing in the name "of the wife," is her "separate property and estate."

Upon a trial of the issues arising under the pleadings a decree rescinding both agreements was rendered in favor of plaintiff. Defendant appeals.

One of the points made by appellant is that the amended complaint fails to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The pleading alleges that the parties intermarried January 29, 1914, and ever since have been husband and wife; sets up the first contract; alleges that at the time of its execution, and at all times, the wife was unacquainted with business, ignorant of business matters, and unable to understand the legal effect of the contract, or what were the rights of the parties to it, all of which was well known to the husband; that no consideration for the signing of the contract passed between the parties; that the wife received no consideration therefor and was induced to sign it by reason of her love for her husband and her trust and confidence in him and her ignorance concerning the matter, and that by reason of her love for her husband and her trust and confidence in him she signed the contract without legal or other advice in regard to the matter and notwithstanding that he was fully advised concerning it and had legal advice touching it and understood all the rights and obligations of the parties; that the $5 mentioned in the contract was not paid to the wife, nor was any other sum paid to her or any other consideration given; that to induce the wife to sign the contract the husband stated to her that "his father and his uncle would not give him any peace until the defendant had his property matters arranged with his wife as provided in the said contract, and that by reason of his mind being troubled upon that account he could not be to the plaintiff the husband he should and desired to be, and that if she would sign the said contract that all would be well between them, and that he would continue to live with her and love her as a husband should"; that at the time of the execution of the contract there was no property of record in the name of the wife which was not her separate property, and there was no property of record in the name of the husband which was not his separate property, and the husband obtained the contract "solely and entirely in order that he might thereafter freely violate his marriage vows and by virtue of said agreement might preclude the plaintiff from obtaining from the said defendant thereafter any support or maintenance and in order that he might with impunity abandon the plaintiff and leave her without support," and also that he might thereafter be free from obligation to support children thereafter born to the parties, and that he might cast upon the wife the burden of supporting such children; that on April 7, 1916, one child was born to the parties, "now" of the age of about three years; that the husband has not supported or maintained the child and has contributed but $25 toward its maintenance; that the contract was and is unfair in that it was without consideration and its effect was to cast upon the wife the entire burden of supporting herself and the child, and she signed it only by reason of her love and affection for her husband and her trust and confidence in him and by reason of his undue influence over her at that time and to give him the peace of mind "he claimed he could only have when his property matters were arranged to the satisfaction of his father and his uncle"; that at the time the contract was signed it was not known that a child would thereafter be born to the parties; that since the birth of the child the wife has been unable to work and support herself because her time has been entirely taken up with the care and raising of the child, and the contract was and is unfair in that it provided no consideration for the loss by the wife of the time necessarily to be given by her in the care of the child, or her inability to support herself by her labor owing to the necessity of devoting her time to the care and education of the child; that on June 26, 1915, the husband caused to be drawn up and presented to the wife for her signature the second contract, which is set out in full; that at the time she signed the second contract she loved and trusted her husband and had no advice other than that of her husband, who had advice of an attorney concerning that contract; that no sum was paid and no consideration passed between the parties for the execution of the second contract, and no consideration was received by the wife for or with respect to the execution thereof, but that at the time she signed it she was entirely ignorant of business and of law and did not understand the effect of the agreement, whereas the husband understood it and was advised by attorneys regarding it, and he procured the execution of it in order to procure his release from any obligation thereafter to support the wife or to support any children that might thereafter be born to them; that the property described in the fourth paragraph of the second contract was prior to its execution the separate property of the husband and the property described in the fifth paragraph was the separate property of the wife; that the property standing of record at that time in the name of the wife was her separate property, and any property standing of record in the name of the husband was his separate property; that the second contract was unfair in that it was without consideration and in that no provision was made for the maintenance of the wife or of any child or children which might thereafter be born to the parties, whereas the husband was then "and is now" very wealthy, worth about $100,000, and bountifully able to support and care for the wife and for the child of the parties, while the separate property of the wife was "and is" of the value of only about $5,000 above all incumbrances, and was "and is" insufficient to support the wife and the child; that in order to induce the wife to sign the second contract the husband told her "that his father and uncle insisted upon it, and that he could not have any peace of mind unless it was signed." and that "unless she signed the same immediately that he would desert the plaintiff and go to South America"; that the wife signed the second contract "solely by reason of her love and affection for her husband and by reason of his undue influence over her, and in order to satisfy her said husband and retain his presence with her"; that since the making of the second contract the husband has not supported the wife nor the child, and that the income from the wife's separate property has not been sufficient to maintain the wife or child, and that the wife has borrowed $1,500 with which to support herself and the child and has been damaged in the sum of $1,500, no part of which has been paid; and that prior to the commencement of the action and after the execution of the two contracts the wife demanded of the husband that he contribute to the support of herself and the child, but that he refused and has not contributed anything whatever to the support of the wife and only a small and insufficient sum to the extent "hereinabove alleged" for the support of the child. The prayer was that the two contracts be canceled and declared null and void and for general relief.

[1, 2] Appellant's contention that the amended complaint fails to state a cause of action is made upon several grounds. One of these is that nothing is alleged by way of excuse for the long delay in commencing the action; the original complaint having been filed but about a month short of three years from the execution of the second contract and a day short of three years after the execution of the first. Such a delay was of course a great one, but whether it operates as a bar to the prosecution of the action depends upon all the facts and circumstances of the case disclosed upon the face of the plaintiff's pleading. It may be conceded that the courts of this state have many times held causes of action to be barred by laches where the period elapsing before an attempt to prosecute them was less than that which transpired in the action now before us. On the other hand, cases are not lacking in which it has been determined that the lapse of an equal time will not operate as a bar. No guide is furnished by any of these cases, except as to principles general in character, for the question whether a plaintiff has been guilty of laches in commencing an action must be determined upon the facts and circumstances peculiar to that particular action. One of the general rules laid down by the cases is:

> "As the statute of limitations is applicable to both legal and equitable actions, there can be no laches in delaying the bringing of an action if it is brought within the period of limitation, * * * unless there are some facts or circumstances attending the delay which have operated to the injury of the defendants." Meigs v. Pinkham, 159 Cal. 104, 112 Pac. 883.

Practically the same rule has been stated in these terms:

> "In order to bar a remedy because of laches, there must appear, in addition to mere lapse of time, some circumstances from which the defendant or some other person may be prejudiced, or there must be such lapse of time that it may be reasonably supposed that such prejudice will occur if the remedy is allowed." Title Ins. Co. v. California Development Co., 171 Cal. 173, 152 Pac. 542.

Another rule stated in the books is that the doctrine of laches is not strictly applied between near relatives (Butler v. Hyland, 89 Cal. 575, 26 Pac. 1108); the principle, of course, finding a ready application in cases in which the relationship is so near, dear and confidential as that existing between husband and wife (21 C. J. 250, 251).

[3, 4] Either of these rules completely meets the point made by appellant. As to the first one, we can see no reason for asserting that he has been prejudiced in the least by respondent's delay in commencing the action. According to the complaint, by both specific and general allegation, no consideration passed from appellant under the two contracts. Therefore respondent has nothing of his which she could be required to surrender as a condition upon which relief might be granted her and through the retention of which by her for even a great length of time he might have been damaged. As to the second rule of law which we have mentioned, respondent is in a peculiarly strong position. Not only is she the wife of appellant but according to the amended complaint, the two contracts she seeks to rescind were entered into by her for the purpose of securing to herself a continuance of the relations which she had a right to expect from the very fact of marriage, but which her husband had threatened to deny her. This, we repeat, places her in a position from which she may strongly combat the charge that she unduly delayed the commencement of her action. Having made a very foolish and improvident contract, treating the two as one, for the purpose of securing her rights as a wife, other than the right to support, which she cast away in order to hold to the remainder, she could hardly be expected to be zealously diligent in attempting to cancel the contracts. A move in that direction might imperil the very consummation she had so devoutly wished. She was justified, without incurring the charge of guilt of laches, in holding to the last possible moment to the hope that, in the language of the amended complaint, her husband would "live with her and love her as a husband should," and that she might "retain his presence with her." As the contracts were executed by the wife for the purposes shown by the amended complaint, and as the husband had the degree of undue influence over her evidenced by the execution of agreements so unilateral in character, it will be presumed that, under all the circumstances shown by the pleading, the influence continued for a very long time. We hold that the amended complaint shows sufficient excuse for the delay in commencing the action.

[5] The sufficiency of the amended complaint is challenged upon the ground that its allegations make no showing of undue influence practiced upon respondent. The argument of this question is largely based upon the idea that the pleading contains no averment of the untruth of the statement ascribed to appellant "that his father and uncle would not give him any peace until the defendant had his property matters arranged with his wife as provided in the said contract, and that by reason of his mind being troubled upon that account he could not be to the plaintiff the husband he should and desired to be, and that if she would sign the said contract that all would be well between them, and that he would continue to live with her and love her as a husband should." We are at a loss to understand why respondent's pleading should negative the truth of these unusual assertions. It is all one whether they were true or false, so long as respondent was influenced by them to sign contracts by means of which she got nothing and gave up much and appellant got much and gave up nothing. And she was influenced to sign by his statements, as witness the allegation that she "only signed the said agreement by reason of her love and affection for the said defendant, and her trust and confidence in him and by reason of the undue influence of her said husband over her at that time and in order to give the defendant peace of mind which he claimed he could only have when his property matters were arranged to the satisfaction of his father and his uncle." Courts may pause in wonderment at the extent of human credulity, but they cannot doubt its existence, especially when it is distinctly averred. It is difficult to understand how respondent could rely upon the promises of appellant to "live with her and love her as a husband should" after the first contract was signed, when he asserted such flimsy reason for his inability, unless it was signed, to be "the husband he should and desired to be." She did rely on them, however, as her pleading plainly shows, and they were no consideration for the valuable rights which she relinquished under the contracts, and her pleading shows that no other consideration passed to her. The husband was bound by their marriage contract to "live with her and love her as a husband should," and she could not be called upon through the exertion of pressure by him to pay him to do his duty in that regard. Not only was her payment made without consideration; it was opposed to the principles of a sound and enlightened public policy. The amended complaint makes a plain showing of undue influence.

Appellant makes several other objections to the sufficiency of the amended complaint, but we are convinced that they are not meritorious, and that they require no separate consideration at our hands.

[6] It is contended by appellant that several of the trial court's findings are not supported by the evidence. The court found, for instance, that respondent was ignorant of the respective rights of herself and of her husband under the two contracts, and that she was unable to appreciate or understand their legal effect, and the propriety of these findings is assailed. We can see nothing more than a conflict of evidence upon the issues covered by the findings we have mentioned. There is evidence that the contracts were explained to respondent by attorneys who were in the employ of her husband, but, on the other hand, she herself testified at some length as to her utter lack of business experience and as to the very limited extent of her knowledge concerning contracts and business transactions. From her testimony upon these subjects the court was justified in concluding that the explanations did not really enlighten respondent and in finding as it did. It must be remarked, too, that the findings in question are supported by the fact that respondent could have been induced to enter into the contracts at all. The pretexts upon which her husband procured her assent to them were of the most flimsy and unsubstantial character, for the burden of the evidence follows the allegations of the amended complaint upon the score of the representations made by him to procure the execution of the contracts by her. The fact that she could be won so easily to barter away her rights as a wife is most persuasive of the view that she labored under a distressing want of appreciation of the nature and value of those rights and of the extent to which she was impairing them by executing the contracts. She was putty in the hands of her husband, and if she ever had even a limited understanding of business affairs it was dethroned by his unhusbandlike and unmanly conduct toward her. We have no doubt that the findings we have mentioned are supported by the evidence.

[7, 8] The trial court found that no consideration passed to respondent for the execution of the two contracts by her, and it is contended that this finding is without sufficient support in the evidence. It may be that, in strictness, the finding was not justified; but, if so, the considerations passing to respondent were merely nominal, and the disparity between what she got and what appellant got under the contracts is so marked that it may be truly said that no substantial consideration passed to her. If, then, the finding is technically erroneous, there is no material injury wrought by it. A husband may not, by the undue pressure of illegitimate argument or persuasion, induce a wife to part, for a mess of pottage, with valuable rights which are hers under the marriage covenant, and then attempt to justify the relinquishment by her and the seizure by him, for it was in this instance nothing less than that, upon the ground that a nominal consideration passed between them. In view of these remarks it is proper for us to recapitulate the provisions of the two contracts bearing upon the matter of consideration and to state what was done under them. The first contract provides for the payment of $5 to respondent, and the amount was paid. The second contract provides that $500 should be paid to her, and that amount was handed to her, but she immediately returned it to appellant, saying that she did not want it. Aside from these matters of monetary consideration, appellant by the terms of the contracts made quitclaim to respondent of property that was admittedly hers and released her from liability to support him, a liability which can but seldom be invoked against a wife. In this instance the liability was practically nil, viewing the situation as of the time when the contracts were executed, for the trial court found that appellant was then worth not less than $50,000. Respondent was then worth not more than a third of that amount. In contrast with the unsubstantial considerations moving to respondent, observe the covenants of the contracts inuring to the benefit of the husband, laying aside those matters of release and quitclaim which are reciprocal to certain of those in favor of the wife and which are of no more value. The husband is released for all time from all obligation to support the wife and from all obligation to pay alimony, attorney's fees, or court costs in any divorce action commenced by either party, and is released from liability to suits for separate maintenance. When the covenants of the contracts are thus contrasted, it is at once apparent that the arrangement made by them is woefully one-sided, so much so that our remark made above is practically correct; that is, that by the contracts the husband got much while the wife got nothing. We are satisfied that the disparity between the acquisitions of the respective parties under the contracts is so great that the finding that no consideration passed to respondent is justified, or, at least, if that finding be not supported by the evidence, when strict rules are applied, then the error is harmless. In other words, under the record as presented to us the allegation of the amended complaint that no consideration passed to respondent for the contract is an immaterial one. If some slight consideration did pass to the wife, the contracts were practically unilateral and were manifestly unjust and unfair as to her.

[9] Appellant objects to the sufficiency of the evidence to support a finding of the trial court that appellant procured the two contracts in order to effect his release from any obligation to support respondent or to support any child or children which might be born to the parties. We need not look far in a search for evidence to support this finding, except, it is true, that part of it referring to the maintenance of children. The finding, with the exception noted, is in accord with the terms of the two contracts entered into by the parties. We might very properly dismiss the question presented by appellant with this assertion, but we elect to pursue the subject further, for it is one which has a bearing on the entire case. A full discussion of it will present an opportunity to expose, more clearly than we have yet done, the iniquity of the arrangement which appellant wrested from respondent by means of the two contracts which he procured from her in such an illicit manner. In considering the contracts themselves, we are to remember what we have said in the last preceding paragraph upon the subject of the lack of consideration moving to the wife, for our remarks on that head are somewhat germane to the present point. From what we there said it is apparent that on the face of the contracts the only real consideration passing to the wife was the $500, the receipt of which she acknowledged in terms, although we have shown that the consideration mentioned did not really pass, for the money was returned to appellant the moment the wife had it in her hands. The reciprocal releases and quitclaims between the parties gave to them respectively no substantial rights whatever, except only the release of the husband from all liability to support the wife. If we strip the contracts of their superfluous integuments and view them in their nakedness, this release of the husband represents the whole agreement between the parties; or, keeping in mind the provision for a consideration of $500 moving to the wife, in an endeavor to ascertain the intent of the parties from the face of the contracts, thus escaping the conclusion that by their very terms the agreements are unilateral, we have neither more nor less than this as the effect of the documents: The wife is to be paid the sum mentioned as the price for a release of the husband from all obligation to support her. This course of reasoning would seem to demonstrate, from the face of the contracts, the propriety of the finding as to the purpose of the husband in procuring them, with the exception, again, of that portion of the finding relating to the support of children. We shall again touch upon that part of the finding later.

It is true that the wife says in her testimony that the husband besought her to "sign away" her interest in his property. It is true that the husband testified in practically the same manner, as witness the following question addressed to him and his answer to it:

> "The Court: But what was the direct result you expected to accomplish; was it that you expected by this to prevent her from inheriting your property, or was it to relieve you of the trouble of having to support her? A. No, no; it was just simply to have my property in some definite shape, to please my father and uncle, because as I say, I was very much obligated to them."

This testimony about the wife "signing away" her interest in the property and about the husband's desire to have his property "in some definite shape" is in strict accord with the letter of the two contracts. She did sign away her interest, in terms, but the signing away amounted to absolutely nothing when considered apart from the matter of her right to support and maintenance out of whatever income the husband received or whatever property he possessed, and apart from her release of the husband from all liability to support and maintain her. Who can deny that the two contracts would amount to nothing if the release clause just mentioned were not incorporated in them? If they had been executed in all respects as they are, but with the release clause omitted, they would have been mere scraps of paper; and it is quite apparent to us that, with the release clause omitted, the husband would not have urged that they be executed. There is nothing in the record before us to show that the wife ever made claim to any interest in the husband's property. On the other hand, there is not the slightest doubt that the property was the husband's separate estate, and that the wife had never disputed the fact. The property all stood of record in the husband's name. According to the undisputed fact, it was a gift from his father and his uncle. That is what the husband refers to in the answer quoted above when he says, "I was very much obligated to them." The mere fact that the release clause was included in the contracts at all, taken in connection with the fact that the property was the husband's separate estate, is most persuasive of the view that the clause was inserted as the main feature of the agreements. It was solely through her right to support and maintenance that the wife could make any claim upon the separate property of the husband or upon his income arising from it. Therefore a deprivation of her right to support and maintenance was the one great thing to be accomplished, and we are satisfied that the arguments addressed by the husband to the wife were employed, in effect, for the purpose of inducing her consent to the release clause. It is apparent to us that the trial court was justified in finding that the purpose of the husband in procuring the contracts was to effect a release from his obligation to support her.

[10] We have left for later treatment that portion of the finding now under discussion to the effect that the purpose of appellant in procuring the contracts was to effect a release from obligation to support children which might be born to the parties. This part of the finding is not warranted by anything appearing in the contracts, for their terms will not allow a construction indicating any such intent on the part of appellant. In truth, this view is assented to by respondent. She argues, however, that her testimony to the effect that appellant failed to contribute substantially to the support of the child born to the parties some months after the execution of the contracts, by relation back, sufficiently shows an intent on appellant's part, in procuring the contracts, to escape liability to support children thereafter to be born. We cannot assent to such a proposition. The entire circumstances of the case convince us that appellant believed at the time the contracts were executed that no children would ever be born to respondent and him. The amended complaint alleges and the evidence conclusively shows that when the contracts were signed neither of the parties suspected the impending arrival of the child, which was born some months later. Further, we are convinced that the husband believed at the time of the execution of the contracts, that he and respondent would not be long together, and that for that reason he had not in mind the possible coming of children. The contracts do not by their terms contemplate a separation, it is true. Nevertheless, and although appellant could sacrifice the rights of his wife by persuading her to execute such contracts as those before us merely, to use his own words, "to please my father and uncle," and to "make them feel better," we cannot convict him of the enormity of desiring to remain long with a wife from whom he had wrung a contract providing for his release from all liability to support and maintain her. We are satisfied, then, that all thought of children was out of his mind. It is true that he did remain with the wife until shortly after the coming of the child, and he says he did "take care" of her during that period. He would have been hard indeed could he have done otherwise. The second contract was executed July 12, 1915, and the child was born April 7, 1916, less than nine months afterward. If we take the period of 280 days, the time fixed by science as the average period of gestation, instead of the even 9 months popularly ascribed to that phenomenon, respondent was 10 days advanced in her pregnancy at the time the second contract was signed. At any rate, her condition could not have remained a secret for any great length of time after the execution of that document. Under such conditions it would be practically impossible for any man to forsake his wife. These remarks will serve to explain why, in our opinion, a separation of the parties did not occur immediately after the signing of the second contract; and the fact that it did occur soon after the child was born further supports our theory. We are satisfied that in procuring the contracts appellant had no purpose to escape liability for the support of children, and that the finding to the contrary is not warranted by the evidence. We are far from deciding, however, that the impropriety of this finding amounts to reversible error. As we have already shown, the two contracts sought to be rescinded are so palpably unjust and unfair to respondent, on other grounds, that the failure to find correctly upon this issue is harmless. It makes no difference whether or not appellant purposed by the procuring of the contracts to avoid liability to support children later to be born to respondent and him.

[11] Respondent alleged in her amended complaint that she was worth only about $5,000 at the time of the execution of the two contracts between the parties. This averment was denied by appellant, and in addition he alleged affirmatively that respondent was worth "to exceed" $16,000. The trial court found upon these issues that respondent was worth $5,000 and it is contended that the finding is not supported by the evidence. This contention must be sustained, as there is no evidence in the record upon which the court might properly have based the finding. If, however, we take the worth of respondent as it is alleged in appellant's answer—that is, as being the sum of $16,000—we are unable to see that what we have said above as to the unfairness of the contracts to the wife is to any extent affected. If the trial court had found respondent's worth to be as alleged in the answer, we could have taken no different view of the merits of the cause. It is therefore apparent to us that the court's error in finding her worth to be but $5,000 was harmless and unprejudicial.

[12] Section 159 of the Civil Code provides:

> "A husband and wife cannot, by any contract with each other, alter their legal relations, except as to property, and except that they may agree in writing, to an immediate separation, and may make provision for the support of either of them and of their children during such separation."

Inasmuch as the contracts between respondent and appellant make no provision for a separation of the parties, either "immediate" or otherwise, respondent contends that the contracts are void as against the public policy indicated by the terms of section 159. Under the views which we have above expressed as to the effect and main purpose of these contracts, we are of the opinion that the point made by respondent is well taken. The contracts are within the language of the Supreme Court in Pereira v. Pereira, 156 Cal. 1, 103 Pac. 488, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 880, 134 Am. St. Rep. 107. By their terms appellant was placed in such a position that he might at any time abandon respondent, or commit any other breach of the marriage covenant, with impunity, except that respondent could secure a decree of divorce from him. By the contracts he was granted complete immunity from any financial charge whatever, and that, too, whether he continued to live with his wife, either as a faithful or a faithless husband, or whether he deserted her in whatever shameless a manner; and he was equally freed from liability to suit for separate maintenance, however flagrant his conduct. Such contracts afford most persuasive temptation to marital infidelity, and cannot be upheld, even if we forget the existence of such legislation as is embraced in section 159.

We need not consider the various other respects in which it is contended by appellant that the trial court committed error.

55 Cal. App. 595

FLORES v. FLORES. (Civ. 3756.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Dec. 12, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 9, 1922.)

1. Deeds 🔑38(1)—Description that identifies property is sufficient.

The grantee of a deed is entitled to have title declared in him wherever, by reason of a fair interpretation of the terms of the conveyance, assisted by extrinsic evidence, the property may be identified.

2. Descent and distribution 🔑84—Grants by a widow of interest in property devised to her by her deceased husband held valid.

Two deeds by a widow to plaintiff, reciting that in one of the courts in the "county of Imperial Valley" there was being administered grantor's husband's properties, all of which he left to her by will "as follows: * * * seven lots situated in the city of C.," each deed conveying "a 25 per cent. of the rights which she represents in the properties," operated to convey to plaintiff a one-half interest in all of the real estate located in the city of C. which was owned by her husband at the time of his death, and which was therefore a part of his estate then being administered on by the probate court in the county of Imperial, and the fact that the county of Imperial was referred to in the deeds as the "county of Imperial Valley" did not impair the description.

3. Estoppel 🔑47—Decree of distribution by probate court would make good attempted transfer of title by devisee.

Where one bought of a devisee half of certain lots in the city of C. left to her by the will of her late husband, the decree of distribution would make good any title theretofore attempted to be transferred by the widow as distributed under her husband's estate.

4. Partition 🔑63(3)—Identity of property described in plaintiff's deed held sufficiently established.

In suit for partition of property, a half interest in which defendant had sold to plaintiff as land in the city of C. devised to her by her deceased husband, concerning which probate proceedings were being had in I. county as her husband's estate, plaintiff held to have sufficiently shown that the property of which grantor's husband died possessed was of the description set forth in his complaint, having offered in evidence the records in the probate proceeding in I. county in the matter of the estate of defendant's husband, from which it appeared that deceased left real property in the named city answering the general description in the deeds, and left no other property.

5. Evidence 🔑82—Inventory of property and decree of distribution presumed to contain all of property of decedent in county.

It is presumed that an inventory of a deceased person's property, filed in the probate court of I. county, and the decree of distribution, showed all the property possessed by the deceased in I. county, and all of the property that was distributed to the widow by decree of the court.

6. Partition 🔑63(3)—Failure to produce map used in probate proceedings in distribution of land held not to prevent establishing title in purchaser.

In a suit for a partition of property conveyed to a purchaser as half of all the property in the city of C. left the devisee by the will of her husband, being administered in the probate court of I. county, where the descriptions of the land in the complaint coincided with its descriptions in the probate proceedings, failure to produce a map of the land referred to in the probate proceedings does not prevent establishing title in the purchaser.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Phil D. Swing, Judge.

Suit by Jose Maria Flores against Juana E. de Flores. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Alfred Blaisdell, of Calexico, for appellant.

Ault & Anderson, of Calexico, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Plaintiff brought this action in equity, asserting that he was the owner of a one-half interest, which he held in common with the defendant, who owned the remaining interest in certain real property which was described in his complaint. He further alleged that income in the way of rentals had been collected by the defendant, who had failed to make accounting to him for any part thereof. His prayer was for partition of the property according to the interests of the parties, and for a share of the rentals and profits as the same might appear to be due him. The allegations of the complaint were sufficient in form and substance to authorize a judgment for the relief demanded. The action was tried, findings and judgment were made in favor of the defendant, and plaintiff has appealed.

To establish his interest in the land, plaintiff offered in evidence two documents, both of which were in practically identical terms, except that one was dated on the 15th of June, 1917, and the second on the 16th of July, 1917. Each purported to transfer to the plaintiff a 25 per cent. interest in the property referred to therein, and the description of the property affected in both instruments was the same. We quote those portions of the instruments which are important to be considered in connection with the questions raised by the defendant's appeal:

"Mrs. Juana E. de Flores, widow, declares and shows, that in one of the civil courts which is established in the city of El Centro, county of Imperial Valley, of the state of California, in the republic of the United States, and in the court of the first instance of this judicial district of Mexicali, there are being determined at the present time the probate actions of the properties of her deceased husband, Mr. Francisco Flores, who died in the city of Calexico in the month of March last of the present year, and who, before dying, executed in her favor a will, leaving to her, as a sole and entire heiress, all of his properties which he possessed, as well in the city of Calexico as in this city, and is as follows: * * * Seven lots situated in the city of Calexico, of and in the United States of North America, there being on one lot constructed two houses of wood, and on the land which embraces the six lots there being constructed one house, and the rest remaining vacant, and of which property she will take possession as soon as the suits concerning same are terminated and the respective adjudication is made. The said Mrs. Juana E. de Flores, widow, declares that she sells, grants, and conveys to Mr. Jose Maria Flores a 25 per cent. of the rights which she represents in the properties, which are described in the article which precedes or which is a one-quarter part of same, for the sum of 500 pesos, national gold, or its equivalent, $250, which the vendor acknowledges to have received before this act. * * * It is agreed that the buyer shall enter into possession of the (25%) twenty-five per cent. that this represents in the properties to which this writing refers, as soon as the adjudication is made to the seller, but from now he shall be able to receive the profits and rents which belong to him according to the right which he represents."

Issue was made, first, as to the execution of the instruments by the defendant; and, second, it was urged that the property was not sufficiently described in the documents to enable the land to be located by reference to that description. At the trial it was contended, further, that the evidence did not assist in making certain that description. The court found that defendant had executed the documents referred to, but sustained the other contentions, and concluded that the property had not been identified, either by the descriptions in the instruments of conveyance or the evidence submitted.

[1, 2] The grantee of a deed is entitled to have title declared in him wherever, by reason of a fair interpretation of the terms of the conveyance, assisted by extrinsic evidence, the property may be identified:

> "The fact that evidence aliunde the deed may be required to determine the land conveyed does not render insufficient a general description pointing out the subject with reasonable certainty. * * * The meaning that the parties attached to the language employed, especially in matters of description, may be shown by parol evidence relating to the situation and condition of the subject-matter, for the deed should be given a favorable construction, and one as near the meaning and intention of the parties as the rules of law will allow. A deed conveying all the lands of the grantor is not void for uncertainty of description, and passes the title to all lands in which he has an interest." Devlin on Real Estate, vol. 2 (3d Ed.) pp. 1928, 1937.

Similar expressions are found in Pingrey on Real Property, vol. 2, § 1377. Thompson v. Motor Road Co., 82 Cal. 497, 23 Pac. 130. A deed describing property as "all my right, title, and interest in Sacramento City, Upper California, consisting of town lots and buildings thereupon," was held a sufficient description to convey title. Frey v. Clifford, 44 Cal. 335. A similar holding was made as to a descriptive clause in a deed reading:

> "All lands and real estate belonging to said party of the first part, wherever the same may be situated." Pettigrew v. Dobbelaar, 63 Cal. 396.

In McCullough v. Olds, 108 Cal. 529, 41 Pac. 420, the court was considering a like question and there said:

> "The objection that the description in the deed to Couts was void for uncertainty, because it did not state the state, county, or city in which the property is situated, is not tenable. Such a statement was not necessary if without it the property could still be located and identified."

We think it quite clearly appears from the instruments executed by the widow Flores that she intended to convey to the plaintiff a one-half interest in all of the real estate located in the city of Calexico which was owned by her husband at the time of his death, and which was therefore a part of his estate then being administered upon through the probate court in the county of Imperial. That intention being made manifest, it was incumbent upon the plaintiff to show that the property of which Francisco Flores died possessed was of the description set forth in his complaint.

[3] The decree of distribution would make good any title theretofore attempted to be transferred by the widow as distributee under her husband's estate. Emeric v. Alvarado, 90 Cal. 444, 27 Pac. 356.

> "An heir may contract about or convey the title which the law had cast upon him on the death of his ancestor, and the validity or force of such contract is not affected by the fact that a probate court afterward, by its decree of distribution, declares his asserted heirship and title to be valid." Chever v. Ching Hong Poy, 82 Cal. 68, 22 Pac. 1081.

[4] The records in the probate proceeding in the matter of the estate of Francisco Flores were received in evidence, particularly the inventory of the property and the decree of final distribution. It appeared from that evidence that the inventory of the real property did show the descriptions according to the terms used by the plaintiff in describing the land; also that those descriptions covered all of the real property shown by said proceeding to have been owned by said Flores at the time of his death in Calexico. It appeared by the decree of distribution that the real property was distributed to the widow Flores, plaintiff's grantor, less a certain portion thereof which had been sold during the course of administration. Plaintiff gave testimony at the trial and stated that he knew the property of Francisco Flores located in the city of Calexico and that it was the same which he had described in his complaint; that one lot had upon it two houses, and that the remaining parcel, which was shown by other testimony to be 200 by 300 feet in dimensions and capable of being divided into six lots, each 50 by 200 feet, had upon it one house. The description of the property given by the witnesses corresponded generally with the description contained in the instruments of conveyance in so far as the same illustrated the physical condition of the lots.

The trial judge, in a written opinion which respondent prints in her brief, indicated how his conclusion as to the facts had been arrived at. In this opinion it is stated that plaintiff had failed to show "that the land described in the probate proceedings was all the land that the deceased owned in the city of Calexico," or "that the files offered to the court were the only probate proceedings pending in that court for the estate of Francisco Flores, or that the court in which said probate proceedings were pending was the only court existing at the time in the county of Imperial which had jurisdiction over probate proceedings," and further that, assuming all of those things to be proven, there was a failure to produce the map called for in the description found in the probate proceedings.

[5, 6] There was error in this reasoning of the trial judge: In the first place, there was only one court which could have jurisdiction of probate proceedings in the county of Imperial. In the second place, it would be presumed that the inventory filed in that case and the decree of distributon showed, first, all of the property possessed by the deceased in the county of Imperial; and, second, all of the property that was distributed to the widow by decree of that court. The absence from the evidence of the map referred to in the probate proceedings has no significance at all as influencing the determination of the issues which the court was called upon to make. We will presume that the decree of distribution and the appraisement list correctly described the property. Plaintiff having shown that he was entitled to a one-half interest in all of that property (at least so much as was distributed to the defendant), the only question which it was necessary to further determine was as to whether the description set forth in the complaint corresponded with the descriptions which the probate proceedings exhibited. We have already remarked that those descriptions coincided. If the instruments of conveyance are interpreted as not on their face importing an intention to transfer interests in all of the real property of which Flores died possessed, but, rather, interests only in particular property intended to be specifically described, our conclusion would be the same. That is, it having appeared by the evidence that the deceased left real property in the city of Calexico answering generally to the description contained in the deeds, and that he left no other property, the identity was sufficiently established.

The fact that the county of Imperial was referred to in the deeds as the "County of Imperial Valley" did not impair the description. There was in fact a city of Calexico in the county of Imperial, and in the probate court of that county there were pending the proceedings in the estate of Francisco Flores at the time the deeds were made. Considering these facts, with all of the circumstances surrounding the parties, a court would not be justified in concluding that possibly some other city of Calexico, some other county of Imperial, in some other location in the United States, were intended to be designated.

The findings of the court are not sustained by the evidence.

The judgment is reversed.

STARK v. SHEMADA. (L. A. 6915.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 27, 1922.)

1. Damages 🔑79(5)—$500 damages for failure to deliver $1,700 worth of secondhand goods held a penalty.

In contract by which defendant sold plaintiff, for $1,700, the furniture and furnishings of a certain hotel, a stipulation that defendant should pay $500 stipulated damages in case he defaulted in delivery of the goods, was invalid as a penalty under Civ. Code, §§ 1670, 1671, in view of sections 3308, 3354; the fact that the goods were purchased by plaintiff, a secondhand furniture dealer, to be sold at auction, not bringing the stipulation within the exception of section 1671, as providing for a case in which "it would be impracticable or extremely difficult to fix the actual damage."

2. Evidence 🔑18—Judicial notice taken that secondhand furniture has a readily ascertainable market value.

It is a matter of common knowledge that secondhand household and hotel furnishings are a commodity of extensive barter and sale, with a market value, according to condition and quality, readily ascertainable.

3. Damages 🔑79(1)—Stipulation for liquidated damages founded on a statement of difficulty of fixing damages will not be sustained if not supported by fact.

Though parties to a contract providing for liquidated damages have agreed by written stipulation that it would be impracticable and difficult to fix actual damages, if the facts do not support the stipulation, it will not be enforced.

4. Appeal and error 🔑907(3)—Presumption that finding of trial court is based on evidence held precluded by recital of conditions in findings.

In an action on a contract for liquidated damages, the presumption, on appeal on judgment roll alone, that the finding of the trial court that the damages were the specified amount was based on circumstances surrounding the transaction which appeared in evidence, was precluded by the court's predicating its finding on a recital of conditions that contract was for the sale of secondhand goods and that the damages would be extremely difficult to determine, which conditions are not sufficient to sustain an agreement for liquidated damages.

5. Trial 🔑404(2)—Where special facts on which finding rests are declared by the court, the ultimate finding is a conclusion of law.

Where the special facts upon which a finding rests are declared by the court, the ultimate finding of the court is but a conclusion of law with no better foundation than is given by the facts recited.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leslie R. Hewitt, Judge.

Action by B. Stark against M. Shemada. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Cedric E. Johnson, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

E. F. Gerecht and C. W. Hall, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOANE, J. Defendant appeals from a judgment awarding plaintiff as liquidated damages the sum of $500 for breach of a contract for the sale of certain secondhand household furniture.

[1] By the terms of the agreement defendant sold to the plaintiff the furniture and furnishings of the premises known as the Federal Hotel in the city of Los Angeles for the agreed price of $1,700. It was stipulated by the parties that should the plaintiff fail to take the goods or pay the purchase price on the 24th of January, 1919, he was to forfeit the sum of $50 cash on the purchase price, and the sum of $450 additional which he had deposited in bank on account of said transaction; and should the defendant refuse to deliver to plaintiff the possession of the goods on said 24th of January, 1919, defendant should pay to plaintiff the sum of $500.

The defendant defaulted in the delivery of the goods on tender of performance by the plaintiff at the date stipulated.

The stipulated damages, therefore, on the part of the defendant, are all we are concerned with on this appeal.

The precise terms of the contract in this particular are as follows:

> "It is also agreed that in case the said Shemada [the defendant] fails to deliver said furniture to said B. Stark [the plaintiff] on January 24th, 1919, he is to pay B. Stark the sum of $500.00 as a forfeit for his failure to deliver said furniture."

Whether this stipulation is for a penalty, or as liquidated damages, we are satisfied it will not support the judgment appealed from.

It is pleaded as liquidated damages in the amended complaint.

In an attempt to avoid the application of sections 1670 and 1671 of the Civil Code wherein it is declared that "every contract by which the amount of damage to be paid, or other compensation to be made, for a breach of an obligation, is determined in anticipation thereof" shall be void, except "when, from the nature of the case, it would be impracticable or extremely difficult to fix the actual damage," the amended complaint contains the following allegations:

> "That the business of the plaintiff is that of an auctioneer and that the sole purpose for the purchasing of said furniture and furnishings from defendant by this plaintiff was to sell said furniture and furnishings by auction at public sale, all of which facts the defendant knew at all times mentioned herein, and the amount to be realized from said sale of said furniture and furnishings depended entirely on the conditions surrounding said public sale, and naturally the amount of the profits to be made cannot be ascertained, as there is no way to ascertain the amount that each piece of furniture or furnishings would bring at such sale; that from the nature of the case it would be impractical or extremely difficult to fix the actual damage suffered by plaintiff in case of a breach of said agreement on the part of defendant, and that fact being recognized by both parties hereto, the sum of $500 was agreed upon as the amount of damage to be paid to plaintiff by defendant in case of a breach of the terms of said agreement by defendant; that it is impractical to fix the actual damage suffered by plaintiff herein by reason of the breach of said agreement on the part of defendant because of the facts as hereinabove set forth."

There is nothing contained in these averments of the complaint to bring the stipulated damages within the exception of the Civil Code, § 1671.

The circumstance that plaintiff was an auctioneer, and that his purpose, as known to the defendant, was to sell the goods again at public auction, does not add anything to the ordinary measure of damages for breach of the contract to sell.

[2] The essential facts are that this secondhand furniture as shown by the pleadings and findings was an ordinary commodity of personal property to be bought and sold on the open market. It is a matter of common knowledge that secondhand household and hotel furnishings are a commodity of extensive barter and sale, with a market value, according to its condition and quality, readily ascertainable. The obligation of the vendor is not to guarantee the purchaser a certain future profit whether on public or private sale. His liability is fixed by statute.

The breach of an agreement to sell personal property, the price of which has not been fully paid in advance, as is the situation here, is declared by section 3308 of the Civil Code to be "the excess, if any, of the value of the property to the buyer, over the amount which would have been due to the seller under the contract, if it had been fulfilled," and in estimating damages it is provided by section 3354 of the Civil Code that—

> "The value of the property, to a buyer, or owner thereof, deprived of its possession, is deemed to be the price at which he might have bought an equivalent thing in the market nearest to the place where the property ought to have been put into his possession, and at such time after the breach of duty upon which his right to damages is founded as would suffice, with reasonable diligence, for him to make such a purchase."

Circumstances may arise where, when the property is purchased for a special purpose, or has a special value, special damages may be allowed, but the facts as here pleaded and found that the goods were purchased by a dealer in secondhand furniture to be sold at auction in the line of his business does not take the case out of the general rule.

[3] Even where the parties to the contract for liquidated damages have by written stipulation agreed that it would be impracticable and extremely difficult to fix the actual damages, if the facts do not support such stipulation it cannot be enforced. Pacific Factor Co. v. Adler, 90 Cal. 110, 27 Pac. 36, 25 Am. St. Rep. 102; Patent Brick Co. v. Moore, 75 Cal. 205, 16 Pac. 890.

[4] This appeal was taken on the judgment roll alone, and the trial court has found, in accordance with the allegations of the complaint:

> "That it is true that from the nature of the business of the plaintiff, and of the defendant, it would be impracticable and extremely difficult to fix the actual damage suffered by either party in the event of a failure of either party to fulfill his part of the agreement."

Doubtless it is upon this fact that the learned District Court of Appeal, from whose decision this hearing was granted, based its judgment of affirmance. The presumption might ordinarily be indulged that facts and circumstances surrounding the transaction appeared in evidence before the trial court to support its finding. We think, however, that such presumption is precluded here from the circumstance that the court predicated its finding upon a recital of the conditions that plaintiff was an auctioneer, and dealer in secondhand goods and bought the furniture for resale, together with other reasons stated in the complaint, as the basis for the conclusion that it would be impracticable and extremely difficult to fix the actual damages.

[5] Where the special facts upon which a finding rests are declared by the court, the ultimate finding of the court is but a conclusion of law with no better foundation than is given by the facts recited. Ions v. Harbison, 112 Cal. 260, 44 Pac. 572; Niles v. Edwards, 90 Cal. 10, 27 Pac. 159, 296; Klein v. Lewis, 41 Cal. App. 463, 182 Pac. 789. As already pointed out, the conditions under which this stipulation for liquidated damages was given, and as recited in both the complaint and the findings, do not support the judgment for damages.

There are other specifications of error advanced by appellant; but, as the judgment must be reversed on the ground discussed, it is unnecessary to consider them.

The judgment is reversed.

WILBUR, J. I concur.

Under sections 3308 and 3314 of the Civil Code, the measure of damages for the failure to deliver personal property sold is fixed by law and thus rendered definite and certain. Application by Robert Stevenson for writ of habeas corpus. Writ denied.

Robert Stevenson, in pro. per.

SHAW, C. J. The petitioner, Robert Stevenson, is imprisoned in the state prison at Represa, Cal., upon a charge of forgery under sentence for the period prescribed by law. He applies for a writ of habeas corpus on the ground that prior to the time he was charged with the crime and sentenced to imprisonment he had been committed to the Norwalk state hospital as an insane person and that he had never been lawfully discharged from said hospital nor formally declared restored to sanity, and that until he was so restored or discharged from that custody he could not be prosecuted for felony.

[1-3] The petitioner is mistaken with regard to the effect of the commitment to a state hospital as an insane person. When a person is charged with crime by information or indictment, if the defense of insanity exists, it must be presented to the court having jurisdiction of the cause, and the decision of that court is final against any collateral attack. If an appeal is taken the appellate court may consider the question. Its decision thereon, when it becomes final, if it affirms the judgment, puts the case beyond further consideration by any court. So far as the legality of the sentence for the crime charged is concerned, habeas corpus does not lie unless the lack of jurisdiction appears on the fact of the record of conviction. If it does not so appear the jurisdiction will be presumed. These propositions also apply to the question whether the court had authority to proceed with the trial of the criminal charge upon the claim that he was at that time of unsound mind. After the conviction and sentence have become final, the question of his insanity at the time of trial cannot be raised on habeas corpus.

The petition for a writ of habeas corpus is denied.

PEOPLE v. FORD MOTOR CO. (Sac. 3055.)

1. Taxation 🔑165—Foreign corporation's exercise of right to do intrastate business is taxable franchise.

The exercise by a foreign corporation of the power of engaging in intrastate business in this state is a franchise subject to taxation under Const. art. 13, § 1, and section 14, subd. (d).

2. Taxation 🔑165—Franchise of foreign corporation held subject to franchise tax, though not contemplated by authors of constitutional provision.

Under Const. art. 13, § 14, subd. (d), providing for the assessment of franchises at their actual cash value, as interpreted by St. 1911, p. 530, § 5, providing that such franchise shall include the actual exercise by a foreign corporation of the right to do business as a corporation in this state, the franchise of such a corporation is subject to a property tax, though the revenue commission which proposed the general system of taxation embodied in section 14 did not contemplate such result; the language of such section being definite and unambiguous.

3. Taxation 🔑592—Complaint in action to recover franchise tax on foreign corporation held sufficient.

A complaint in an action to recover a franchise tax on a foreign corporation held sufficient as against a general demurrer, though it referred to both the right to do business and the exercise of such right as a franchise, where it was apparent from the complaint as a whole that it was not the mere right but the actual exercise thereof on which the tax was sought to be imposed.

4. Pleading 🔑364(5)—No error in striking from answer denials of facts admitted therein.

In an action to recover a franchise tax on a foreign corporation, where defendant admitted in its answer and at the trial that it was doing an intrastate business, the court did not err in striking from the answer denials that it had a franchise in the state; such admission being tantamount to an admission that it had a franchise taxable in the state, and the denials being merely incorrect conclusions of law.

5. Taxation 🔑593(1)—Testimony as to methods of valuation in other years and rate of general taxation properly excluded in action to impose franchise tax.

In an action to recover a franchise tax on a foreign corporation, the court properly sustained objections to questions as to the method of valuation followed by the board of equalization in other years than that for which the tax was sought to be imposed and the rate at which property in general was taxed for other than state purposes; such matters being irrelevant and immaterial.

6. Appeal and error 🔑1058(2)—Error in sustaining objection to questions not considered, where objection ultimately overruled and answer permitted.

Error in sustaining an objection to questions will not be considered, where such objection was ultimately overruled and the court permitted the questions to be answered.

7. Appeal and error 🔑1058(2)—Error in sustaining objections to questions not prejudicial, where witnesses testified to same facts.

In an action to impose a franchise tax on a foreign corporation, where members of the board of equalization testified as to the general method followed in determining the value of defendant's franchise and that similar corporations similarly situated were treated in the same way, error, if any, in sustaining an objection to hypothetical questions as to the method of valuation was not prejudicial to defendant.

8. Commerce 🔑69—Constitutional law 🔑283—Taxation 🔑37—Method of determining value of franchise of foreign corporation held constitutional.

Determination of the value of a franchise of a foreign corporation for taxation purposes, by deducting from the value of its total assets the value of its tangible property and fixing the value of the corporate excess in the state at that percentage of the difference represented by the ratio between its intrastate and total business, held not violative of the interstate commerce clause (Const. U. S. art. 1, § 8), or Fourteenth Amendment of the United States Constitution, nor arbitrary or unreasonable.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by the People of the State of California against the Ford Motor Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. F. Williamson, of San Francisco (Edward Elliott, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

U. S. Webb and Frank L. Guerena, both of San Francisco, for the People.

LENNON, J. The state of California instituted the present action against the Ford Motor Company for the recovery of a franchise tax for the fiscal year 1915–1916, in the sum of $24,000, and accrued delinquency penalties amounting to $3,000. Judgment was rendered in favor of the state, and defendant appeals.

Upon this appeal the first question for consideration is whether the Constitution and laws of this state authorize the imposition of a franchise tax upon the defendant, a corporation organized under the laws of the state of Michigan and transacting both interstate and intrastate business in the state of California. Article 13, § 1, of the Constitution of California, provides:

> "All property in the state except as otherwise in this Constitution provided, not exempt under the laws of the United States, shall be taxed in proportion to its value, to be ascertained as provided by law, or as hereinafter provided. The word 'property,' as used in this article and section, is hereby declared to include * * * franchises. * * *"

Section 14 of the same article reads in part:

> "(d) All franchises, other than those expressly provided for in this section, shall be assessed at their actual cash value, in the manner to be provided by law. * * *"

These sections of the Constitution in effect authorize a tax upon all franchises in this state not exempt under the laws of the United States, unless otherwise expressly provided in the Constitution.

[1] This court has held that, by the use of the term "franchises" in these sections of the Constitution, it is intended to provide for the taxation of the intangible property of the corporation. Miller & Lux v. Richardson, 182 Cal. 115, 187 Pac. 411. The right to be a corporation, or to do business as a corporation, is a franchise which ordinarily has its situs at the place where the home office of the corporation is situated, but, when a corporation engages in business in a state other than the state wherein it was chartered, the actual exercise of the power to engage in business creates valuable intangible property in the foreign state where the business is transacted. In other words, the actual exercise of the power to do business is also a franchise, and such a franchise has a substantial existence in every state where the business is transacted. People v. Alaska Steamship Co., 182 Cal. 202, 187 Pac. 742. In so far as this franchise, or intangible property, consists of the exercise of the power to transact intrastate business within the foreign state, it may be taxed by that state. Adams Express Co. v. Ohio, 166 U. S. 185, 17 Sup. Ct. 604, 41 L. Ed. 965; People v. Alaska Steamship Co., supra. It follows that, if a foreign corporation is actually exercising its right to do business in this state and is doing an intrastate business it thereby has in this state taxable intangible property. Since the exercise by a foreign corporation of the power of engaging in intrastate business in this state is a franchise in this state not exempt under the laws of the United States and not excepted in the state Constitution, it is property taxable under section 14, art. 14, of the Constitution.

[2] Appellant contends that the revenue commission which proposed the general system of taxation ultimately embodied in section 14, art. 14, of the Constitution, did not contemplate that foreign corporations should pay a tax on franchises in the sense of "corporate excess," that is, a property tax, but that subdivision (d) of that section, above quoted, refers only to domestic corporations. However, the language of the constitutional section is definite and unambiguous in this respect, and it is not permissible to go outside of the Constitution itself and consult the reports of the commission and other sources for the purpose of construing words or phrases the meaning of which, as used in the Constitution, admits of no doubt. As stated in Pacific Gas & Electric Co. v. Roberts, 176 Cal. 183, 192, 167 Pac. 845, 848:

> "While the report is very valuable and enlightening upon the subject treated, we cannot read it into the Constitution for the purpose of defining words of plain meaning. If we were to be governed by contemporaneous construction, we would have to consider also that given by the Legislature to the fourteenth section of article 13 shortly after its adoption."

This interpretation is to be found in the statutes of 1911, p. 530, c. 335, § 5, where the Legislature provided:

> "All franchises * * * shall be assessed at their actual cash value. * * * These franchises shall include the actual exercise of the right to be a corporation and to do business as a corporation under the laws of this state and the actual exercise of the right to do business as a corporation in this state when such right is exercised by a corporation incorporated under the laws of any other state or country."

[3, 4] The next contention is that the court committed reversible error in overruling defendant's demurrer to the complaint. The complaint is claimed to be defective, in that it alleges that the tax was levied on the "right to do business in the state of California, rather than the "actual exercise of the right to do business in the state of California." It is true that there is language in the complaint susceptible of the construction contended for by appellant, arising from the fact that the complaint refers to both the "right to do business" and the "exercise of the right to do business" as a franchise. This creates some confusion and ambiguity. However, it is apparent from the complaint as a whole that it was not the mere right to do business, but the actual exercise of that right within this state, which constituted the property taxes, and the complaint was therefore sufficient as against an attack by general demurrer. Likewise, no error was committed by the court in striking from appellant's answer the denials that it had or possessed a franchise in the state of California. Appellant admitted in its answer and at the trial that it was doing an intrastate business in this state, and, in view of what we have previously said, this was tantamount to an admission that the defendant had a franchise taxable in this state. Under the circumstances the denials in question were merely incorrect conclusions of law which served but to confuse the issues and were properly eliminated.

[5] The third alleged error in law to which appellant directs attention is the action of the court in sustaining objections to a number of questions put to certain witnesses by appellant. In this connection appellant relies upon but one proposition of law, namely, that the corporation was entitled to examine the members of the board of equalization concerning the method pursued by them in arriving at the value of the property to be taxed. Conceding, for the purpose of discussion, this proposition to be correct, it is of no avail to appellant, for it does not appear that appellant was prevented from ascertaining the method by which the value of appellant's franchise was determined. By some of the questions appellant sought to ascertain the methods of valuation followed by the board in other years and the rate at which property in general was taxed for purposes other than state purposes. These matters were clearly irrelevant and immaterial, for the validity of the 1915 state tax on appellant's franchise was the sole question before the court, and in this connection the methods of valuation followed in previous years or the rates employed in imposing taxes of a different nature were of no moment.

[6, 7] It appears that the tax in suit had been originally computed at the sum of $29,700, and that the board had thereafter, upon the hearing of an application by the appellant for a reduction, reduced the tax to $24,000, which amount was finally fixed by the board. Appellant sought to question the witnesses as to the method by which the board fixed the sum of $29,700 as the amount of the tax in the first instance, and now complains that the court erroneously sustained an objection to such questions. Conceding that the method adopted by the board in fixing the tax at the higher sum was material and relevant to an inquiry as to the method by which they arrived at the tax which was finally fixed, still the record shows that the trial court did not, as counsel contends, sustain the objection to the questions referred to. On the contrary, the record shows that the objection was ultimately overruled, and that the court permitted every question propounded by counsel for appellant upon that phase of the case to be answered. No prejudice was suffered by appellant in the sustaining of objections to any of the hypothetical questions concerning method of valuation, for elsewhere in the record it appears that the witnesses were permitted to testify as to the general method followed in determining the value of appellant's franchise in 1915. Nor was any prejudicial error committed in sustaining objections to questions regarding the uniform application of the method, for these questions were but a repetition of previous questions in answer to which the witness testified that all similar corporations similarly situated were treated in the same way as the appellant corporation.

[8] Appellant's final attack is directed against the method of assessment. That method was as follows: The board first determined the value of the total assets of the corporation, that is, the capital stock and securities, from which it deducted the value of the tangible property of the corporation. The value of the corporate excess in California was then determined by taking that percentage of this difference (which was the total corporate excess) represented by the ratio between the intrastate business in California and the total business of the corporation. It is claimed that this method of allocation is violative of the interstate commerce clause (Const. U. S. art. 1, § 8), and of the Fourteenth Amendment of the United States Constitution.

This contention is answered by the United States Supreme Court in the case of Horn Silver Mining Co. v. New York, 143 U. S. 305, 12 Sup. Ct. 403, 36 L. Ed. 164. In this case the corporation was organized in the state of Utah and was doing some intrastate business; it appearing, however, that the great bulk of its business and capital was outside of the state of New York. In discussing the validity of a tax imposed by New York upon "corporate franchise or business," the United States Supreme Court said:

"The counsel for the appellant objects that the statute of New York is to be treated as a tax law, and not as a license to the corporation for permission to do business in the state. Conceding such to be the case we do not perceive how it in any respect affects the validity of the tax. However it may be regarded, it is the condition upon which a foreign corporation can do business in the state, and in doing such business it puts itself under the law of the state, however that may be characterized. * * * It is true, the greater part of the business of the company was done out of the state, and the greater part of its capital was also without it, but the statute of New York does not require that the whole business of a foreign corporation shall be done within the state in order to subject it to the taxing power of the state. It makes, in that respect, no difference between home corporations and foreign corporations, as to the franchise or business of the corporation upon which the tax is levied, provided it does business within the state, as such corporation. There seems to be a hardship in estimating the amount of the tax upon the corporation, for doing business within the state, according to the amount of its business or capital without the state. That is a matter, however, resting entirely in the control of the state, and not a matter of federal law, and with which, of course, this court can in no way interfere."

Upon the authority of that case, the validity of the tax here attacked seems clear, for the method employed in fixing the amount of the corporate excess or intangible property situated in this state called for a division of the entire excess in the proportion that the California business bore to the entire business—a method which would doubtless be characterized as fairer than that pursued and upheld in the Horn Case.

The argument with respect to the application of the Fourteenth Amendment of the United States Constitution is further answered by the United States Supreme Court in the case of Underwood Typewriter Co. v. Chamberlain, 254 U. S. 113, 41 Sup. Ct. 45, 65 L. Ed. 165. In this case the state of Connecticut had taxed a Delaware corporation operating within its borders, and the court said:

"The Legislature, in attempting to put upon this business its fair share of the burden of taxation, was faced with the impossibility of allocating specifically the profits earned by the processes conducted within its borders. It, therefore, adopted a method of apportionment which, for all that appears in this record, reached, and was meant to reach, only the profits earned within the state. 'The plaintiff's argument on this branch of the case,' as stated by the Supreme Court of Errors, 'carries the burden of showing that 47 per cent. of its net income is not reasonably attributable, for purposes of taxation, to the manufacture of products from the sale of which 80 per cent. of its gross earnings was derived after paying manufacturing costs.' The corporation has not even attempted to show this."

Similarly, in the instant case, there is no showing that the percentage of the corporation's total intangible property apportioned to the state of California was an arbitrary or unreasonable allocation.

The judgment is affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 27, 1922.)

1. Pleading 🔑129(2)—Allegations not denied deemed admitted.

In an action by a trustee in bankruptcy of a corporation to recover the difference between the amounts agreed to be paid for stock and the par value of the stock, where allegations that defendants had paid the sums agreed to be paid, and that pursuant to their directions the stock was issued to a third person were not denied, the facts alleged may be taken as admitted facts.

2. Stipulations 🔑14(7)—Stipulation of parties held to support allegation as against motion for nonsuit.

In an action by a trustee in bankruptcy to recover the difference between the amount agreed to be paid for stock and its par value, where the parties stipulated that plaintiff had offered evidence tending to prove all the allegations of the complaint except those that defendants were stockholders or subscribed to the stock, the stipulation sufficiently supported, as against a motion for a nonsuit, the allegation that the corporation and defendants' nominee to whom the stock was issued were at all times insolvent and known by defendants to be so.

3. Corporations 🔑268(1)—Allegation as to transfer of stock to insolvent person to escape liability held defective.

Under the rule that the transfer of stock of an insolvent corporation to a financially irresponsible person, made with intent to escape liability as a stockholder, will not suffice to enable the transferer to escape such liability, an allegation that pursuant to defendants' direction a certificate for stock subscribed by them was issued to a third person, and that he was insolvent and known by defendants to be so, was defective, where it did not allege that defendants' direction was given with the intent and purpose of evading the stockholder's liability.

4. Appeal and error 🔑241—Trial 🔑163—Grounds of nonsuit not mentioned in motion not considered on hearing or on appeal.

In an action to recover the difference between the amount which defendants agreed to pay for stock in a corporation and its par value, where the failure to allege that their direction that the stock be issued to an insolvent person was with intent and purpose to evade their liability as stockholders was not made a ground of the motion for a nonsuit, it could not be considered on such motion, nor by the court of appeal in determining the merits of the motion, as the defect might have been remedied if attention had been called thereto.

5. Corporations 🔑243(2)—Stock issued after a permit for sale obtained on previous subscription agreement held valid so as to subject subscribers to liability of stockholders.

Conceding that a subscription for corporate stock was in its inception void and incapable of acceptance by the corporation because executed in contravention of St. 1913, p. 715, before the procurement of a permit from the corporation commission authorizing a sale of the stock, where the stock was not issued until after a permit had been granted, the subscription agreement should be construed as a continuing offer to subscribe which ultimately became the embodiment and expression of a new agreement, the validity of which should be tested by the circumstances and conduct of the parties at the time of its ultimate acceptance, rather than by the circumstances attending its mere physical making in the first instance, and the subscribers were therefore subject to the liability of stockholders.

6. Licenses 🔑36—Provision of permit for sale of stock as to expenses construed.

Under a permit from the corporation commissioner for the sale of stock by a corporation which provided that the total compensation, commission, or expense to be paid or incurred in the sale of the stock should not exceed 20 per cent. of the selling price, the corporation could pay compensation, commission, or expense not in excess of 20 per cent. out of the price for which the permit authorized the stock to be sold.

7. Licenses 🔑36—Sale of stock for net price in excess of that permitted by commissioner's permit held valid.

Under the Investment Company's Act (St. 1913, p. 715) and a permit issued by the corporation commission thereunder, authorizing a corporation to sell preferred stock for $30 per share on the condition, among others, that the total compensation, commission, or expense should not exceed 20 per cent. of the selling price, a sale for $25 per share was valid; the purpose of the law and the object of the permit being fulfilled when the corporation received a net price in excess of the minimum named in the permit.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by William H. Moore, Jr., trustee in bankruptcy of the Admiral Manufacturing Company, against H. W. Moffatt and others. From a judgment of nonsuit. plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Kimball Fletcher and Edgar K. Brown, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Oliver O. Clark and Claud B. Andrews both of Los Angeles (Carnahan & Clark, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondents.

LENNON, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of nonsuit in favor of the defendants Neeland and Beggs, in an action brought by the plaintiff, as the trustee of a bankrupt corporation, to recover, under the trust fund theory, the difference between the sums paid on a subscription agreement for stock in the corporation and the par value of said stock, irrespective of the terms of the agreement. See Vermont Marble Co. v. Declez Granite Co., 135 Cal. 579, 67 Pac. 1057, 56 L. R. A. 728, 87 Am. St. Rep. 143; Herron Co. v. Shaw, 165 Cal. 668, 133 Pac. 488, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 1265; Harrison v. Armour, 169 Cal. 787, 147 Pac. 1166; Sherman v. Harley, 178 Cal. 584, 174 Pac. 901, 7 A. L. R. 950; Hasson v. Koeberle, 180 Cal. 359, 181 Pac. 387.

The pleaded facts of the plaintiff's case pertinent to the points presented on the motion for a nonsuit are these: On January 8, 1915, the defendants entered into an agreement in writing with the Admiral Automatic Water Heater Company, a corporation, and certain individuals interested therein, for the formation of a new corporation to be known as the Admiral Manufacturing Company. The agreement provided in part:

> "That said Neeland and Beggs agree to subscribe and purchase from the said Admiral Manufacturing Company 96 shares of its capital stock at the sum of $25.00 per share to be paid as follows: $400.00 on the 1st day of January, 1915, and a like sum on the 1st day of each and every month thereafter to and including the 1st day of June, 1915, and upon the payment of each $400.00 when the same becomes due there shall be issued to said Beggs and Neeland 16 shares of the capital stock of the Admiral Manufacturing Company."

Thereafter, so the complaint alleged, in accord with the terms of said subscription agreement, the defendants paid for said stock the sum agreed to be paid therefor.

The Admiral Manufacturing Company was organized with an authorized capital stock of $100,000, divided into 1,000 shares of the par value of $100 each. It does not appear from the complaint when this company was organized. At all times from the organization of said corporation it was insolvent, and its insolvency was known to the defendants. No certificate of stock was ever issued to said Neeland and Beggs, or either of them, but on December 1, 1915, they directed that a certificate for 96 shares be issued to A. E. Warmington, and, pursuant to such direction, such certificate was issued on December 11, 1915. On said last-mentioned dates, and at all intervening times, said Warmington was insolvent, and known to be so by the defendants. No demand has ever been made by the board of directors of said corporation for the unpaid balance of the purchase price of said stock, and no assessment levied.

On April 6, 1916, said Admiral Manufacturing Company filed a voluntary petition in bankruptcy, and plaintiff was appointed trustee. Claims against the bankrupt estate were allowed aggregating $13,402.12, while the available assets amounted to but $349.17. On June 28, 1917, the referee in bankruptcy directed the plaintiff, as trustee, to call in all unpaid subscriptions, and, upon failure of the stockholders to make payment, to sue therefor. Each of the defendants refused to make payment, and plaintiff thereupon brought this action.

The defendants, after denying generally their ownership of the stock in question, by their answers admitted that they signed said subscription agreement, alleging, however, in that behalf, matters and things which, if true, and had they been established in evidence as part of the defendants' case, might have tended to show that said A. E. Warmington, and not the defendants was the real subscriber for the stock, and was to be the actual owner thereof, when it was issued. With the latter phase of the case, however, we are not concerned upon this consideration of the merits of the motion for nonsuit.

[1] The defendants did not deny the allegation of the complaint that they had paid to the corporation the sums agreed to be paid for the said stock in keeping with the terms of the subscription agreement. This being so, it may be taken as an admitted fact that the defendants paid to the corporation the price agreed upon for the purchase of the stock. No denial was made of the allegation of the plaintiff's complaint that pursuant to defendants' direction on December 1, 1915, the stock subscribed for was issued on December 11, 1915, to said Warmington, and that likewise may be taken as an admitted fact in the case. It was also an expressly admitted fact in the case that no permit authorizing the sale of the corporation's stock was issued by the commissioner of corporations until September 10, 1915, and that this permit was superseded by an amended permit issued and dated October 24th of the same year. The amended permit provided, among other things, that the applicant was permitted "to sell 600 shares of its preferred stock at $30 per share," upon the condition, among others, "that the total compensation, commission or expense to be paid or incurred by said applicant in the sale of any of said shares of preferred stock shall not exceed 20 per cent. of the selling price thereof."

The bill of exceptions shows, as a part of the plaintiff's case, that it was stipulated by and between the parties that the subscription agreement in question was made prior to the organization of the corporation, and "that the plaintiff had offered evidence tending to prove all the allegations of the complaint, except that in regard to the allegations that the defendants Neeland and Beggs were stockholders or subscribed to the stock, the only evidence offered was that already in the record and the admissions of the pleadings." Upon the record thus made plaintiff then rested his case, whereupon the defendants moved for a nonsuit "upon the ground [that] the subscription agreement purported to have been made was made at a time anterior to the issuance of any permit by the Corporation Commissioner in violation of the Investment Company's Act as it was in force in January, 1915; and further that it appears from the terms of the subscription agreement itself that the stock was sold for less than the sum authorized by the Corporation Commissioner to sell it."

[2-4] At this point it may not be amiss to note that the stipulation of the parties applied as a matter of course to, and sufficiently supports, as against a motion for a nonsuit, the allegation of the complaint that the corporation and Warmington, the nominee of defendants to whom the stock was issued, were at all times insolvent and known to the defendants to be so. This allegation was evidently intended to charge and hold the defendants as stockholders, despite the fact that the stock was issued to another person, upon the recognized and approved theory that the transfer of stock in an insolvent corporation to a financially irresponsible person, made with the intent to escape liability as a stockholder, will not suffice to enable the transferor to escape such liability. 14 C. J. 1032; Pauly v. State Loan, etc. Co., 165 U. S. 606, 17 Sup. Ct. 465, 41 L. Ed. 844; American Alkali Co. v. Kurtz (C. C.) 134 Fed. 663. But the allegation of the plaintiff's complaint in this behalf is grievously, if not vitally, deficient in not alleging that the defendants' direction to issue the stock of the insolvent corporation, for which they had subscribed, to an insolvent person, was done with the intent and purpose of evading their stockholder's liability. However, no point is made of this upon the record now before us. It was a defect in the plaintiff's case which might have been remedied had attention been called to it by the motion for nonsuit, and, inasmuch as it was not made a ground for the motion for a nonsuit, it could not, upon that motion, be considered by the trial court, nor can it, for the same reason, be considered by this court in determining the merits of the motion. Schroeder v. Mauzy, 16 Cal. App. 443-450, 118 Pac. 459; Sebring v. Harris, 20 Cal. App. 56, 128 Pac. 7; Williamson v. Williamson, 41 Cal. App. 721, 183 Pac. 301; Potts v. Mehrmann, 195 Pac. (Cal.

App.) 941; Raimond v. Eldridge, 43 Cal. 506; Gardiner v. Schmaelzle, 47 Cal. 558; Coffey v. Greenfield, 62 Cal. 602; Miller v. Luco, 80 Cal. 257, 22 Pac. 195; Daley v. Russ, 86 Cal. 114, 117, 24 Pac. 867; Palmer & Rey v. Marysville, 90 Cal. 168, 27 Pac. 21; Warner v. Warner, 144 Cal. 615, 619, 78 Pac. 24; Durfee v. Seale, 139 Cal. 604, 73 Pac. 435; Mattson v. Mattson, 181 Cal. 44, 183 Pac. 443.

[5] Conceding, for the purposes of discussion and decision, as is contended in support of the judgment, that the subscription agreement was in its inception void and incapable of acceptance by the corporation because executed, in contravention of the provisions of the Investment Company's Act (Stats. 1913, p. 715), prior to the procurement of a permit from the corporation commissioner authorizing a sale of the corporation's stock, and therefore could not have been legally made the basis of an action against the defendants upon the theory that they were stockholders in the corporation, still we have the admitted fact in the plaintiff's case that no stock of the corporation was in fact issued in response to any agreement of the parties until after an admittedly regular and valid permit had been granted by the corporation commissioner. This being so, the subscription agreement, even though it may have been void and incapable of acceptance in the first instance, should, in the light of the subsequent conduct of the parties to the transaction, be considered and construed as a continuing offer to subscribe for the stock in question, pending the procurement of a permit from the corporation commissioner, which ultimately became the embodiment and expression of a new agreement to purchase the stock entered into at a time when the only legal obstacle in the way of a valid agreement had been overcome. The agreement, so considered, and having been in fact ultimately accepted by the corporation after the required permit had been procured—as evidenced by the issue of the stock upon the order of the defendants—the validity of its making and acceptance must be measured and tested by its character as revealed by the circumstances and conduct of the parties with relation thereto at the time of its ultimate acceptance rather than by the circumstances attending its mere physical making in the first instance. That is to say, the conduct of the parties to the transaction, the defendants on the one hand and the corporation on the other, with reference to the subject-matter of the agreement, at a time when the only legal obstacle to the making of a valid subscription agreement had been overcome by compliance with the statutory requirement, was tantamount to an adoption by them of the terms and conditions of the subscription agreement as of the date of its ultimate acceptance, thereby in effect making it finally effectual as the expression of a new agreement, even though in its original making it may have been void and ineffectual for any purpose.

Of course, the parties to the transaction could not, nor did they, as a matter of law, by their adoption of the agreement ratify and thereby validate as of the time of its original making or any time thereafter an agreement which may have been void in the first instance. But the parties could, and we think they did, when the bar of the statute to the making and acceptance of a valid agreement had been removed, elect to adopt and accept and stand upon the subscription agreement already signed as embodying—even though it may have been ineffectual at the time it was signed—the terms and conditions of a new agreement by which their future dealings were to be governed. Montgomery, etc., Co. v. Montgomery, etc., Co., 229 Fed. 672, 144 C. C. A. 82; Turner Const. Co. v. Union Term. Co., 229 Fed. 702, 144 C. C. A. 112; Miles v. Janvrin, 200 Mass. 514, 86 N. E. 785; Williston on Contracts, § 1772, p. 3082.

So considering the subscription agreement in question, it must be held that it did not fall within the claimed inhibition of the statute, and therefore the motion for a nonsuit was improperly granted upon the ground of the alleged invalidity of the agreement.

[6, 7] It seems to be conceded by the respondents, as we think it must be, that the proviso in the permit of the corporation commissioner, "that the total compensation, commission or expense to be paid or incurred by said applicant in the sale of any of said shares of preferred stock shall not exceed 20 per cent. of the selling price thereof," should be construed as meaning that it "permitted the corporation to pay compensation, commission or expense" of the sale of the stock "out of" and "up to 20 per cent. * * * of the price of $30 per share" at which the corporation was authorized to sell the stock." This being so, it must be held that the sale of the stock was made to the defendants in substantial accord with the provisions of the permit. Obviously the purpose of the law and the object of the permit were fulfilled when the corporation received a net price in excess of the minimum named in the permit. The subscription agreement provided for the payment of $25 a share, and the stock admittedly was sold at that price, which is $1 per share more than the minimum net price fixed by the corporation commissioner for the sale of the stock. This being so, the ground for the motion for nonsuit in this particular was nonsubstantial, and will not suffice to support the judgment.

For the reasons stated the judgment is reversed.

187 Cal. 790

MONSCH v. PELLISSIER. (L. A. 6488.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 27, 1922.)

1. Municipal corporations ⟹808(3)—Owner maintaining light wells in sidewalk over area liable for injuries without notice to repair.

An abutting owner maintaining an area or vault under the sidewalk in front of her property, and maintaining in the sidewalk above the area light wells for her sole and exclusive benefit to supply light, must use reasonable care to keep them in safe condition and is liable for an injury resulting from a defective condition of which she knew, without notice from the Board of Public Works under the Vrooman Act and the acts amendatory thereto to repair the sidewalk, especially where their condition rendered them in the nature of a nuisance.

2. Pleading ⟹214(3)—Allegation taken as true on demurrer.

In an action for personal injuries an allegation that light wells over an area or vault under a sidewalk were kept and maintained by the abutting owner for her sole and exclusive use must be taken as true on demurrer.

3. Pleading ⟹254—Allegations in answer not considered in passing on demurrer to amended complaint.

Averments of defendant's answer to the original complaint will not be considered when passing on the demurrer to the amended complaint.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Lewis R. Works, Judge.

Action by Elizabeth M. Monsch against Marie Julie Pellissier for personal injuries. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Ford & Bodkin and Jos. J. Herlihy, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

George J. Denis, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHURTLEFF, J. The amended complaint alleged that defendant kept and mantained for her own use and benefit an area or vault under the sidewalk in front of and adjoining her property in the city of Los Angeles; that in the sidewalk over and above said area or vault defendant kept and mantained light wells consisting of iron grating and inlaid glass for her sole and exclusive use and benefit, for the purpose of supplying light to said vault and area and to the basement of her building standing upon her said property; that said light wells were maintained by defendant in a negligent and dangerous condition, in that large portions of the inlaid glass were broken out or chipped, leaving holes in the surface thereof, and that in other portions of the same the glass had been replaced with boards. It was further alleged that the defendant knew, or by the use of ordinary care or diligence should have known, of the condition of these light wells; that plaintiff, while passing over and upon said light wells, stepped into a hole in one of them, causing her to fall violently to the sidewalk, with the result that her left shoulder and her left hip were fractured and her nervous system seriously shocked. To this complaint defendant interposed a demurrer, which was sustained without leave to amend, the plaintiff having declined to make further amendment. Thereupon judgment was entered for defendant, from which judgment plaintiff takes this appeal.

[1, 2] Both parties agree that the sole question in the case is whether, under the facts alleged, the defendant is responsible for the said injury sustained by plaintiff. The respondent contends that the complaint is insufficient because of the absence therefrom of an allegation that the board of public works of the city of Los Angeles had, prior to the accident, received notice of the alleged dangerous condition of the sidewalk, or that the defendant was ever notified by said board that the same was in a condition requiring repairs or reconstruction. This position is predicated upon the Vrooman Act (St. 1885, p. 147) and acts amendatory thereto (St. 1891, p. 206, St. 1893, p. 172) and Martinovich v. Wooley, 128 Cal. 141, 60 Pac. 760, which holds that the street law does not impose a liability upon the owner for personal injuries resulting from the nonrepair of the sidewalk in front of his lot, unless, as required by said act, the defect continues after the lapse of 24 hours or more from the time of the giving of the statutory notice thereof by the proper officer, which in that case was the superintendent of streets, and in this the board of public works, but we do not think the Martinovich Case is controlling here. What is there decided must be read in the light of the facts which the case presented. There the injury was due to a "decayed and rotten" plank in the sidewalk, which was essentially a component part and portion of the structure, and placed therein solely and entirely for the use of the public, and not, as here, for the special accommodation of the owner and his property. In the instant case the grating and glass became part of the surface of the sidewalk over which pedestrians could walk, but it performed an additional and distinct office, namely, the passage of light to the basement of the defendant's building, in which use it was, as such, no part of the sidewalk. The fact that what may be termed its secondary use was to provide light, as stated (the same being for defendant's sole benefit), should not relieve her from keeping the light well in safe repair, even though the primary use of the sidewalk is for the public to walk over, and is, in such use, under the supervision of the city. Moreover, as we have said, the complaint alleges, which upon demurrer must be taken as true, that the light wells were kept and maintained by defendant for her sole and exclusive use.
